Identify the Problem

The first step is to identify the problem areas and define objectives. The problems may be cultural rather than ethnic—that is to say, a major problem may be the difficulty that children of urban newcomers have in developing suitable language skills for doing adequate work in the public schools. Remedial reading may be of more importance in the long run than fair employment practices.

Plan a Tentative Program

The next step is to develop tentative priorities for meeting objectives. This program may include, but is not necessarily limited to, establishment of a human relations commission, development of in-service training for the police department in race relations, studies of environmental health programs for ethnic groups, remedial reading programs for the children of in-migrants, and preparation and review of appropriate city ordinances.

Inventory Local Resources

The next step is to inventory the groups within the community that can help in various aspects of a well-rounded program. Such resource groups include the city government itself, both the city council and city employees; the local ministerial association or council of churches; the central labor council; the local board of education and the school superintendent and staff; the downtown businessmen's association; the health and welfare council; and service clubs. It is likely that some of these groups already have demonstrated an interest in some aspects of human relations, and they may even have developed certain programs. These resources provide the foundation on which the city government can develop an over-all approach.

Develop a Detailed Program

When the inventory has been completed, the chief administrator knows about the work that already is being done by private organizations and other governments in housing, employment, and other areas. He then can think in terms of the work that must be undertaken by the city government to meet deficiencies.

It is up to the appropriate authorities, usually the mayor or the city council, to call together representatives of these resource groups for discussion on the work to be undertaken in agreed-upon areas.

Assign Responsibilities

The next step is to assign responsibilities for each of the resource groups, including of course the city government, with respect to program, financing, procedures, staffing, and reporting. Obviously this involves a cooperative approach. Compulsion is neither feasible nor desirable. The more that agreement can be reached, the more specific the responsibilities that can be undertaken and the better the over-all program will be.

Review and Evaluation

Finally, the program should be placed into effect and then modified as needed on the basis of experience. Review and evaluation should be built in to meet changing needs and to learn from past mistakes. It should be emphasized that the role of the city government throughout this process is that of gathering information, meeting with representatives of appropriate organizations, encouraging cooperative action, recommending community goals, and providing, in a nonauthoritarian sense, community leadership.

Human Relations Commissions

To calm the tensions that grow out of racial and ethnic differences, and to help solve problems of minority groups in changing and often overcrowded cities, human relations agencies have been established by many municipal governments.

Cleveland, Ohio, established the Community Relations Board as a municipal agency in 1945. Cleveland thus claims to have the first human relations agency in the United States to be formed by ordinance, although Chicago, Cincinnati, and Detroit, among others, had taken similar action earlier by mayoral decree.

By 1962, more than 40 large cities in the nation had official intergroup agencies staffed by professional workers. Others have nonpaid, advisory citizen groups. Illinois alone has at least 15 official municipal human relations commissions, although only the one in Chicago has a professional staff. In addition, there are a myriad of private, unofficial race relations agencies.

Programs

The programs and activities of human relations commissions are as varied as the problems of minority groups themselves. The examples set forth in the following paragraphs cover employment, political campaigns, education, public accommodations, and housing. The authority of human relations commissions also varies widely from educational and advisory groups to those, as in Philadelphia, with enforcement powers.

Alton, Illinois. The youth committee of the Alton Commission on Human Relations, in cooperation with local businessmen, sponsored a Youth Employment Day in 1961. Negro and white high school students took jobs for a day with various business establishments and, as an immediate result, several of the students obtained part-time employment. The Commission felt that the community as a whole gained a new view of the potential of both white and Negro youth.

Newark, New Jersey. Among the varied activities of the Mayor's Commission on Group Relations of Newark has been the provision of scholarships for qualified residents to attend summer workshops in human relations and community leadership. The Commission also has sponsored a Code of Fair Campaign Practices which pledges political candidates, among other things, to condemn any appeal to prejudice based on race or creed. Forty-one of 52 municipal candidates signed the pledge in 1961.

Toledo, Ohio. The Toledo (Ohio) Board of Community Relations was created by the city council in 1946 primarily as an agency for information and education. The mayor is authorized to appoint 20 persons nominated by business, labor, and religious groups as well as five public members of his own choosing. The Board has an executive secretary, an assistant, and a clerical staff. For five years the Board, together with the University of Toledo and the local federation of teachers, sponsored a two-week intergroup relations workshop for civic leaders and teachers. This was followed by a pilot demonstration project at one of the elementary schools, with intensive study of intergroup relations problems by the entire faculty.

Cognizant of "the fact that the home and community at large are the learning areas in which youngsters pick up discriminatory practices," the Toledo Board has sponsored, with the presidents of Catholic, Jewish, and Protestant women's groups, a series of annual Women's Institutes on Human Relations. These institutes have dealt with such topics as prejudice in speech, the high cost of discrimination, fair employment, Spanish speaking neighbors, housing, and how to deal with problems and controversies in intergroup relations. In addition, the Board sponsors a Program Planners Institute every other year to explain the group's work to representatives of civic groups.

Wichita, Kansas. Wichita became the first city in Kansas to staff its human relations commission with a paid, full-time professional intergroup relations worker. The commission consists of 30 citizens appointed by the mayor with the approval of the city council.

Philadelphia. The Philadelphia Commission on Human Relations was established by the home rule charter of 1951. The following year it assumed the powers and duties of the Philadelphia Fair Employment Practice Commission, established in 1948. With a staff of 21 professional employees, Commission has been able to initiate a variety of programs. It has developed a special training program in human relations for municipal personnel and for volunteers in community groups.

In 1961 the Philadelphia Commission held a seminar for executives of press, radio and television and intergroup relations agencies to discuss the handling of racial news. A set of guidelines was adopted for voluntary use by news media and agencies. The Commission also began a leadership development and participation program to help prepare young minority group citizens for service on various boards and committees.

The First Negro Family

Sometimes the arrival of the first family of a "different" race in a city can send officials and citizens into action as surely as a great influx. Such was the case in Park Forest, Illinois, and Medford, Oregon.

Park Forest. The trustees (city councilmen) of Park Forest, Illinois, appointed a human relations commission to study what could be done to provide a smooth transition if a Negro family moved to the village. The commission enlisted the support of leaders of the community, including the clergy. The group took no overt action until the first Negro family moved to the city in 1959. The commission and trustees then went into action. All residents in the neighborhood affected were visited by a trustee and their clergyman. It was made clear that the village leaders welcomed the new family. Police surveillance of the area was increased for the first week. This same procedure was used in 1963 (but with less fanfare) when a second Negro family moved in. (The first family in the meantime had moved to New York City.)

It would be less than honest to say everybody was happy about the "move-in," but everybody respected the law. Three factors seem to have been important to this peaceful transition. First, Park Forest is a suburban community with a large percentage of well educated people. Second, the leadership let it be known that the Negro family's rights would be respected. Third, the situation was handled with as little publicity as possible.

Medford. The Oregon State Advisory Committee to the Commission on Civil Rights reported in 1961 how a human rights group, in cooperation with other agencies, aided in reaching a satisfactory solution when the first Negro family came to Medford. The U. S. Weather Bureau transferred a Negro family to its Medford station, and the employee asked the aid of his superior in finding housing. They first tried a college town 15 miles away but were rebuffed by real estate agents. Then, the Advisory Committee reported:

> Returning to Medford, they got in touch with a newly formed human rights council in the city which found housing for them, although without employment of real estate agencies. The expected opposition movement developed with derogatory rumors, a circulated petition, and "semi-violent" reactions from two or three families, and hostile reactions from another three or four families. Those opposed made the most noise. But with the support of the ministerial association, the local newspaper and the police, the human rights council was able to hold the line. The chief of police, incidentally, is a member of the board of the human rights council.
> Thus, the first Negro family resides peacefully in the city, and the "policy of exclusion" is breached. The human rights council has grown markedly in membership and prestige as a result of this incident, and its members express amazement at the widespread support they received. . . .
> The incident shows that even where a firm tradition of exclusion had prevailed for a century, there was a preponderance of people who were willing to support the right of the Negro. . . The case was basically community action. The law gave them backing, but was not invoked. . . .

The South

The southern counterparts to the professional human relations agencies of the North and West and the permanent advisory councils are the official, but for the most part temporary, mediating committees. Some 35 cities in the South now have, or have had in the past few years, such committees. They have been formed most often to mediate controversies growing out of sit-in demonstrations and boycotts. The most common have been the biracial committees appointed by city officials to deal with specific problems. In addition, a number of southern cities have long-standing, unofficial and private race relations councils.

Police

"The key toward gaining community respect is to treat all individuals the same – with fairness, impartiality, honesty, courtesy and firmness." This advice to policemen is given in the Guide to Community Relations for Peace Officers, published by the office of the California Attorney General in 1958.

This always has been the goal of good police departments, but the need to make it a firm practice never has been more urgent. With urban areas becoming ever more crowded, with changes in the racial composition of cities and neighborhoods, with aroused Negro citizens pressing with greater vigor for legal equality, and with the court-ordered desegregation of a lengthening list of facilities, tensions mount. If left unchecked, widespread disorder, mob action and violence may result where police departments and city officials have been ill-prepared or unwilling to act.

A detailed examination of all phases of police action in this field is impossible here, but a brief consideration of what some cities have done is indicative of widespread concern.

Prevention

Every good police department emphasizes the duty of officers to enforce laws impartially. As Chief of Police J. E. Curry of Dallas, Texas, has said, "Only so long as we enforce the law equally and equitably will we have the respect and support of the people."

Most law officials agree on the importance of recognizing alarm signals of impending racial trouble, such as: the appearance of threatening or derogatory signs in public places; the circulation of "hate" publications; an increasing number of rumors, growing in sensation; greater activity by known agitators; more threats or incidents of violence; an increase in charges of police brutality and a growing distrust of law enforcement; and gang fights by juveniles.

The consensus of police institutes also suggests the need for an intelligence system which keeps the police department in touch with groups for and against segregation, an awareness of potentially troublesome situations, and cooperation with other community agencies and with public information media.

Many large cities have police manuals which include suggested procedures for controlling mobs, should they form despite precautions. These deal with means of quelling riots, such as the need for a quick show of force (actual use of force may not be necessary), separating the ringleaders, and the use of megaphones, police cordons, and weapons.

Police Training

Police departments in many cities in recent years have conducted or participated in training programs in human and race relations to be better prepared for the changing composition of urban areas. Large-city departments often have organized their own programs, and sometimes have made such training available to smaller neighboring communities. In addition, police-community relations courses and training institutes for law enforcement officers in all types of state and local government agencies have spread across the country. These training programs, in addition to covering general principles, show the ways in which effective and ineffective police action can affect emotionally charged situations extending from racial problems.

The Southern Police Institute, established at the University of Louisville in 1950, devotes much of its 17-week program to human relations. A national institute on police-community relations has been held since 1955 at the School of Police Administration and Public Safety at Michigan State University, with the cooperation of the International Association of Chiefs of Police, the National Sheriffs Association, and the National Conference of Christians and Jews.

Regional institutes supplement these programs. In addition to these regional programs, counterpart institutes of one to three days duration are held in at least 12 states, and more than 50 cities hold local programs in cooperation with the national conference of Christians and Jews.[3]

Negro Officers

Employment of Negro officers is a subject which inevitably comes up in any discussion of police and race. A report of such employment in the South issued in 1961 by the Southern Regional Council (The Unequal Badge by Elliott M. Rudwick) showed:

The employment of Negro police, which increased after World War II, has gained little ground in the South since 1954. At that time, there were 536 uniformed police in 146 cities in the 11 Southern states, plus Oklahoma and Kentucky, and in 1959 the same cities had 646, a small increase considering the growth of the Negro population in urban centers.

"In the South (as well as other parts of the country), there are not many Negro law enforcement officers who have reached a rank of sergeant or above," the report pointed out, adding that this is partially due to the short period of time Negroes have been employed in substantial numbers. However, Daytona Beach, Florida; Louisville, Kentucky; Atlanta, Georgia; and Durham, North Carolina, all have Negro lieutenants.

In the area surveyed, over 83 per cent indicated that Negro officers operate exclusively in Negro districts, and in over one-half the cities the Negro officer must not arrest white citizens for any crime but must "hold" them until a white officer arrives. Pensacola, Florida, has one of the few southern police departments that does not restrict Negro officers in assignments or arrest powers; the Atlanta police chief lifted similar restrictions in 1961.

Some Examples

The police in many communities must be prepared to deal with school desegregation, juvenile problems, housing, use of public accommodations, and charges of abuse of police authority. The following examples illustrate all of these areas of concern to municipal police departments.

Atlanta. This city was better prepared for a change in racial customs than most southern communities due to various active citizens organizations pledged to law and order and acceptance of court rulings. However, there also were active and highly vocal segregationists and an influx of outside racists and agitators just as determined on the other side. The mayor and police chief tipped the scales in favor of law and order and kept the city free of serious violence during the desegregation of schools.

William Hartsfield, then mayor of Atlanta, and Police Chief Herbert Jenkins, anticipating the desegregation, had sent men from the police force to Little Rock and New Orleans to learn from their experience and held police seminars on riot control. Police maintained files on all race agitators. The superintendent of schools began preparing students by holding meetings stressing the students' responsibility to maintain order when schools were desegregated.

With the opening of school in the fall, Atlanta police kept a 24-hour watch on the schools affected, and the grounds and immediate vicinities were off-limits to spectators. The press was kept fully informed, and an information center was set up in city hall. The long preparation, the show of determination by the police, and the emphasis on firm and impartial control paid off.

Oakland. This city illustrates a growing tendency for police departments to work with other city agencies on the special problems growing out of depressed economic and minority group status.

W., Washington 6, D. C.

An article in Fortune magazine "The City and the Negro," by Charles E. Silberman, March, 1962) cited an example how this city coordinated the work of several municipal agencies:

> Wayne Thompson, the young city manager of Oakland, Calif., has pulled together seven public agencies representing four levels of government into something called the Associated Agencies. Fortnightly meetings of the A.A. workers in each section of the city are held to coordinate their work. In dealing with one school marked by frequent violence, for example, the school superintendent allowed the police to seal off the school area and then clean out the guns and knives in the school lockers. The school, police, recreation, probation, and welfare workers then culled a list of troublemakers, letting each agency take responsibility for the children it already knew, or upon whom it had some particular claim. Out of 2,800 pupils, only 54 turned out to be real troublemakers; when the whole job had been finished, only two had to be moved out of school into detention. Since the Associated Agencies program started in late 1957, Oakland has been relatively free of trouble.

Philadelphia. A veteran Negro police executive in Philadelphia, with the rank of chief inspector in 1961 was assigned command of the police department's new community relations program. He and his staff, which includes 22 human relations officers, will serve as liaison between the police commissioner and the commission on human relations, the crime prevention association, and related agencies.

In 1958, the mayor of Philadelphia appointed the first members of the city's police advisory board, a non partisan body composed of leading citizens. The board hears complaints against policemen of such grievances as undue use of force or brutality, discrimination, or violation of constitutional rights. It has settled more than two-thirds of 300 complaints without formal hearings by explaining the legality of the policeman's act or getting an apology for the complainant. Martin S. Barol, lawyer and executive director of the board, said that the agency has acted as a "safety valve in the community. No longer is it necessary for a citizen who feels himself wronged by police action to harbor resentment within himself, or to spread his hostile feelings throughout the community." Barol added the board has not "demoralized the police force," contrary to the prediction of the Fraternal Order of Police, which has opposed such boards. Similar civilian boards have been set up in Los Angeles, Minneapolis, and York (Pennsylvania).

Negaunee, Michigan. The need for a different kind of coordination was pointed up in Negaunee which was faced with a situation in 1961 that could confront other smaller cities. There were approximately 5,000 troops, a high percentage of them Negro, stationed at nearby Sawyer Air Force Base, which had been reactivated four years earlier.

Negaunee is an Upper Peninsula mining town of about 6,000. Recreational facilities in the area are limited, and transportation to the nearest large cities is inadequate for the troops. One Saturday night in September, 1961, violence broke out between some of the airmen and Negaunee civilians. While the commander of the base and the city manager felt early reports of the trouble were exaggerated, nevertheless the incident demanded precautions to forestall any future outbreak.

On the night in question, there were a few minor skirmishes and some taunts and name calling in the town early in the evening. Then, at 9:15 p.m., a Negro airman was found beaten in a municipal parking lot; a rumor spread quickly that he had been whipped with a chain. More Air Force personnel – estimates ranged up to 100 – began coming into Negaunee, and soon a series of fights broke out in the downtown section.

The police chief was away on vacation, and there were only two policemen, plus a desk man, on duty. The senior policeman then in town, a lieutenant, was called and some time later he called City Manager Leonard J. Harris, who took charge. Harris said he telephoned the base for air police assistance but was told by a sergeant on duty that the provost marshal "could not be bothered." The colonel in charge of the base said later that police also had phoned him that night and asked for help and that he referred them to the state police.

The city manager deputized 18 local firemen and sent a call for help to the sheriff's office and the state police. Within a short time, four state troopers and four deputies arrived and by 3:00 a.m. the disorder was under control.

Subsequently two Negro airmen and two white citizens of Negaunee were sentenced to 90 days in jail on disorderly conduct charges, and a high school youth was placed on probation for a year.

A report issued by the base commander and the city manager said rumors that the airman had been beaten by a chain were unfounded. Of the disorder, City Manager Harris says:

> There were a number of contributing factors responsible for this outbreak, some of which were due entirely to lack of foresight on the part of the Air Force and some of the agitation came directly from some undesirable elements in the City of Negaunee. . . . I personally feel that if on the night of this occurrence the Police Department had immediately jailed both the colored and the whites who were involved and cleared the streets as I did when I was called, it would have ended much sooner than it did.

In the days following, several changes were made in the police department, and the City Council agreed to recommendations by the City Manager, including: strict enforcement of the antiloitering ordinance; harsher penalties for repeated convictions for drunkeness and disorderly conduct; and suspension or revocation of licenses of taverns and restaurants not conducted properly. The Air Force agreed to the city manager's request for a courtesy patrol of Air Police and warned troops that further disturbances would result in the maximum punishment allowable under the Uniform Code of Military Justice. Since then only one further incident has been reported in Negaunee. Three airmen who were charged with striking a teen-age boy without provocation were jailed for 90 days and dismissed from the Air Force.

Los Angeles. Negroes began moving into a southwest section of the city. By the time they represented nearly 50 per cent of the student body in the schools, white and Negro gangs were forming, and fights were becoming a daily occurrence. A junior high school became the focal point of trouble. Community organizations began working on the adult level. The police department set up patrols around the schools, and juvenile officers concentrated on the problem. They learned the membership of the gangs and secured evidence leading to the arrest of the agitators.

One of the most important aspects of the Los Angeles police work was investigation of rumors, which were the excuse for most acts of violence. Fact was separated from fiction and the facts made public. The police department, working with the schools and community agencies, brought about such an easing of tension that today this junior high school has fewer problems of a racial or cultural nature than others in the city.

San Francisco. In 1954, when integration of public housing projects was planned, an inspector of the police department was designated a liaison officer with the city housing authority. He was kept informed whenever a member of a different race was to move into a project, and he in turn notified the district police station. Procedures were established to prevent disturbances. Plainclothesmen were on hand, and uniformed police were a short distance away, to observe whenever a member of another race moved into a project. ("We felt that the attendant presence of uniformed police would attract unnecessary attention to the situation wherein the desired atmosphere would be one of normalcy.") After the move, radio cars patrolled in a casual manner and contact was maintained between the individual housing projects and the district police stations in order to spot any friction. Not a single disturbance or incident was reported at any of the housing projects, and integration was successfully accomplished.

Dallas. An area which had been white began a period of transition. Schools were segregated at that time and Negro youths had to pass a white school en route to their own. The Negro and white students began pushing each other as they met on the sidewalk, and tension mounted in the whole community. Additional police squads were assigned to the area. Whenever children were found pushing, a call was made to the homes of all the children involved, both white and Negro. If the same children were involved in several clashes, they were referred to the county juvenile officers. The Negro community soon realized the law was being enforced impartially, and the white community learned that violence directed against a minority group would not be tolerated. Thus a situation which might have resulted in widespread, long-lasting tension was mediated peacefully.

Chicago. In 1961 when a group of Negroes and whites began a series of "wade-in" demonstrations at a public beach formerly used almost exclusively by white persons, week-end crowds varying from 3,000 to 10,000 gathered. Demonstrators had notified police of their intentions, and when the first demonstrating group of about 75 persons arrived, 175 policemen were on hand to patrol. The police captain in charge, carrying a portable megaphone, walked along the beach and told the crowd either to disperse or be seated on the beach. Twelve persons, 11 whites and one Negro, were arrested the first week-end and charged with disturbing the peace. The calm that prevailed after several week-ends was attributed to heavy police protection, plus support from representatives of the major religious faiths, both on the scene and in statements of approval of the demonstrators' aims.

Education

Since the 1954-55 decisions of the U. S. Supreme Court, publicity has been focused on the resistance, the struggles, and the accommodations of the South and border states to school desegregation. Even the most casual newspaper reader has been aware of the violence in some cities, which in its most extreme form called for Federal troops; of the almost calm acceptance of change in others, a change which has brought token desegregation to eight southern states; and of the resistance and legal maneuvers which have left three states — Mississippi, Alabama, and South Carolina — with completely segregated elementary and secondary schools.

In the past few years, however, the spotlight has focused increasingly on cities in the North with de facto school segregation. (With the start of the 1962-63 school term, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People had filed school desegregation suits against 11 cities in New York, Illinois, Pennsylvania, Indiana, Kansas, and California.) As Negroes have flocked to urban centers, they have concentrated in central cities which generally offer the only available housing. Consequently, many city schools are predominantly Negro. In short, segregated housing leads to segregated schools.

No long-range, satisfactory solution to the school problem of most large cities is likely until the housing market is broadened for Negroes. But many Negroes are unwilling to wait for the housing picture to change, claiming that in the meantime predominantly Negro schools in the North often are overcrowded, inadequately staffed and equipped, and housed in substandard buildings. Also, they charge that some school district lines are deliberately gerrymandered to keep neighborhood schools all-white or all-Negro.

As a result of one such charge, brought to court in New Rochelle, New York, a federal judge held that gerrymandering in the past had kept a school 94 per cent Negro. He ordered that Negroes be allowed free access to white schools elsewhere in the city.

Neighborhood Schools

One point of controversy has been the neighborhood school which has been the accepted practice all over the country. One side contends that upgrading existing Negro schools is preferable to transporting children across the city to achieve some desegregation. Others maintain that, as the Supreme Court said in its school ruling, "separate educational facilities are inherently unequal." They argue that some racial balance must be achieved, and if there is no other way, because of the housing pattern, then pupils must be transported.

Criss-crossing school buses, taking children from one school to a distant one just to achieve some desegregation has not been a very popular solution, involving as it does exhausting bus trips across town in the large cities or the expense of acquiring more buses for smaller communities. However, where Negro schools are overcrowded and there are underpopulated schools in white areas, some transporting can achieve a better balance. Last fall, New York City's "open enrollment" plan allowed 9,000 children in heavily Negro and Puerto Rican schools to attend underpopulated schools in other neighborhoods. Chicago and Newark have similar programs.

Princeton, New Jersey, has abandoned the concept of neighborhood schools and thus eliminated segregation. One school is used for all children in kindergarten through the fifth grade, another for the sixth through eighth grades. The city provides no transportation, and most pupils walk or ride their bicycles or, in the case of small children, are driven in private car pools. Willow Grove, Pennsylvania, has a similar system. The Princeton plan has been studied by a number of other smaller cities where distances are not so great as to present a transportation problem, and by larger cities where similar plans within given areas are under consideration.

The Board of Education in Morristown, New Jersey, adopted a plan to convert a predominantly Negro elementary school to a junior high in 1963 and scatter the displaced children to other schools.

The school board of Danville, Illinois, after protests and picketing by Negro parents who contended new elementary school boundaries perpetuated segregation, has announced that hereafter the predominantly Negro school and two others will be open to students throughout the city. The board has agreed to assign Negro teachers to the high school and to other elementary schools.

Other non-Southern cities which announced plans of voluntary school desegregation in 1962 were Jersey City and Montclair, New Jersey; Stamford, Connecticut; Coatesville and Washington, Pennsylvania; Mount Vernon, Illinois; and Eloy, Arizona.

Aid for Children

As school systems across the country face new problems and challenges because of a growing and changing population, more is heard of the "culturally deprived" child. Studies have shown that many children from rural areas or poor urban families suffer in linguistic development and general ability to follow a curriculum designed for children with middle-class backgrounds. Even though they may be normal or above in native intelligence, these children often have been so removed from the world of the settled, "average" middle-class family, that they cannot communicate, relate textbook examples to their own lives, or even understand them. Their health may be poor, they may be hungry, and their motivation for school nonexistent. To help these children from migrant and deprived families realize their potentialities and become a self-supporting asset to the community, several cities have instituted special supplementary or enrichment programs.

New York City probably has the most far-reaching program, including non-English classes for Puerto Ricans and others who have come to New York schools from outside the continental United States. It includes work with the children and family, field trips and excursions, screening and testing of new entrants, and guidance and counseling. Results have shown up in improved reading ability, attendance, and morale.

Pittsburgh is meeting the challenge in another way by developing new techniques of teaching. A pilot project has been set up in five elementary schools, with teaching teams organized to meet a multipurpose goal, including increased student achievement, better appreciation of education among parents, and gradual lightening of the welfare burden. The team consists of a master teacher, regular teachers, a team mother, and unpaid assistants who are student teachers from local colleges, all of whom work with children in need of extra help in the selected schools.

Milwaukee has special classes for in-migrant pupils. The classes, in several schools with the largest number of newcomers, are kept small, and children are taught there until they are ready to move into regular classes. A welfare counsellor works with parents, and a psychologist and personnel from the local health department cooperate.

St. Louis has the Banneker program in 23 elementary schools, with a 95 per cent Negro enrollment, in the poorer part of the city. Special teaching programs have been developed, parent cooperation in home work assignments enlisted, and children stimulated by field trips, honor awards, and discussions. In three years the number of Banneker pupils in the top of three "tracks" was tripled and the bottom "track" halved.

Negro children have been aided by special programs in Kansas City, Missouri, to overcome their environmental handicaps and gradually are raising their median achievement levels to those of white pupils. Detroit, Chicago, and Washington also have programs designed to aid children with special problems in a new, competitive environment.

Detroit also began an experiment in 1961 with new preprimers for half the first graders in the city schools. Since most primers are based on what has been described as the all-white, antiseptic world of "Dick and Jane," they have little meaning to a child whose front lawn is a crowded city sidewalk — and who may be Negro. After taping conversations with hundreds of elementary school children in Detroit and finding the 100 words used most frequently, the preprimer textbooks were rewritten, using these words and presenting situations about white and Negro children in crowded big cities. Later, the Detroit groups using the new, and those using the standard texts, will be tested to see if children learn faster from books which reflect their own background.

Washington, D.C., is developing a study guide to show the place of the Negro in American culture and history in an effort to instill pride in the contribution of Negroes. Also under development is a second study guide tracing the development of Nazi racism in Germany, as an object lesson in the value of democracy and tolerance.

The school administration in San Angelo, Texas, has established a free tutoring program at nights. It is open to all high school students, and both white and Negro children have enrolled for the extra classes. The school system of Tucson, Arizona, operates an orientation program for pupils and teachers with respect to problems of integration.

Aid for Adults

Tucson is one of a number of cities with education-orientation programs on the adult level. The University of Arizona's home economics department and a low-income housing project in Tucson sponsor a program to help project residents, including some ex-migrant farm workers, adjust to their new community. Graduate and senior students have met with mothers to discuss budget, diet, and problems of child care.

In Belle Glade, Florida, a paid employee of the local health department works with seasonal farm workers on child care and personal health problems and helps worker families learn to use community health services.

In yet another program, aimed not primarily at newcomers but for adults in the community as a whole, the Mayor's Commission on Group Relations in Newark, New Jersey in cooperation with Fuld Neighborhood House, has been offering an adult education course on "The Negro in American History." The course was instituted to acquaint both white and Negro citizens with the contributions the Negro has made to American development.

The Cleveland Community Relations Board has set up a department of migration to aid the four major newcomer groups to the city: southern Negroes, southern Appalachians, American Indians, and Puerto Ricans. The Board distributes English and Spanish versions of a directory of community services and a kit of materials compiled to aid these newcomers. The Board holds orientation meetings every six weeks with Indian newcomers to answer questions about the city and urban behavior. It also conducts information programs for Puerto Ricans (there were 6,500 from this commonwealth in Cleveland in 1961).

The Board has sponsored programs and a fair to acquaint other Cleveland residents with the cultural contributions of former residents of the Appalachian Mountain region. The staff has visited industrial plants in the area to gather information on the employment problems of the newcomers and has spent a great deal of its educational effort on the matter of wage garnishments since new, underprivileged residents often are the victims of unscrupulous salesmen.

In cooperation with area colleges, the Mayor's Committee on New Residents in Chicago offers a Spanish course to aid police and other municipal workers who deal with the new Spanish-speaking residents of the city. Newark offers a similar course for city employees.

Guidelines

Judging by the experience of cities faced with protests over school segregation, a few guidelines emerge to help smooth the path toward racial harmony. A well-planned public information program can help explain the drawing of school boundaries, where these boundaries have been set in a logical fashion with no effort to gerrymander in order to maintain predominantly white or Negro schools.

A willingness to discuss mutual problems with leaders of minority groups and to enlist their aid in arriving at solutions is helpful to the community as a whole, as is insistence that all schools in the system be housed, equipped, and staffed equitably. Hiring and assignment of teachers and administrators on a merit basis, regardless of race, and minority group representation on school boards are also sound practices.

Employment

An area that cities are often forced to consider is fair employment practices. It has been estimated that if the present capabilities of the nonwhite population were utilized fully, the gross national product could be increased by 2.5 per cent. But these figures are abstract to the individual. What counts is the failed to get a job because of his race even though he was fully qualified. If so, he turns to government for help, and government is then forced to respond. What is being done to improve employment opportunities for minority groups?

Federal Action

Government employment without racial or religious discrimination is the policy of the United States, based on the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments. The drive to eliminate prejudice in hiring federal employees has been stepped up in recent years, but the eventual goal, and legal requirement, has long been clear: government employment will be based on qualification, without regard to color or religion.

From the passage of the Civil Service Act of 1883, with its principle of merit employment and a subsequent regulation outlawing religious discrimination, to the 1940 civil service rule prohibiting racial discrimination, up to today's President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity, the federal government has sought, with variable emphasis, to make fair employment a reality as well as a principle.

Private employment, however, is another matter. During World War II a federal fair employment practices commission was established. The commission lacked power to enforce its decisions and had jurisdiction only over employment by government contractors and federal government agencies. A Presidential Executive Order, issued in March, 1961, stipulates that every private contractor or subcontractor doing business with the federal government must sign a contract with an antidiscrimination clause. Except in this area of federal contracts, action on job discrimination by private employers has been left to states and municipalities. The former can act under their police powers, and the latter where power has been delegated to them by the respective states.

State Action

Twenty-five states and the Virgin Islands have passed fair employment (FEP) laws. Twenty of these provide for enforcement by administrative agencies and, while concerned mainly with private employment, also strengthen bans on discrimination in public employment. The 20 with administrative agencies are Alaska, California, Colorado, Connecticut, Delaware, Illinois, Kansas, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, New Jersey, New Mexico, New York, Ohio, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Washington, and Wisconsin.

Nebraska bans defense work employment bias; Arizona bars discrimination in public employment and by employers doing state contract work. Indiana and Nevada declare job discrimination to be against public policy and authorize a commission to investigate complaints. Idaho and the Virgin Islands rely on court action for enforcement of employment discrimination.

Municipal Action

Local FEP Laws. Approximately 40 municipalities have enacted local ordinances outlawing discrimination in employment. Most cities with FEP laws are in states which also have FEP statutes, but some cities preceded their states in such action. Des Moines and Sioux City, Iowa, and Baltimore, Maryland, for example, have adopted local laws although their states as yet have no FEP legislation. A sampling of cities which have taken action on fair employment shows the variety of approaches used.

1. City Employment. The Lansing, Michigan, city council has adopted a municipal code of fair practices requiring city agencies to hire and operate on a racially nondiscriminatory basis. A Des Moines, Iowa, ordinance provides that the city's Commission on Job Discrimination can investigate and hold hearings on possible discrimination in any department of the city government. Violations are reported to the city manager.

The city council of Richmond, Virginia, in 1961 unanimously passed an FEP resolution covering municipal workers. To overcome a legal objection, the resolution was in the form of a recommendation to the city's personnel board. The board was asked to adopt a rule providing for employment and promotion solely on a merit basis, without regard to race, creed, or arbitrary maximum age limits.

2. Contractors for City. Sioux City, Iowa, passed an ordinance in 1951 which applies to municipal employees and to contractors, licensees, and franchise holders of the city. The ordinance, making employment discrimination by such agencies unlawful, is administered by a five-member commission appointed by the mayor and approved by the city council. Maximum punishment for violations is 30 days in jail or a fine of $100.

3. Mediation of Complaints. Cleveland, Ohio, passed a fair employment ordinance in 1950 giving the community relations board the responsibility of receiving complaints and making investigations and recommendations. The board cannot initiate investigations but must wait for individual complaints. Complaints sometimes are referred to union officials, the Ohio Civil Rights Commission, the state bureau of unemployment compensation, the city civil service commission, and the National Labor Relations Board.

4. Investigation and Legal Action. In 1957, Bakersfield, California, adopted an ordinance outlawing discrimination in employment because of race, religion, or place of birth, and created a commission on equal employment opportunity. The ordinance, which applied to "employers, employment agencies, labor organizations and others," provided that if the commission was unable to eliminate any discrimination charged, a majority vote of all members could certify the matter to the city attorney for appropriate legal action. It also provided for procedures whereby any employer, employment agency, or labor union found by a court to have violated the amendment twice within a period of one year would not be eligible to enter into any contract with the city for one year. (See below, "Relation of Local and State Laws.")

The city council of Des Moines, Iowa, adopted an ordinance in 1956 creating a commission on job discrimination, consisting of five members appointed by the city council. The ordinance outlaws discrimination by employers, labor unions, and employment agencies and authorizes the Commission to investigate and hold public hearings on charges of employment bias. If respondents fail to comply with any recommendations, the commission must certify the case to the city solicitor for action. Conviction for violation of the antidiscrimination laws carries a maximum penalty of 30 days imprisonment or a fine of $100. The ordinance also states that the commission may, on its own initiative, investigate and hold hearings on possible discrimination in any department of the city government. Any violations then must be reported to the city manager for appropriate action.

In a 1955 ordinance Pittsburgh strengthened an earlier FEP ordinance and provided for a 15-member commission on human relations appointed by the mayor, who also was authorized to appoint an executive director. It authorizes the commission to initiate or receive and investigate complaints charging unlawful employment practices by city or private employers and to certify any violations to the city solicitor for action.

5. Subpoena Power. Baltimore in 1960 strengthened its 1956 law barring discrimination in private employment by giving the administering agency, the Baltimore Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, subpoena power. If respondents refuse cease and desist orders, the Commission can certify the matter to the city law department, which is required to seek court aid to secure compliance.

Relation of Local and State Laws. The Bakersfield FEP ordinance and a similar one applying to private as well as public agencies passed by San Francisco were forerunners of a state law which became effective September 18, 1959. The California FEP law explicitly provided that local FEP agencies would cease to exist one year from the effective date of the state legislation. On the other hand, some states — Minnesota and Pennsylvania, for example — allow their municipal FEP groups to operate autonomously in cooperation with the state commission and have set up a procedure for referrals from city to state agencies.

Developing FEP Legislation. Cities contemplating FEP laws should study the various approaches in detail. Careful review of existing laws is helpful. Local situations vary.

All of the approaches demonstrate a concern with the importance of the problem to the families affected and to their communities. However, the appointment of a study group or a committee has no lasting effect unless there is vigorous follow-up; nor does even legislation with legal sanctions and a professional staff necessarily mean a city is meeting all its commitments. Jack Greenberg, in Race Relations and American Law pointed out, "Activity and effectiveness are not determined merely by budget, but to a great extent reflect the attitude of the guiding personnel."

Administering the Law

A number of cities demonstrate ways in which FEP legislation can be administered, interpreted or supplemented.

1. Recruitment Advertizing. The Erie (Pennsylvania) Community Relations Commission, for example, has endorsed a resolution interpreting the city's FEP ordinance as barring advertisements for "situations wanted" from including reference to race or religion.

2. Government Employment. In August, 1961, the Los Angeles County Board of Supervisors unanimously voted to conduct a survey of the more than 40,000 county workers to determine the employment pattern of "persons of Oriental, Negro and Mexican American antecedents." The study was carried out under direction of a committee of county officials, including the executive secretary of the Human Relations Committee of Los Angeles. The state FEP commission considered it "probably the most intensive and exhaustive study of its kind ever made by a public agency of its own personnel anywhere in the United States" and said it "may serve as a model for similar self-surveys in other cities and counties, and perhaps in large private enterprises as well..."

The Los Angeles committee made two reports to the county board of supervisors. The first covered 16 departments in which the committee believed statistics indicated the possibility of discrimination. As a result the supervisors instructed department heads to review their selection, utilization, and promotion of minority group employees and to eliminate any elements of discrimination. The second report covered departments which seemed to have a scarcity of minority group employees at professional levels. Subsequently, the civil service commission and the board of supervisors instructed departments to review their examining procedures and the use of the "appraisal of promotability" form. A follow-up survey to determine if corrective action has been taken is scheduled for April, 1963.

In December, 1961, the Los Angeles Fire Commission adopted a policy statement strengthening nondiscrimination in the fire department. The action requires that all hiring, assignments, and promotions be on a merit basis. It also provides for an education program to be conducted in cooperation with the University of California in Los Angeles to improve "harmonious relations among personnel in the department." Since 1955 the city civil service commission of Los Angeles has required all applicants for municipal employment to pledge they will "willingly work with or for any associates regardless of race, color or creed."

3. City and Industry Cooperation. The Philadelphia Commission on Human Relations conducted an investigation into charges of discriminatory employment policies in the hotel and restaurant business and found that such discrimination did exist. As a result, in 1960, the Greater Philadelphia Restaurant Operators Association agreed to hiring practices conforming to the city's FEP law, which dates back to 1948. A similar agreement was reached with the waiter's and waitresses' union local. Philadelphia now couples its industry-wide investigating technique with a plant inspection program, which it conducted in 1961 at the rate of several per week. The Philadelphia Chamber of Commerce recently appointed a five-man advisory committee to work with the Commission on programs to promote support for merit hiring practices.

4. Job Advancement Programs. New York City Mayor Robert Wagner touched on another phase of employment when he said last year:

> The effort to assure full employment opportunity for all our citizens does not and cannot end with laws prohibiting discrimination and creating governmental agencies to enforce these prohibitions. Steps must be taken affirmatively to recruit and promote members of minority groups into positions of executive, professional, administrative and skilled responsibility.

The statement came with appointment of the Mayor's Committee on Job Advancement to help open to Negroes and Puerto Ricans thousands of higher level private and city jobs. The New York committee will attempt to persuade labor unions to end discrimination in membership and apprentice training, analyze annual reports from participating employers, and conduct programs to encourage school children from minority groups to develop the skills necessary for higher paying jobs.

Housing

Housing for minority groups has become one of the most urgent problems facing many cities today. Officials have watched with concern as waves of newcomers, many from rural areas and often Negro, have crowded into central cities, creating or expanding slums because too often these are all that are available. At the same time they have watched old, established families move to the suburbs, taking their tax dollars with them.

Some of these cities experienced an earlier, immigrant influx from other countries. But it was easier for those inimigrants, who were mainly white, to fade in time into the city background. As minorities, attracted by the promise of better jobs and a freer life, have moved into the cities, they have been crowded into isolated areas across the land, either because this is all they can find at the price they can initially afford, or because discrimination bars them from better housing.

Cities know how overcrowding, substandard housing, and discrimination have added to the problems of welfare, school, health, and police departments and have begun working on better housing for both humane and economic reasons. Probably no community in the United States with a large Negro population has solved its housing problem, but some are trying.

Lack of a comprehensive national policy has hampered cities, since the federal government plays such a dominant role in housing, with its financing, mortgage guarantees, and public housing assistance programs. However, the federal government now has taken steps to bar bias in the sale or rental of some federally aided housing. In November, 1962, the President signed an executive order which requires an "open occupancy" policy ~~by developers~~ using FHA or VA ~~guaranteed loans~~ and in public housing and urban renewal projects. in private development

Private Housing

Until the past few years, almost all legislation prohibiting discrimination in housing applied only to public housing. However, cities in over 20 per cent of the states now are governed by state laws which prohibit racial and religious discrimination in some part of the private housing market. Eleven states, three cities, and the Virgin Islands have passed such housing statutes.

The nation's first fair housing statute applying to private residences became law in New York City on December 31, 1957. Pittsburgh adopted a private housing ordinance the next year. Toledo, Ohio, followed in 1961, but was stalled by a court injunction shortly after the effective date of its housing law.

In 1959, Colorado enacted a law banning discrimination in transactions involving all dwellings except owner-occupied units. The act, applying to public and private housing and both rentals and sales, also bars inquiries and advertisements relating to the race, sex, creed, or ancestry of prospective tenants or buyers. In April, 1962, Alaska adopted legislation banning discrimination in the entire housing field. Minnesota's fair housing legislation went into effect December 31, 1962.

The eight other states with fair housing legislation are Pennsylvania, New York, New Hampshire, New Jersey, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Oregon, and California. All these laws, except those of California, Alaska, and New Hampshire, are enforced by administrative agencies.

There is wide variation in the various fair housing laws. New York City, for example, bars discrimination in all housing for rent or sale except the rental of an apartment in an owner-occupied duplex. It has been estimated that the New York law covers over 95 per cent of the total housing market in the city. On the other hand, California and Oregon do not cover private housing as such but affect the market by prohibiting discriminatory actions by realtors. The Connecticut Public Accommodations Act prohibits discrimination in housing by anyone controlling three or more contiguous units. New Hampshire outlaws discrimination "in the matter of rental or occupancy of a dwelling in a building containing more than one dwelling."

The National Committee Against Discrimination in Housing (NCDH) recently found that even though the various laws have been in effect only a short time, slow but steady progress already has been made in opening formerly restricted residential areas to minority groups. Laws of course must be backed up by administrative action. In the field of housing progress can be made without laws, as in the case of Park Forest and Medford (see the section below on "Cooperative Action for Improved Housing).

Public Housing

There is segregation in most public housing in the United States; 80 per cent of public housing projects remain segregated. This is due in part to the fact that in some areas more Negroes than whites qualify for admission to subsidized, low-rent public housing because of lower incomes. Negroes, who make up about 10 per cent of the population, occupy 47 per cent of the public housing units. This, plus a concentration of Negroes in central cities, often adds up to such a large demand for available public housing that an all-Negro project results. Some local housing authorities with desegregation programs simply have not been able to achieve a racial balance. However, some segregation does and can exist in some local housing projects by design. There also are cities with an appreciable Negro population where public housing projects nevertheless remain all-white.

A measure of the widespread realization of the existence of discrimination in housing is the fact that 444 localities with public housing programs have adopted policies of nondiscrimination. This represents 36.2 per cent of the cities with low-rent public housing programs. City housing authorities or commissions which have passed resolutions against discrimination in public housing include Phoenix, Arizona; Fresno and Richmond, California; Omaha, Nebraska; Superior, Wisconsin; Hazel Park and Mount Clemens, Michigan; Toledo, Ohio; and Washington, D.C.

Housing action often has followed a period of community preparation and discussion. In Peoria, Illinois, for example, the council on human relations worked with city officials for several years. As a result, Peoria now has an explicit policy of nonsegregation in all public housing in the community. Saginaw, Michigan, has a similar policy.

City action sometimes has preceded state action. Hartford, Connecticut, in January, 1949, passed a resolution prohibiting discrimination or segregation in any public housing or municipally assisted private housing development within the city. Included in the resolution was a recommendation that similar action be taken on a state-wide basis by the general assembly. Six months later the Connecticut legislature prohibited discrimination in public housing projects, and four years later the legislature extended the prohibition to all publicly assisted housing.

Urban Renewal

The city council or redevelopment agency of such cities as Sacramento and Oakland, California, and Inkster, Michigan, have passed resolutions of antidiscrimination in urban redevelopment projects. Other cities have enacted ordinances barring discrimination in redevelopment projects, including Los Angeles and Cincinnati, Hamilton and Dayton, Ohio. Des Moines, Iowa, bars discrimination in the sale or use of land for urban renewal.

The entire matter of "urban renewal" has claimed increasing attention since the program, with its emphasis on slum clearance and rebuilding, was initiated in the 1949 Housing Act of the federal government. The Housing Act of 1954 broadened the concept into a huge federal-local cooperative venture which involves a master city plan, rehousing of displaced families, housing codes, and financing. The federal government has ruled that private housing developers in federally aided urban renewal projects must comply with state and local antidiscrimination laws.

In 1960 the Housing and Home Finance Agency administrator announced that a community-wide representative citizens' advisory committee was a prerequisite for approval of a city's renewal program. This has been both a challenge and opportunity for communities with such programs to enlist the aid and support of minority groups.

A glance at just one state, Michigan, which is not necessarily typical, shows that at least seven of the 16 urban renewal communities in existence last year had citizens' advisory committees with substantial minority representation: Detroit, Jackson, Kalamazoo, Mount Clemens, Pontiac, Saginaw, and Inkster.

"To have minority groups represented on zoning boards, as well as on planning commissions, is an important step in assuring the protection of minority group rights in urban growth and development," the Michigan State Advisory Committee to the Commission on Civil Rights said in its 1961 report. "In only one of the 12 urban renewal communities under consideration (in Michigan) is there a minority group member on the zoning board of appeals. The village of Inkster, where the principal minority is Negro, has two minority representatives on a board of seven."

Relocation of families belonging to minority groups is one of the most difficult problems of urban renewal. The private housing market is often closed to certain groups; this requires some type of government action. (For a factual report on the issues and status of relocation in housing during the late 1950's, see Harry W. Reynolds, Jr., "What Do We Know About our Experiences With Relocation," Journal of Intergroup Relations, Autumn, 1961, pp. 342-54.) Hartford, Connecticut, has experimented with semiprivate housing by enlisting the cooperation of the FHA, the city of Hartford, private lending companies, and construction and management firms. The city leased a two-acre tract for 50 years without fee to a nonprofit corporation, Hartford Homes, Inc., sponsored by the Greater Hartford Chamber of Commerce. Private lending institutions for the 40-unit "Twin Acres" pilot project provided the financing and FHA backed the mortgage. The city government assumed no financial burden but receives taxes; on full payment of the mortgage, land and buildings will revert to the city.

Twin Acres, operated as a relocation project, is nondiscriminatory. Since 1959, 22 white families have lived with 18 Negro families without incident. The director of the Hartford Department of Housing has said of the project, "The acumen of private business and management laws have been harnessed for a social purpose, with the city represented via its departments, to assure the accommodation of those persons for whom the housing is intended and, when necessary, to assist families in their adjustment to a new environment."

In recent years, the city of Windsor, Ontario, has constructed several rental housing projects of single-family dwellings, duplexes, row houses, and a high rise apartment. There is no segregation, and the city manager has commented that persons of all races and creeds live in harmony.

Cooperative Action for Improved Housing

Citizen Groups. Various voluntary groups representing churches, business and civic organizations have been formed in a number of localities to broaden – often in cooperation with city officials – the number of neighborhoods open to minority groups. Such groups often are involved in areas of housing.

In 1958, the Greater Seattle Housing Council, representing builders, architects, real estate firms, and lenders, joined church, labor, and civic agencies to combat housing discrimination. In 1961, the Council set up an experimental clearing service to help minority group families find housing outside the central city, away from areas of racial concentration.

The Brookline, Massachusetts, Fair Housing Committee's Good Neighbor pledge drive was cited by President Kennedy as "the kind of constructive response to a great problem that this nation needs." Clergymen of the three major faiths gave strong leadership to the drive, which was endorsed by the Brookline Board of Selectmen (city council) and members of the state legislature and which received extensive coverage by newspapers, radio, and television. The drive is being followed up by an effort to persuade signers of the pledge to establish neighborhood organizations for fair housing. Similar campaigns have followed in several other cities in the Boston area. The pledge itself reads:

> To keep Brookline ahead in a progressing nation, we the undersigned join the Good Neighborhood for Fair Housing pledge: (1) We believe that all people regardless of race, religion or national origin should have equal opportunity for housing. (2) When renting or selling the property we own or manage we agree to make it available to anyone without regard to his national origin. (3) We want our neighborhood to welcome all regardless of race, religion or national origin and will encourage our neighbors to join us in achieving an integrated neighborhood.

Still other communities have offered different solutions to certain aspects of the housing question. Shaker Heights, Ohio, passed an ordinance in 1961 prohibiting real estate agents from attempting to stimulate panic selling in changing neighborhoods. Two years earlier, over 200 families in Shaker Heights, a suburb of Cleveland, had organized to protect their integrated neighborhood and create a workable plan for democratic living among Negro and white families in the suburbs.

Gainesville, Georgia, sought an answer to its Negro housing problem within the segregation framework of the Deep South. The Negro community has been hemmed in by industrial and white residential areas in the city. The city commissioners appointed a committee to study how the space available for Negro housing might be expanded. As a result, a new high school for Negroes was planned for an open area and private enterprise encouraged to develop a subdivision in the area. The committee developed into a community-wide improvement group considering the broader question of urban renewal.

The city commission of Kalamazoo, Michigan, in 1955, declared its opposition to segregation in housing. Later, at the instigation of the Council on Community Relations, more than 1,000 Kalamazoo citizens signed a newspaper advertisement which endorsed the right of all Americans to buy or rent a home in the neighborhood of their choice. "These positive actions by official agencies and citizens in Kalamazoo have resulted in greater freedom for nonwhites to move out of segregated areas," the Michigan Advisory Committee to the Commission on Civil Rights commented. The Kalamazoo city manager, commenting on the interrelationship of minority housing and development of the community as a whole, said "the problems of all persons and all groups in the city are mutual [illegible] unsolved problems of a social and economic nature retard the growth and advancement of the entire city."

Real Estate Agents. The California Advisory Committee to the Commission on Civil Rights found that the "presence of Negro realty board members . . . has led to fruitful discussion concerning the role of realtors in dealing with problems connected with minority housing" in San Francisco and Sacramento.

The U. S. Commission on Civil Rights, said in its 1961 report on housing:

> The real estate broker is a key man in the majority of housing transactions. He finds buyers for housing and housing for buyers and he has detailed knowledge (or access to it) of the location of homes of various styles and prices. His policies and practices are among the foremost influences that determine where the various racial or religious groups will live. . . .
> Certain states and municipalities have enacted legislation prohibiting discriminatory practices in varying degrees on the part of this unique group. Others have reached the same result through attorney general opinions and administrative regulations. State authority to license and regulate real estate brokers is also a formidable weapon and has been utilized in at least three states for purposes of insuring equal housing opportunity.
>

Pattern For Action

Whatever method is used to achieve open occupancy, the National Committee Against Discrimination In Housing said in a 1961 report that experience had provided three guideposts for success: (1) A firm, clearly stated policy; (2) An early start on open occupancy, preferably at the planning stage; and (3) An open housing policy covering the major portion of the housing market, thus placing all buyers and sellers on the same competitive basis.

The report cited examples of the feasibility of integration, "even when initiated under the most adverse circumstances," and mentioned that border cities such as Baltimore, Maryland; Wilmington, Delaware; St. Louis, Missouri; and Louisville, Kentucky, had desegregated long-established segregated projects. It said that open occupancy had proved successful and profitable in high-rent urban renewal housing in such cities as Chicago, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, and others and in numerous suburban developments, including 60 in New York state alone. And, it added: "Housing value seems to override even latent prejudice – no instance is known where the interracial character of a development has caused it to be a business failure."

Public Facilities

The freedom rides, boycotts, and sit-in demonstrations which were aimed initially at discrimination in southern and border states, have now spilled over into the rest of the nation. Frequent demonstrations coast to coast, numerous prosecutions, and headlines are a reminder that much remains to be done to assure equal treatment in public facilities everywhere in the United States. A few examples of action by cities in different parts of the country will highlight problems in this area.

Southern Cities

There have been widespread changes in the South in this field. Well over 100 Southern cities now have at least some desegregated eating facilities. For the most part, these have been opened to Negroes after a series of demonstrations and/or boycotts and subsequent negotiations involving merchants and citizens' committees, the latter often appointed by mayors or other city officials.

In the past few years, scores of public golf courses, parks, and transportation facilities have been desegregated in the South. Initially, these were desegregated by federal court orders. The courts in a series of decisions have stated clearly that segregation in publicly owned facilities, whether operated by the state or private lessee, is unconstitutional. More recently, some Southern cities have opened these operations voluntarily, thus saving themselves costly law suits and boycotts and relieving some of the racial tensions and frictions.

More often than not, the changes in racial patterns have been accepted quietly. A few examples of change have been the opening to Negroes of municipal golf courses in such cities as Mobile, Alabama, and Savannah, Macon, and Atlanta, Georgia; swimming pools in Charlotte, North Carolina; and parks in New Orleans and Little Rock.

In the spring of 1961, the Alexandria, Virginia, city council desegregated playgrounds at already desegregated elementary schools and ordered that some city recreation programs be nondiscriminated. Shortly after, the county board of Arlington County, Virginia, voted to desegregate Arlington's 57 parks and playgrounds and five recreation centers.

In March, 1962, the legal department of Houston, Texas, ruled that all segregation in municipally owned buildings must be abolished. The mayor of Houston noted that public reaction was reasonable and understanding. Houston passed an ordinance in 1954 banning segregation on municipal golf courses.

Another Texas city, San Antonio, adopted an ordinance in 1956 barring segregation in municipally owned public facilities. Last summer, the city council of El Paso, Texas, overrode the mayor's veto to pass an ordinance prohibiting discrimination in hotels, motels, restaurants, or theaters. Greensboro, North Carolina, has an ordinance outlawing segregation in public libraries.

Border Cities

A growing number of border cities have enunciated or strengthened policies of nondiscrimination in public facilities.

The council of Montgomery County, Maryland, in suburban Washington, D.C., has adopted an ordinance forbidding discrimination in public accommodations, as did the Washington suburb of Rockville, Maryland.

St. Louis, in 1961, adopted a fully enforceable ordinance prohibiting discrimination and segregation in places of public accommodation, "including but not limited to public places providing food, shelter, recreation and amusement." Earlier, St. Louis Mayor Raymond R. Tucker had announced:

> The city counselor has informed me that the city government may not use its authority as an arm of the State to enforce a discrimination amongst its citizens which is unlawful within the meaning of the Federal Constitution. If a restaurant operator who otherwise invites all members of the public indiscriminately to his premises for service refuses such service solely on the basis of race, then the city may not enforce this discrimination by the application of its trespass ordinance. To do so would be a violation of the 14th Amendment of the Federal Constitution.

Kansas City, Missouri, amended its city code in 1960 to forbid racial discrimination in hotels, motels, and restaurants. An ordinance provides for establishment of a fair public accommodations committee, to be composed of three members of the city's committee on human relations, appointed by the mayor. The committee, assisted by the staff of the city counselor, must investigate all complaints of discrimination and try to reach an adjustment by conciliation. Failing this, the complaint goes to the city counselor for action; conviction of violation of the provisions of the ordinance is punishable by a fine of from $25 to $200.

Baltimore passed an ordinance in 1961 outlawing discrimination in places of public accommodation. In 1955 the Baltimore Department of Recreation and Parks issued a statement that parks and recreation facilities would be operated on an integrated basis.

Northern Cities

A number of northern cities have passed ordinances or taken executive action to insure equal treatment for all citizens in public accommodations, including hotels, restaurants, hospitals, and recreational facilities. Licensing powers have been a tool for some cities committed to a policy of nondiscrimination.

Recreation Areas. In June, 1960, the city park board of Seattle signed an agreement with the Washington State Board against Discrimination ending racial exclusions on municipal golf courses. The same month, public golf links in New York City and Westchester and Nassau Counties, New York, dropped tournaments of a golf association which barred Negro members. The following year, the East Orange, New Jersey, city council authorized legal action to void the lease of a golf association charged with racial bias in membership selection.

Philadelphia was disturbed by several incidents in 1960 as a result of interracial use of public swimming pools. This prompted the commission on human relations and the department of recreation the following year to conduct a staff training program in human relations for recreation department personnel.

The Denver city council in 1961 approved an ordinance requiring permits for golf tournaments on city courses and forbidding the granting of such permits to groups with discriminatory policies. In 1962 the Chicago Park District notified a yacht club that its lease would be terminated in a year for "refusing membership to qualified applicants solely on the basis of race." Technically, the club was charged with being in default of its agreement with the park district.

Other Public Facilities. Chicago adopted an ordinance in 1956 forbidding discrimination in admittance to or treatment in any government hospital in the city on the basis of race, religion or ancestry. Thirty-nine nongovernmental hospitals in Chicago had, by mid-1962, adopted a pledge sponsored by the city's commission on human relations that they would not discriminate in providing service to patients; 22 others had indicated that they would sign in the near future, and negotiations continued with seven others.

Philadelphia routinely advises all businesses paying a mercantile license tax of the requirements of the city's fair employment practices and public accommodations laws. The welfare commissioner of New York City in 1956 ordered that private nursing homes treating recipients of public assistance must prove they have policies of nondiscrimination or be dropped from the welfare list. A Denver ordinance makes licenses contingent upon conformance with the state's public accommodations law passed in 1895. Commissioners of the District of Columbia announced in 1961 that in future contracts with private hospitals for the care of indigent patients, they will demand a clause forbidding discrimination against Negro physicians to match an existing one forbidding discrimination against hospital employees.

PUBLIC FACILITIES

The Freedom Rides, boycotts, and sit-in demonstrations ~~of recent years, although~~ which aimed initially at discrimination in Southern and border states, have now spilled over into the rest of the nation. ~~Sporadic~~ Frequent demonstrations coast to coast, ~~occasional law suits~~ numerous prosecutions, and headlines are a reminder that much remains to be done to assure equal treatment in public facilities everywhere in the United States

Cognizant of this, a number of border and Northern cities have passed ordinances or taken executive action to insure equal treatment for all citizens in public accommodations of various kinds, including hotels, restaurants, hospitals, and recreational facilities. (at least 28 Northern States have laws prohibiting segregation in recreational facilities.) Licensing powers have been a tool for some cities committed to a policy of non-discrimination.

There have been widespread changes in the South, too, in this field. Well over 100 Southern cities now have ~~a significant number of~~ at least some desegregated eating facilities. For the most part these have been opened to Negroes after ~~a series of~~ demonstrations (and/or boycotts) ~~and subsequent~~ negotiations involving merchants, Negroes, and citizens' committees, the latter often appointed by mayors or other city officials.

? like Atlanta's two or three; BR's 1

In the past few years, scores of public golf courses, park, and transportation facilities have been desegregated in the South. ~~For the most part,~~ The first of these were desegregated by federal court orders. The courts, in a series of decisions, have stated clearly that segregation in public facilities, whether operated by the state or private lessee, is unconstitutional. More recently, some Southern cities have opened these operations voluntarily, thus saving citizens costly law suits and boycotts and relieving some of the racial tensions and frictions. More often than not, the changes report won't appear until 6.3, should check the throughout in racial patterns have been accepted quietly. A few examples of change have been the opening to Negroes of municipal golf courses in such cities as Mobile, Ala., Savannah, Macon, and Atlanta, Ga.; swimming pools in Charlotte, N.C., and St. Petersburg, Fla.; and parks in New Orleans. are St Pete pools open?

In the spring of 1951, the Alexandria, Va., City Council desegregated ~~ordered that~~ playgrounds at already desegregated elementary schools and some city recreation programs ~~be desegregated~~. Shortly after, the County Board of Arlington County, Va., voted to desegregate Arlington's 57 parks and playgrounds and five recreation centers.

In March 1962 ~~of this year~~, the legal department of Houston ~~, Texas,~~ ruled that all segregation ~~policies~~ in municipally owned buildings must be abolished. The mayor of Houston noted that public reaction was reasonable and understanding. Houston had passed an ordinance in 1954 banning segregation on municipal golf courses. Another Texas city, San Antonio, adopted an ordinance in 1956 barring segregation in municipally owned public facilities. This past summer the City Council of El Paso, Texas, overrode the mayor's veto to pass an ordinance prohibiting discrimination in hotels, motels, restaurants, or theaters.

Greensboro, N.C., has an ordinance outlawing segregation in public libraries. This year the city manager of Miami ~~, Fla.,~~ told the city's chief of police that a canteen located in the Municipal Justice Building is on public property, and that its facilities must be available to all.

A growing number of border cities have enunciated or strengthened policies of non-discrimination in public facilities by passage of ordinances.

The council of Montgomery County, Md., in suburban Washington, D.C., has adopted an ordinance forbidding discrimination in public accommodations, as did another Washington suburb, Rockville, Md., early this year.

St. Louis, ~~Mo.,~~ last year adopted a fully enforceable ordinance prohibiting discrimination and segregation in places of public accommodation, "including but not limited to public places providing food, shelter, recreation and amusement." The previous year the six major cafeterias of St. Louis voluntarily agreed to serve Negroes; major downtown hotels ~~previously~~ had been opened EARLIER to Negroes. Shortly after the cafeteria action, the St. Louis chapter of the Missouri Restaurant Association recommended that members serve all groups. During this period, St. Louis Mayor Raymond R. Tucker announced:

"The city counselor has informed me that the city government may not use its authority as an arm of the State to enforce a discrimination amongst its citizens which is unlawful within the meaning of the Federal Constitution. If a restaurant operator who otherwise invites all members of the public indiscriminately to his premises for service refuses such service solely on the basis of race, then the city may not enforce this discrimination by the application of its trespass ordinance. To do so would be a violation of the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution."

Kansas City, Mo., amended its city code in 1960 to forbid racial discrimination in hotels, motels, and restaurants. An ordinance provides for establishment of a Fair Public Accommodations Committee, to be composed of three members of the city's Committee on Human Relations, appointed by the mayor. The committee, assisted by the staff of the city counselor, must investigate all complaints of discrimination and try to reach an adjustment by conciliation. Failing this, the complaint goes to the city counselor for action; conviction of violation of the provisions of the ordinance is punishable by a fine of from $25 to $200.

Baltimore, ~~Md.,~~ passed an ordinance ~~a law~~ this year outlawing discrimination in places of public accommodation; in 1955 the Baltimore Department of Recreation and Parks issued a statement that parks and recreation facilities would be operated on an integrated basis.

East St. Louis, ~~Ill.,~~ adopted a resolution last year to revoke the licenses of businesses which discriminate in service to Negroes.

Wilmington, Del., decided that from this year on no license would be issued to any restaurant owner who refuses to swear he will not discriminate against any customer because of race or religion.

In Maplewood, Mo., a suburb of St. Louis, the city council voted unanimously to open the municipal swimming pool to all after the pool had been closed when 40 Negroes tried to buy admission tickets.

An Oklahoma City, ~~Okla.,~~ ordinance bars racial segregation in municipally owned public facilities.

[redacted]. Other areas [redacted] have felt it neeessary to make it clear that tax-supported recreation facilities are to be operated on an "open" basis.

In June, 1960, the City Park Board of Seattle, ~~Wash.,~~ signed an agreement with the State Board Against Discrimination ending racial exclusions on municipal golf courses. The same month, public golf links in New York City and Westchester ~~County~~ and Nassau ~~County~~ County, N.Y. dropped tournaments of a golf association which barred Negro members. The following year, the East Orange, N.J. City Council authorized legal action to void the lease of a golf association charged with racial bias in membership selection.

Philadelphia was disturbed by several incidents in 1960 as a result of interracial use of public swimming pools. This prompted the Commission on Human Relations and the Department of Recreation the following year to conduct a staff training program in human relations for recreation department personnel.

The Denver, ~~Colo.,~~ City Council in 1961 approved an ordinance requiring permits for golf tournaments on city courses and forbidding the granting of such permits to groups with discriminatory policies.

Recently, the Chicago Park District notified a yacht club its lease would be terminated in a year for "refusing membership to qualified applicants solely on the basis of race." Technically, the club was charged with being in default of its agreement with the park district. Jacob Arvey, Commissioner of Parks, said, "Anyone using the public facilities must make them available to all persons."

Public Facilities

Alburquerque, N.M. adopted an ordinance in 1952 prohibiting discrimination in places of public acoommodation, resort, and amusement because of race, creed or ancestry. SANTA FE LATER FOLLOWED SUIT. ~~A similar law was passed by Baltimore, Md., this year~~.

Other examples of city action regarding places of public accommodation: ~~ordinance~~

Chicago adopted an ordinance in 1956 forbidding discrimination in admittance to or treatment in any government hospital in the city on the basis of race, religion, or ancestry. This year the city council ~~passed an~~ amend~~ment~~ed ~~to~~ the ordinance, ~~which~~ by forbid~~s~~ing city hospitals from to discriminate in the employment or appointment of doctors to the medical staffs. Thirty-nine non-governmental hospitals in Chicago had by mid-year ~~of~~ 1962 adopted a pledge, sponsored by the city's Commission on Human Relations, ~~that they would not~~ against discriminating in ~~providing~~ service to patients; 22 others had indicated they would sign in the near future and negotiations continued with seven others.

Philadelphia routinely advises all businesses paying a mercantile license tax ~~of~~ about the requirements of the city's Fair Employment Practices and Public Accommodations laws.

The Welfare Commissioner of New York City in 1956 ordered that private nursing homes treating recipients of public assistance must prove they have policies of non-discrimination or be dropped from the welfare list.

Is this relevant?

The City Council of Vancouver, British Columbia, adopted a municipal by-law in 1960 prohibiting any trade, business or occupation licensee from discriminating on the groupds of race or religion in the selling of goods or furnishing of services. Violators are subject to fines up to $100 or imprisonment up to two months. TORONTO HAS HAD A FAIR ACCOMMODATIONS PRACTICES ACT SINCE 1954. (The provincial legislatures of Nova Scotia, Ontario, New Brunswick and Manitoba also have passed fair accommodations laws.) Recreation facilities in London, Ontario are open to all.

A Denver, [redacted] ordinance makes licenses contingent upon conformance with the state's Public Accommodations law passed in 1895.

Commissioners of the District of Columbia announced this year that in future contracts with private hospitals for the care of indigent patients they will demand a clause forbidding discrimination against Negro physicians to match an existing one forbidding discrimination against employees.

Human Relations Commissions

In an effort to calm the tensions that grow out of ~~prejudice over~~ racial and ethnic differences and to help ~~solve problems of~~ MINORITY GROUPS in changing and often overcrowded cities, human relations agencies have become ~~an integral~~ a part of many municipal governments.

The city council of Cleveland, Ohio, established the Community Relations Board ~~as a municipal department~~ in 1945. Cleveland thus claims to have the first human relations agency in the United States to be formed by ordinance, although Chicago, Cincinnati, and Detroit, among others, had taken similar action by mayoral decree earlier.

By 1962 more than 40 large cities in the nation had official ~~intergroup departments~~ agencies staffed by professional workers. Others have non-paid, advisory ~~citizen~~ groups, and there are a myriad of private, unofficial race relations organizations.

Illinois alone has at least 15 official municipal human relations commissions, although only the one in Chicago has a professional staff. Activities have been ~~as~~ varied. ~~as the proportion of minority groups in the various cities~~. The Park Forest Commission, for example, cooperated with the Village President, the Board of Trustees, law enforcement officials, and citizens to facilitate the generally peaceful and quiet arrival of the first Negro family ~~in the community~~ there in December, 1959. A year or so ago the youth committee of the Alton Commission on Human Relations, in cooperation with local business men, sponsored a Youth Employment Day. Negro and white high school students took jobs for a day with various business establishments and as an immediate result, several of the students obtained part-time employment. The Commission felt that, in addition, the community as a whole gained a new view of the potential of both white and Negro youth. The Chicago Commission, with a 1962 budget of $311,484, has been able to work on a broad range of problems.

Five Missouri cities have municipal councils on human relations--St. Louis, Kansas City, St. Joseph, Springfield and University City.

Among the varied activities of the Mayor's Commission on Group Relations of Newark, N.J., has been the provision of scholarship aid for qualified residents ~~of the city~~ to attend summer workshops in human relations and community leadership. This year's workshop, in the Graduate School of Education at Rutgers University, was for teachers, with special emphasis on ~~problems of~~ pupils with low aspirations ~~levels.~~ The Commission also awards scholarships for the annual Brotherhood Youth Institute sponsored by the National Conference of Christians and Jews. The Commission has sponsored a Code of Fair Campaign Practices, which pledges political candidates, ~~among other things,~~ to condemn any appeal to prejudice based on race or creed; this year 41 of 52 municipal candidates signed the pledge.

The Board of Community Relations of Buffalo, N.Y., appointed by the mayor, was ~~created~~ established by a 1945 ordinance "to promote amicable relations among racial, religious and cultural groups."

The Village President and Board of Trustees of Deerfield, Ill., passed an ordinance last year setting up a Community Relations and Communications Committee of five members to serve in an advisory and public information capacity. Deerfield has been involved in a series of suits growing out of a builder's attempt to sell houses to Negroes.

update to include recent court decision on this suit?

Toledo, Ohio, has a Board of Community Relations created by the City Council in 1946, primarily as an agency for information and education purposes. The mayor is legally authorized ~~by law~~ to appoint 20 persons nominated by business, labor, and religious groups as ~~and, in addition, to nominate and appoint~~ well as five public members of his own choosing. The Board has an executive secretary, an assistant and clerical staff. For five years the Board, ~~in cooperation~~ together with the University of Toledo and the local Federation of Teachers, sponsored a two-week ~~intergroup relations~~ workshop for civic leaders and teachers. This was followed by a ~~pilot~~ demonstration project at one of the elementary schools, ~~which involved~~ with intensive study of intergroup relations ~~problems~~ by the ~~entire~~ faculty. Cognizant of "the fact that the home and community at large are the learning areas in which youngsters pick up discriminatory practices", the Board has sponsored, with the presidents of Catholic, Jewish, and Protestant women's groups, a series of annual Women's Institutes on Human Relations, ~~These institutes,~~ with an average attendance of 550, ~~have dealt with such topics as~~ prejudice in speech, the [redacted] high cost of discrimination, fair employment, Spanish speaking neighbors, housing, and how to deal with problems and controversies in intergroup relations. In addition, the Board sponsors a Program Planners Institute every other year to explain the group's work to representatives of civic groups.

Until about two years ago, few of the major public accommodations of Las Vegas, Nev., were open to Negro customers. Then, after a campaign by a Negro organization and attendant publicity, an informal agreement was worked out whereby most of the luxury establishments agreed to serve Negroes in their dining rooms, motels and gaming tables, but there were still ~~some~~ complaints of bias. In 1960 the Clark County Commission and Las Vegas city commissioners created the Southern Nevada Human Rights Commission, composed of representatives of a number of organizations, to hear complaints and investigate charges of discrimination.

Wichita became the first city in Kansas to staff its Human Relations Commission with a paid, full time professional intergroup relations worker, hired ~~this year.~~ in 1960

4-Human Relations Commission

The Commission on Human Relations in Philadelphia was established by provisions of the Home Rule Charter in 1951; the following year it assumed the powers and duties of the Fair Employment Practice Commission established in 1948. With a staff of 21 professional and 12 clerical employees, the Commission has been able to initiate a variety of programs, to improve intergroup relations in the city. It has developed a special training program in human relations for personnel in official agencies and for volunteers in community groups. Last year the Commission held a seminar for executives of press, radio and television and intergroup relations agencies to discuss the handling of news, of intergroup significance. As a result, a set of guidelines in the handling of such news was adopted, for voluntary use by news media and agencies. Also last year the Commission began a Leadership Development and Participation Program to help prepare young minority group citizens for service on various boards and committees.

~~Assignment of the Cleveland Community Relations Board in the Department of Migration to aid the fun major movement groups in the city~~

Sometimes the entry of the first family of a "different" race in a city can send officials and citizens into action as surely as a great influx of newcomers. Such was the case cited in Park Forest, Ill.; and a similar situation arose in Medford, Ore. The latter is in a section of southwestern Oregon where several cities have had an unwritten law which excludes Negroes from residence. The State Advisory Committee to the Commission on Civil Rights reported in 1961 how a human rights group, in cooperation with other agencies, aided in reaching a satisfactory solution when the first Negro family came to Medford. The story began when the U.S. Weather Bureau transferred a Negro family to its Medford station. The employee asked the aid of his superior in finding housing, and they first tried a college town 15 miles away but were rebuffed by real estate agents, Then, the Advisory Committee reported:

"Returning to Medford, they got in touch with a newly formed human rights council in the city which found housing for them, although without employment of real estate agencies. The expected opposition movement developed with derogatory rumors, a circulated petition, and 'semi-violent' reactions from two or three families, and hostile reactions from another three or four families. Those opposed made the most noise. But with the support of the ministerial association, the local newspaper, and the police, the human rights council was able to hold the line. The chief of police, incidentally, is a member of the board of the human rights council.

"Thus, the first Negro family resides peacefully in the city, and the 'policy of exclusion' is breached. The human rights council has grown markedly in membership and prestige as a result of this incident, and its members expressx amazement at the widespread support they received...

"The incident shows that even where a firm tradition of exclusion had prevailed for a century, there was a preponderance of people who were willing to support the right of the Negro. The case was basically community action. The law gave them backing, but was not invoked..."

6- HUMAN RELATIONS COMMISSIONS-

The Southern counterparts to the professional human relations departments of the North and West and the permanent advisory councils are the official, but for the most part temporary, mediating committees. ~~At least~~ Some 30 cities in the South now have, or have had in the past few years, such committees. They have been formed most often to mediate controversies growing out of sit-in demonstrations and boycotts. The most common have been the bi-racial committees sppointed by city officials to deal with specific problems. In addition, a number of Southern cities have long-standing, unofficial and private race relations councils.

Louisville

POLICE

"The key toward gaining community respect is to treat all individuals the same--with fairness, impartiality, honesty, courtesy and firmness."

This advice to policemen given in Guide to Community Relations for Peace Officers published by the office of the California Attorney General, is a summary of a point a growing number of police departments have been emphasizing in recent years.

Presumably, it always has been the goal of good police departments but the need to make it a firm practice never has been more urgent. With urban areas becoming ever more crowded, with changes in the racial composition of cities and neighborhoods, with aroused Negro citizens pressing with greater vigor for legal equality, and with the court-ordered desegregation of a lengthening list of facilities, tensions mount. If left unchecked, widespread disorder, mob action and violence may result--and often has, where police departments and city officials have been ill-prepared or unwilling to act. In fact, there now have been so many instances of effective and ineffective police action, that any city can learn by example what to do or not to do to cope with potentially explosive situations stemming from racial problems. Today, any police department in a city with a sizeable minority group is indeed shortsighted if it is without a firm and fair policy aimed at preventing such disorder or controlling it where prevention fails. A detailed examination of all phases of police action in this field is impossible here (a short bibliography on the subject is appended) but a brief consideration of what some cities have done is indicative of the widespread concern with the problem.

To begin with, every good ~~modern~~ police department emphasizes ~~is is~~ the duty of officers to enforce laws impartially, not to punish. As Chief of Police J.E. Curry of Dallas, Texas, has said, "Only so long as we enforce the law equally and equitably will we have the respect and support of the people." And, the support of citizens is vital ~~in~~ to a profession which is hazardous at best--the FBI reported 48 policemen were killed in the line of duty in 1960 and 9,621 assaulted. A reputation for impartial enforcement of the law is particularly effective in deterring troublemakers of either the majority or minority group.

Most law officials ~~concerned with minority problems~~ agree on the importance of recognizing alarm signals ~~indicative~~ of impending racial trouble, such as: the appearance of threatening or derogatory signs in public places and the circulation of "hate" publications; an increasing number of rumors, growing in sensation; greater activity by known agitators; more threats or incidents of violence; an increase in charges of police brutality and a growing distrust of law enforcement; and gang fights by juveniles.

"The record of every riot that has occurred thus far shows that they were signalled by a succession of incidents of antagonism between conflicting groups," the Guide to Community Relations for Peace Officers says.

One of the worst race riots in ~~the country's~~ U.S. history ~~took place~~ convulsed Chicago in 1919; it lasted 13 days and left 38 dead and 520 injured. In this instance, and in Detroit's riot in 1943 and New York City's the same year, inflammatory rumors were widespread.

The consensus of police institutes also suggests the need for: an intelligence system which keeps the police department in touch with groups for and against segregation, an awareness of potentially troublesome situations; and cooperation with other community agencies and ~~with~~ public information media.

Many ~~of the~~ larger cities, ~~particularly,~~ have ~~police~~ manuals which ~~include~~ suggest~~ed~~ procedures for controlling mobs, should they form despite precautions. These deal with the means ~~technicalities~~ of quelling riots, such as ~~ranging from~~ the need ~~of~~ for a quick show of force (actual use of force may not be necessary), ~~and~~ separating the ringleaders, and ~~to~~ the use of megaphones, police cordons, and weapons.

Berl Bernhard, staff director of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, has said, "Where we find mob violence, we almost inevitably find compliant police; the mob can hardly form, much less injure its victims, without the tacit or passive consent of the police."

Institutes

Since ~~the~~ increased migrations ~~which~~ have changed the racial and ethnic compositions of so many cities in the past 20 years, police departments in a majority of ~~the~~ urban areas have conducted or taken part in training programs in ~~human and~~ race relations. In addition, small and medium-sized communities have also seen the need for ~~this~~ such special training, and ~~as a result~~ police-community relations courses and training institutes for law officers have spread across the country, ~~to meet this need~~. The Southern Police Institute was ~~sent up~~ established at the University of Louisville in 1950 and a ~~substantial portion~~ much of its 17-week program is devoted to human relations. Since 1955 a national Institute on Police-Community Relations has been held at the School of Police Administration at Michigan State University, with the cooperation of the International Association of Chiefs of Police, the National Sheriffs Association, and the National Conference of Christians and Jews. Regional institutes supplement these programs.

South

The riots ~~mentioned~~ in the North have served as danger signals THERE, but southern cities have been able to find warnings and examples in their own region in the past few years. Atlanta was one which took advantage of these. The city faced ~~two critical periods, one during a long, student-led effort to desegregate cafe store lunch counters and~~ a critical period in late 1961 after the Atlanta high another when the first Negroes entered white high schools in the fall of 1961. The city itself was better prepared for changes in racial customs than most southern communities due to various active citizens organizations pledged to law and order and acceptance of court rulings. However, there also were active and highly vocal segregationists and an influx of outside racists and agitators, ~~just as determined on the other side.~~ The mayor and police chief tipped the scales in favor of law and order and kept the city relatively free of violence both during the student campaign and the desegregation of schools. William Hartsfield, then mayor of Atlanta, and Police Chief Herbert Jenkins, ~~previously~~ had sent policemen ~~men from the police force~~ "to Little Rock and New Orleans studying what they did wrong," and held police seminars on riot control. Police maintained files on all race agitators. The superintendent of schools began preparing students the previous spring by holding meetings stressing the students' responsibility to maintain order when schools were desegregated. With the opening of school in the fall, police kept a 24-hour watch on the schools affected, and the grounds and immediate vicinities were off-limits to spectators. The press was kept fully informed and an information center was set up in city hall. The long preparation, the show of force by the police, and their emphasis on firm and impartial control paid off.

Employment of Negro officers is another key subject, ~~which inevitably comes up in any discussion of police and race.~~ A report ~~of such employment in the South,~~ made last ~~this~~ year by the Southern Regional Council (The Unequal Badge, by Elliott M. Rudwick) showed:

The employment of Negro police, which increased after World War II, has gained little ~~ground~~ in the South since 1954. At that time, there were 536 uniformed police in 146 cities in the 11 Southern states, plus Oklahoma and Kentucky, and in 1959 the same cities had 646, a small increase considering the growth of the Negro population in urban centers. Ninety-eight of the same cities responded to a questionnaire last year; these communities had employed 538 uniformed policemen in 1959 and 560 in late 1961.

"In the South (as well as other parts of the country), there are not many Negro law enforcement officers who have reached a rank of sergeant or above," the report ~~said~~ pointed out, adding that this is partially due to the short period of time Negroes have been employed in substantial numbers. However, Daytona Beach, Fla.; Louisville, Ky.; Atlanta; and Durham, N.C., all have Negro lieutenants.

In the ~~area~~ cities surveyed, over 83 percent indicated that Negro officers operate exclusively in Negro districts and in over one-half the cities the Negro officer ~~must~~ may not arrest white citizens for any crime, but must "hold" them until a white officer arrives. Pensacola, Fla., has ~~been~~ one of the few Southern police departments that ~~has~~ does not restricted Negro officers in assignments or arrest powers; the Atlanta police chief announced a similar lifting of restrictions ~~this~~ last year.

"As long as the Negro policeman lacks the authority to arrest all violators regardless of race, he symbolizes second-class officership," the survey ~~says.~~ declared.

As to the results of hiring Negro policeman, the report said that an earlier SRC survey, in 1953, found "almost universal satisfaction...

among police officials." The police chief of Louisville, Ky., ~~said~~, "Negro policemen have been of great value in combating any accusation of discrimination or mistreatment of the oolored people by white officers." The police chief of Miami, Fla., commented in 1951, "In the seven years since the first of our Negro officers was sworn in, crimes of violence in our Negro communities have been reduced by about 50 percent."

Coordination

There has been a growing tendency for police departments to work with other city agencies on the special problems growing out of depressed economic and minority group status.

An article in Fortune magazine (The City and the Negro, Charles E. Silberman, March, 1962) cited Oakland ~~said that "As often as not, the Negro--or the white slum dweller, for that matter--sees the bewildering array of police, school, and welfare agencies as enemies to be played off one against another." As an example of the coordination of such agencies, the article added~~:

"Wayne Thompson, the young city manager of Oakland, Calif., has pulled together seven public agencies representing four levels of government into something called the Associated Agencies. Fortnightly meetings of the A.A. workers in each section of the city are held to coordinate their work. In dealing with one school marked by frequent violence, for example, the school superintendent allowed the police to seal off the school area and then clean out the guns and knives in the school lockers. The school, police, recreation, probation, and welfare workers then culled a list of troublemakers, letting each agency take responsibility for the children it already knew, or upon whom it had some particular claim. Out of 2,800 pupils, only 54 turned out to be real troublemakers; when the whole job had been finished, only two had to be moved out of school into detention. Since the Associated Agencies program started in late 1957, Oakland has been relatively free of trouble."

A veteran Negro police executive in Philadelphia, with the rank of chief inspector, ~~this year~~ was assigned command of the police department's new community relations program, last year ~~established on the recommendation of the mayor.~~ He and his staff, which includes 22 human relations officers, will serve as liaison between the police commissioner and the Commission on Human Relations, the Crime Prevention Association and related agencies.

~~Four years ago~~ In 1958 the mayor of Philadelphia also appointed the first members of the city's Police Advisory Board, a non-partisan body composed of leading citizens, including a Nobel prize winner. The board hears complaints against policemen of such grievances as undue use of force or brutality, discrimination, or violation of constitutional rights. It has settled more than two-thirds of 300 ~~grievances~~ complaints without formal hearings, by explaining the legality of the policeman's act or getting an apology for the complainant. Martin S. Barol, lawyer and executive director of the board, ~~said~~ [redacted] says that the the board has acted as a "safety valve in the community. No longer is it neeessary for a citizen who feels himself wronged by police action to harbor resentment within himself, or to spread his hostile feelings throughout the community." Barol ~~added~~ [redacted] says the board has not "demoralized the police force," contrary to the prediction of the Fraternal Order of Police which has opposed such boards. Civilian boards similar to Philadelphia's have been set up in Los Angeles, Minneapolis and York, ~~Penn.~~ Pa.

The need for a different kind of coordination was pointed up in Negaunee, Mich., which was faced with a situation last year which could confront other smaller cities. At that time there were approximately 5,000 troops, a high percentage of them Negro, at nearby Sawyer Air Force Base, which had been reactivated four years earlier. Negaunee is an Upper Peninsula mining town of about 6,000; recreational facilities in the area are limited and transportation to the nearest large cities inadequate for the troops. One Saturday night in September, 1961, violence broke out between some of the airmen and Negaunee civilians, and while the commander of the base and the city manager felt early reports of the trouble were exaggerated, nevertheless the incident demanded precautions to forestall any future outbreak.

On the night in question, there were a few minor skirmishes and some taunts and name calling, in the town early in the evening. Then at 9:15 p.m. a Negro airman was found beaten in a municipal parking lot; a rumor spread quickly that he had been whipped with a chain. As word of the incident spread, more Air Force personnel--estimates ranged up to 100--began coming into Negaunee and soon a series of fights broke out in the downtown section. The police chief was out of town on vacation and there were only two policemen, plus a desk man, on duty. The senior policeman in town then, a lieutenant, was called and some time later he called City Manager Leonard J. Harris, who then took charge. Harris said he telephoned the base for air police assistance but was told by a sergeant on duty that the provost marshal "could not be bothered." The colonel in charge of the base said later police also had phoned him that night and asked for help and that he referred them to the state police. The city manager deputized 18 local firemen and sent a call for help to the sheriff's office and State Police. Within a short time, four state troopers and four deputies arrived. By 3 a.m. the disorder was under control. Subsequently, two Negro airmen and two white citizens of Negaunee were sentenced to 90 days in jail ~~on~~ for disorderly conduct ~~charges~~ and a high school youth was placed on probation for a year. A report issued by the base commander and the city manager said rumors the airman had been beaten by a chain were unfounded. Of the disorder, City Manager Harris says, "There were a number of contributing factors responsible for this outbreak, some of which were due entirely to lack of foresight on the part of the Air Force and some of the agitation came directly from some undesirable elements in the City of Negaunee...I personally feel that if on the night of this occurrence had the Police Department immediately jailed both the colored and the whites who were involved and cleared the streets as I did when I was called, it would have ended much sooner than it did." In the days following, several changes were made in the police department and the City Council agreed to recommendations by the city manager, including: strict enforcement of the anti-loitering ordinance; harsher ~~convictions for drunkenness~~ penalties for repeated convictions for drunkeness and disorderly conduct; suspension or revocation of licenses of taverns and restaurants not conducted properly. ~~As for~~ The Air Force ~~it~~ agreed to the city manager's request for a courtesy patrol of Air Police and warned troops that further disturbances would result in the maximum punishment allowable under the uniform code of military justice. Since then, only one further incident has been reported--three airmen ~~who were~~ charged with striking a teenage boy without provocation were jailed for 90 days and dismissed from the Air Force.

Other Cities

Some other examples of police action~~(and the source of the information)~~:

Los Angeles: Negroes began moving into a southwest section of the city and by the time they represented nearly 50 percent of the student body in the schools, white and Negro gangs ~~were forming~~ formed and fights were becoming a daily occurrence. A junior high school became the focal point of trouble. Community organizations began working on the adult level. The police department set up patrols around the schools ~~to minimize incidents~~ and juvenile officers concentrated on the problem. They learned the membership of the gangs and secured evidence leading to the arrest of the agitators. One ~~of the most~~ important aspects of the police work was the investigation of rumors, since these were the excuse for most acts of violence of one group against another, ~~then separating~~ Fact was separated from fiction and ~~making~~ the facts made public. The police department, working with the schools and community agencies, brought ~~about~~ such an easing of tension ~~until~~ that today the junior high school ~~which was the major source of trouble~~ has fewer problems of a racial or cultural nature than others in the city. (William H. Parker, Chief of Police, Los Angeles Police Department, in Guide to Community Relations for Peace Officers.)

San Francisco: in 1954, when integration of public housing projects was planned, an inspector of the police department was designated a liason officer with the Housing Authority. He was kept informed whenever a member of a different race was to move into a project and he in turn notified the district police station. Meanwhile, proper procedures ~~to be followed~~ were established at the precinct level, in order to prevent ~~any~~ disturbances. Plain clothesmen were on hand--and uniformed police were a short distance away--to observe whenever a member of another race moved into a project. ("We felt that the attendant presence of uniformed police would attract unnecessary attention to the situation wherein the desired atmosphere would be one of normalcy.") After the move, radio cars patrolled in a casual manner and contact was maintained between the individual housing projects and the district police stations in order to spot any friction. Not a single disturbance or incident was reported at any of the housing projects and integration was successfully accomplished. (Francis J. Ahern, Chief of Police, City and County of San Francisco, Guide to Community Relations for Peace Officers.)

p.f. Dallas, ~~Texas~~: An area which had been white began a period of transition; schools were segregated at that time and Negro youths had to pass a white school enroute to their own. The Negro and white students began pushing each other as they met on the sidewalk and tension ~~began mounting in the whole~~ mounted throughout the community. Additional police squads were assigned to the area. Whenever children were found pushing, a call was made to the homes of all ~~the children~~ involved, both white and Negro. If the same children were involved in several clashes, they were referred to the county juvenile officers. It became apparent ~~to~~ the Negro community, the law was being enforced not only against Negroes, and the white community learned that violence directed against a minority group would not be tolerated. Thus, a situation which might have resulted in widespread, long-lasting tension was ~~mediated~~ calmed peacefully. (J.C. Curry, Chief of Police and Glen D. King, Captain of Police, Dallas Police Department, Race Tensions and the Police.)

p.f. Chicago: ~~Last year~~ In 1961, when a group of Negroes and whites began a series of "wade-in" demonstrations at a public beach formerly used almost exclusively by white persons, week-end crowds varying from 3,000 to 10,000 gathered, Demonstrators had notified police of their intentions and when the first demonstrating group of about 75 persons arrived, 175 policemen were on hand to patrol. The police captain in charge, carrying a portable megaphone, walked along the beach and told the crowd either to disperse or be seated on the beach; 12 persons, 11 white and one Negro, were arrested the first week-end and charged with disturbing the peace. The calm that prevailed after several week-ends was attributed to heavy police protection, plus the support given officers by representatives of the major religious faiths, both on the scene and in statements of approval of the demonstrators' aims. Education-Orientation

Since the 1954-55 school decisions of the Supreme Court, the white light of publicity has been on the resistance, the struggles, and the accommodations of the South and border states to desegregation. With the beginning of each school term since the decisions, there has been a summing up of the progress the area has made toward acceptance of the Court's orders. Even the most casual newspaper reader has been aware of the attendant violence in some cities, which in its most extreme form called for the presence of Federal troops; the almost calm acceptance of change in others, a change which has brought token desegregation to seven Southern states; and the resistance and legal maneuvers which have left three states--Mississippi, Alabama, and South Carolina--with segregated elementary and secondary schools.

In the past few years, however, the spotlight has focused increasingly on cities in the North with de facto school segregation. As Negroes have flocked into urban centers, they have concentrated in central cities, which generally offer the only housing available to them. Consequently, many city schools have become predominantly Negro. In short, segregated housing leads to segregated schools. There probably is no long-range, completely satisfactory solution to the school problem of most cities until the housing market is broadened for Negroes. However, many Negroes are unwilling to wait for the housing picture to change, claiming that in the meantime predominantly Negro schools in the North often are overcrowded, inadequately staffed, and equipped and housed in [redacted] buildings. Also, they charge that some school district lines are deliberately gerrymandered to keep neighborhood schools white or Negro.

Some judges and municipal authorities are agreeing. New Rochelle, N.Y., for example, was found guilty of deliberate gerrymandering which kept a school 94 percent Negro; a federal judge ordered that Negroes be allowed free access to white schools.

One ~~point in the argument over the~~ question has (STEMMED FROM) the concept of neighborhood schools, which ~~have~~ has been the norm all over the country. One side contends that upgrading existing Negro schools is preferable to transporting children across the city to achieve some desegregation. Others maintain that, as the Supreme Court said in its school ruling, "separate educational facilities are inherently unequal," some racial balance must be achieved, and if there is no other way, because of the housing pattern, then pupils must be transported. Criss-crossing school buses, taking children from one crowded school to another just as crowded to achieve some desegregation, has not been a very popular solution, involving as it does exhausting bus trips across town in the large cities or the expense of acquiring more buses for smaller communities. However, where Negro schools are overcrowded and there are under-populated schools in white areas, some transporting may be worth the inconvenience. This fall, New York City's "open enrollment" plan allowed 9,000 children in heavily Negro and Puerto Rican schools to attend under-populated schools in other neighborhoods; Chicago and Newark, N.J., have similar programs.

Chicago?

which has been vigorously opposed by many New Yorkers

Princeton, ~~N.J.~~ has abandoned the idea of neighborhood schools and thus eliminated segregation. One school is used for all children in kindergarten through the fifth grade, another for the sixth through eighth grades. The city provides no transportation and most pupils walk or ride their bicycles or, in the case of small children, are driven in private car pools. Willow Grove, ~~Penn.~~ Pa., has a similar system. The Princeton plan has been studied by a number of other smaller cities where distances are not so great as to present a transportation problem, and by larger cities, where a similar plan within a given area is under consideration.

Meanwhile, with the start of the 1962-63 school term, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People had filed school desegregation suits in federal court against 11 non-Southern cities and complaints with New Jersey officials against three others. The 11 suits were against four Long Island cities--Amityville, Hempstead, Manhasset and Westbury, N.Y.; Rochester, N.Y.; Philadelphia; Chicago and Centreville, Ill.; Gary, Ind.; Kansas City, Kans.; and Pasadena, Calif.

The NAACP also said it had started community action programs in other cities, explaining that such programs were begun before filing suit and included investigation of racial practices in school systems, negotiations with school boards, filing of protests, submission of recommendations and demonstrations if required. Such programs have been started in Denver, ~~Colo.,~~ St. Paul, Minn.; Albany, Buffalo, New York City, Nyack, and Troy, N.Y.; Chester, ~~Penn.~~ Pa.; Cleveland, Columbus, and Portsmouth, Ohio; Phoenix and Tucson, Ariz.; Compton, San Francisco, Oakland, Sacramento, and San Diego, Calif; Portland, Ore.; and Seattle and Tacoma, Wash.

The Board of Education in Morristown, N.J., adopted a plan to convert a predominantely Negro elementary school to a junior high next year and scatter the displaced children to other schools.

The School Board of Danville, Ill., after protests and picketing by Negro parents who contended new elementary school boundaries perpetuated segregation, announced that hereafter the largely Negro school and two others would be open to students throughout the city and agreed to assign Negro teachers to the high school and to other elementary schools.

(none in the South did)

Other non-Southern cities which announced plans of voluntary school desegregation this year were Jersey City and Montclair, N.J.; Stamford, Conn.; Coatesville and Washington, ~~Penn.~~ Pa.; Mount Vernon, Ill.; and Eloy, Ariz.

Judging by the experience of cities faced with protests over school segregation, a few guidelines emerge to help smooth the path toward racial harmony. In many cases, a well-planned program of public information can help explain the drawing of school boundaries, where these have been set up in a logical fashion, with no effort to gerrymander in order to maintain predominantly white or Negro schools. or can explain the re-drawing of boundaries in order to comply with changed needs.

A willingness to discuss mutual problems with leaders of the minority groups and enlist their aid in arriving at solutions is helpful to the community as a whole, as is an insistence that all schools in the system be housed, equipped, and staffed equitably. Hiring and assignment of teachers and administrators on a merit basis, regardless of race, and minority group representation on school boards also are helpful.

Orientation Cultural Improvement

As school systems across the country face new problems and challenges because of a growing and changing population, more has been heard of the "culturally deprived" child. Studies have shown that many children from rural areas or ~~underprivileged~~ poor urban families suffer in linguistic development and general ability to follow a curriculum designed for children with middle-class backgrounds. Even though they may be normal or above in native intelligence, these children often have been so removed from the world of the settled, "average" middle-class family, that they cannot communicate, relate textbook examples to their own lives, or even understand them. Their health may be poor, they may be hungry, and their motivation for school non-existent. To help these children from migrant and/or deprived families realize their potentialities and become a self-supporting asset to the community, several cities have instituted special supplementary or enrichment programs.

New York City probably has the most far-reaching program, including ~~ranging from~~ non-English classes for Puerto Ricans and others who have come ~~to the New York schools~~ from outside the continental United States, ~~to~~ counselling work with the children and family, ~~to~~ auxiliary teachers, field trips and excursions, screening and testing of new entrants, and guidance and counseling. Already results have shown up in improved reading ability, attendance, and morale.

Pittsburgh is ~~meeting the challenge in another way, by~~ developing new techniques of teaching. A pilot project has been set up in five elementary schools there, with teaching teams organized to meet a multi-purpose goal, including increased student achievement, a better appreciation of education among parents, and a gradual lightening of the welfare burden. The team consists of a master teacher, regular teachers, a team mother, and unpaid assistants who are student teachers from local colleges, all of whom work with children in need of extra help in the selected schools.

Milwaukee has ~~a program of~~ special ~~orientation~~ classes for in-migrant pupils. The classes, in several schools in the area with the largest number of newcomers, are kept small and children are taught there until they are ready to move into regular classes. A welfare counsellor works with the parents, and a psychologist and other personnel from the Health Department cooperate.

St. Louis has the Banneker program in 23 elementary schools, with a 95 percent Negro enrollment, in the poorer part of the city. Special teaching programs have been developed, parent cooperation in home work assignments enlisted, and children ~~are~~ stimulated by field trips, honor awards, and discussions. In three years the number of Banneker pupils in the top of three "tracks" was tripled and the bottom "track" halved. Negro children have been aided by special programs in Kansas City to overcome ~~their~~ enviornmental handicaps and gradually are raising their medium achievement levels to those of ~~white~~ pupils.

Detroit, Chicago, and Washington, D.C., also have programs designed to aid children with special problems in a new, competitive enviornment.

Detroit this year also began an experiment with new pre-primers for half the first graders in the city shhools. Since most primers are based on ~~what has been described as~~ the all-white, antiseptic world of "Dick and Jane," ~~these~~ they have little meaning to a ~~deprived~~ child whose front lawn is a crowded city sidewalk and who may be Negro. After taping conversations with hundreds of elementary school children in Detroit and finding the 100 words used most frequently, the pre-primer textbooks were rewritten, using these words and presenting situations about white and Negro children in crowded big cities. Later, the groups using the new and those using the standard texts will be tested to see if children learn faster from books which reflect their own background.

Washington, ~~D.C.,~~ is developing a study guide ~~which is~~ to show the place of the Negro in ~~the mainstream of~~ American culture and history, ~~in an effort~~ to instill ~~a~~ pride in the contributions of Negroes. Also under development is a second study guide tracing the development ~~of Nazi Partism in~~ Nazi Germany, as an object lesson in the value of democracy and tolerance.

New York City's Commission on Human Rights has distributed a booklet to white parents to help their children fit into newly integrated schools.

The school administration in San Angelo, Texas, has established a free tutoring program at nights open to all high school students, and both white and Negro children have enrolled for the extra classes. The school system of Tucson, Ariz., operates and orientation program for pupils and teachers with respect to problems of integration.

Tucson also is one of a number of cities which have ~~education-orientation~~ programs on the adult level. The University's Home Economics Department and a low-income housing project in Tucson ~~joined~~ jointly to sponsor ~~a program to~~ help for project residents, including some ex-migrant farm workers in adjust to their new community. Graduate and senior students have met with mothers to discuss budget, diet, and problems of child care. In Belle Glade, Fla., a paid employee of the local health department works particularly with seasonal farm workers, discussing child care and personal health problems and helping the worker families learn to use community health services.

In yet another program, aimed not primarily at newcomers but ~~for adults in~~ the community as a whole, the Mayor's Commission on Group Relations in Newark, N.J., in cooperation with the Fuld Neighborhood House, has been offering an Adult Education Course on "The Negro in American History." The course was instituted to acquaint both white and Negro citizens with the worthwhile contributions the Negro has made to American development.

In Cleveland, Ohio, the Community Relations Board has set up a Department of Migration to aid the four major newcomer groups to the city--Southern Negroes, Southern Appalachians, American Indians and Puerto Ricans. It distributes English and Spanish versions of a Director of Community Services and a kit of materials compiled to aid these newcomers. ~~in adjustment~~. The Department holds ~~orientation~~ meetings every six weeks with Indian newcomers to answer questions about the city and urban behavior; ~~it~~ conducts information programs for Puerto Ricans (there were 6,500 from this Commonwealth in Cleveland last year); ~~It~~ has sponsored programs and a fair to acquaint other Cleveland residents with the cultural congributions of ~~former~~ residents ~~of~~ the Appalachian Mountain region. The staff has visited industrial plants in the area to gather information on the employment problems of the newcomers and has spent a great deal of its educational effort on the matter of wage garnishments since ~~newcomers~~ often are the victims of unscrupulous salesmen. The Department also has cooperated with churches and sponsored a seminar of clergymen on the problems of migrant minorities; last year, with ~~the cooperation of~~ Western Reserve University, the Board ~~initiated~~ a spring conference ~~for~~ 200 persons on the plight of new residents.

In cooperation with the Chicgo Junior Colleges the Mayor's Committee on New Residents in Chicago offers a course in "Spanish Vocabulary for Professional Workers." It is designed particularly to aid police, building inspectors, probation officers and other municipal workers deal with the new Spanish-speaking residents of the city. Newark, ~~N.J.,~~ also offers a course in conversational Spanish for city employees.

Employment

in this so? what about "affirmative action"?

The economic loss to the United States through employment discrimination was outlined in a report to the Congress this year. The Council of Economic Advisers estimated that if the present capabilities of the non-white population were utilized fully the Gross National Product of the country could be increased 2.5 percent, or about 13 billion dollars.

Furthermore, the report said, if non-whites had the same educational levels as whites and if the economy utilized their education the GNP might be 3.2 percent, or 17 billion dollars, higher. In addition, elimination of racial discrimination "would permit, by reducing the level of social costs, a reallocation of output to more fruitful uses."

What is being done to cut this economic loss which affects both the non-white labor force of 11 percent and the communities in which they live?

Government employment--Federal, state and municipal--without racial or religious discrimination is the policy of the United States, ~~based on the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments.~~ The Federal drive to eliminate prejudice in hiring ~~public~~ Federal employees has been stepped up in recent years, but the eventual goal, and legal requirement, has long been clear: government employment ~~will be decided~~ based on qualification, without regard to color or religion. From the passage of the Civil Service Act of 1883, with its principle of merit employment and a subsequent regulation under it outlawing religious discrimination, to the 1940 Civil Service statute rule prohibiting racial discrimination ~~as well and up~~ to today's President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity, the Federal government has sought, with variable emphasis, to make fair employment a reality as well how can you say the Federal & municipal states have policies against discrimination

as a theory. principle

Private employment, however, is another matter. During World War II the President established, by executive order, a Fair Employment Practices Committee with jurisdiction over all employment by government contractors, recruitment and training for war production, and employment by the Federal government. The Committee, which lacked power to enforce its decisions except by negotiation and pressure of public opinion, went out of existence in 1946. Currently, a Presidential Executive Order issued in March, 1961, stipulates that every private contractor or sub-contractor doing business with the Federal government must sign a contract with an anti-discrimination clause.

Except in this area of Federal contracts, action on job discrimination by private employers has been left to states and municipalities. The former can act under their police powers and the latter where power has been delegated to them by their respective states.

1-Employment

Twenty-five states and the Virgin Islands have passed Fair Employment (FEP) laws. Twenty of these provide for enforcement by administrative agencies and, while concerned mainly with private employment, strengthen also the Constitutional ban on discrimination in public employment. These 20 are Alaska, California, Colorado, Connecticut, Delaware, Illinois, Kansas, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, New Jersey, New Mexico, New York, Ohio, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Washington and Wisconsin. Nebraska bans defense work employment bias; Arizona bars discrimination in public employment and by employers doing state contract work; Indiana and Nevada declare job discrimination to be against public policy and authorize a commission to investigate complaints; Idaho and the Virgin Islands rely on court action for enforcement of employment discrimination.

In addition, approximately 40 municipalities have enacted local ordinances outlawing discrimination in employment. Most cities with FEP laws are in states which also have FEP statutes. ALTHOUGH SOME CITIES [illegible] ACTING. ~~some~~ other cities, however--Des Moines and Sioux City, Iowa, and Baltimore, Md., for example--have adopted local laws but their states as yet have no FEP legislation.

Cities ~~with sizeable minority groups which have faced the problem of job discrimination~~ have varied in their approach, some appointing study groups, others setting forth a policy of non-discrimination in city employment, and still others ~~by~~ providing for administrative bodies armed with real authority to enforce anti-bias laws applying to both government and private employment. As a minimum, all these approaches demonstrate a concern with the importance of the problem to the families affected and to their communities. However, the appointment of a study group or a committee does not have any lasting effect if there is no vigorous follow-up, nor does even legislation with legal sanctions and a professional staff necessarily mean a city is meeting all its commitments. Jack Greenberg, in Race Relations and American Law, pointed out, "Activity and effectiveness are not determined merely by budget, but to a great extent reflect the attitude of the guiding personnel."

A ~~random~~ sampling of cities which have taken action on fair employment shows the variety of approaches used.

The Lansing, Mich., city council has adopted a municipal code of fair practices requiring city agencies to hire and operate on a racially non-discriminatory basis. ~~The city of~~ Beloit, Wisc., has PASSED AN FEP ORDINANCE COVERING PRIVATE AND CITY ~~issued a declaration of city policy against discrimination in~~ employment by ~~any city agency or contractor~~ with provision of $10 fine or a jail term of not more than five days for violations. CANTON, OHIO, ALSO HAS AN FEP LAW COVERING ALL EMPLOYMENT.

Sioux City, Iowa, passed an ordinance in 1951 which applies to municipal employees and to contractors, licensees, and franchise holders of the city. The ordinance making employment discrimination by such agencies unlawful is administered by a five member commission appointed by the mayor and approved by the city council. Maximum punishment for violations is 30 days in jail or a fine of $100.

Richmond, Calif., has had an ordinance outlawing discrimination in city employment, or by contractors doing business with the city, since 1946.

In the Southern city of Richmond, Va., the city council this year unanimously passed a FEP resolution covering municipal workers. To overcome a legal objection, the resolution was in the form of a recommendation to the city's Personnel Board. The board was asked to adopt a rule providing for employment and promotion solely on a merit basis, without regard to race, creed or arbitrary maximum age limits.

Cleveland, Ohio, passed a fair employment ordinance in 1950, giving the Community Relations Board the responsibility of receiving complaints and making investigations and recommendations. The Board cannot initiate investigations but must wait for individual complaints. A portion of its work results in referrals to union officials, the Ohio Civil Rights Commission, the Bureau of Unemployment Compensation, the Civil Service Commission and the National Labor Relations Board. Last year, the Board processed 18 complaints of alleged racial discrimination, finding 10 without probable cause and adjusting eight to the complainants' satisfaction.

In 1957, Bakersfield, Calif., adopted an ordinance outlawing discrimination in employment because of race, religion, or place of birth and creating a Commission On Equal Employment Opportunity. The ordinance, which applied to "employers, employment, labor organizations and others," provided that if the Commission was unable to eliminate any discrimination charged, a majority vote of all members could certify the matter to the city attorney for appropriate legal action. It also provided for procedures whereby any employer, employment agency, or labor union found by a court to have violated the amendment twice within a period of one year would not be eligible to enter into any contract with the city for a year.

The Bakersfield ordinance stated it was the desire of the City Council "to promote the welfare of all citizens....by encouraging equal employment...thereby encouraging all citizens to reach the full potentialities and to provide adequately toward the economic security of their families and the education of their children and to make their contribution to the industrial, business and civic life of this City.

"And it is the conclusion of this Council that discrimination in employment by reason of race, color, religion, ancestry, national origin or place of birth tends to impose substantial financial burdens upon the public revenues which must be used for the relief and amelioration of the condition of those affected by such discrimination wherever it exists, and that by encouraging widespread employment among all persons willing to work, such will tend to lessen disease, delinquency and crime when due to poverty or lack of employment."

The Bakersfield FEP ordinance and a similar one applying to private as well as public agencies passed by the City and County of San Francisco were forerunners of the state law which became effective Sept. 18, 1959. The California FEP law explicitly provided that local FEP agencies would cease to exist one year from the effective date of the state legislation.

On the other hand, some states--Minnesota and Pennsylvania, for example--allow their municipal FEP groups to operate autonomously in cooperation with the state commission and have set up a procedure for feferrals. ? what?

The St. Louis, Mo., FEP ordinance is restricted to public works supported in whole or in part by public funds. Another border city, Baltimore, Md., in 1960 strengthened its 1956 law barring discrimination in private employment by giving the administering agency, the Baltimore Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, subpoena power, and, where respondents refuse cease and desist orders, power to certify the matter to the city law department, which is required to seek court aid to secure compliance.

In 1947 Minneapolis, Minn., became the first city in the country to establish a municipal FEP commission to administer an enforceable employment law aimed at discrimination. Prior to enactment of the law, the Mayor's Council on Human Relations studied employment patterns in Minneapolis, as part of a community self-survey, and found that minority groups faced serious barriers in all employment above the level of common labor and service jobs. An anyalysis by the Minneapolis FEP commission of the census reports of 1940 and 1950 showed considerable progress has been made in non-white employment in semiskilled, skilled, clerical, supervisory, and professional categories.

Kansas City, Mo., has opened municipal employment to all, based on the ability to pass civil service tests. The executive director of the Urban League there reported that police, fire, and clerical staffs of the various departments have a representative number of Negro employees.

A Skokie, Ill., ordinance establishing a personnel system for the village includes a prohibition against discrimination in municipal employment

~~offices of government and 22,518 jobs, of which 874 were held by Negroes.~~ The Commission said that "the government units are a showcase for merit employment practices, for the most part."

~~Canton, Ohio, passed an FEP law in 1958, covering all employment.~~

The City Council of Des Moines, ~~Iowa,~~ adopted an ordinance in 1956 creating a Commission on Job Discrimination consisting of five members appointed by the city council. The ordinance outlaws discrimination by employers, labor unions, and employment agencies and authorizes the Commission to investigate and hold public hearings on charges of employment bias. If respondents fail to comply with any recommendations, the Commission must certify the case of the city solicitor for action. Conviction for violations of the anti-discrimination laws carries a maximum penalty of 30 days imprisonment or a fine of $100. The law also states that ~~[illegible]~~ the Commission may, on its own initiative, investigate and hold hearings on possible discrimination in any department of the city government; any violations then must be reported to the city manager for appropriate action.

About five years ago, Burlington, Iowa, conducted a community self-survey and subsequently established the Mayor's Committee on Civic Unity. The committee, which has no enforcement powers, has conducted an educational drive for equal job opportunities in the city.

In a 1955 ordinance, Pittsburgh, ~~Penn.~~, strengthened an earlier FEP ordinance and provided for a 15-member Commission on Human Relations appointed by the mayor, who also was authorized to appoint an executive director. The ordinance states that "experience in other large cities has proved that legislation prohibiting job discrimination removes some of the sources of strife, poverty, crime and disease, and directly promotes public welfare and good government." It authorizes the commission to initiate or receive and investigate complaints charging unlawful employment practices by city or private employers and certify any violations to the city solicitor for action.

A number of cities demonstrate ways in which FEP legislation can be administered, interpreted, or supplemented.

The Erie, ~~Penn.~~ Pa., Community Relations Commission, for example, has endorsed a resolution interpreting the city's FEP ordinance as barring advertisements for "situations wanted" from including references to race or religion.

In August, 1961, the Los Angeles County Board of Supervisors unanimously voted to conduct a survey of the more than 40,000 county workers to determine the employment pattern of "persons of Oriental, Negro and Mexican American antecedents." The study, completed this year, was ~~carried out under direction of~~ made by a committee of county officials, including the executive secretary of the Human Relations Committee of Los Angeles. The state FEP commission ~~called~~ considered it "probably the most intensive and exhaustive study of its kind ever made by a public agency of its own personnel anywhere in the United States" and said it "may serve as a model for similar self-surveys in other cities and counties, and perhaps in large private enterprises as well..."

The Los Angeles committee made two reports to the Board of Supervisors. The first covered 16 departments in which the committee ~~felt~~ believed statistics indicated the possibility of discrimination. As a result, the Supervisors instructed department heads to review their selection, utilization and promotion of minority group employees and eliminate any elements of discrimination. The second report covered departments which seemed to have a scarcity of minority group employees at professional levels. Subsequently, the Civil Service Commission and the Board of Supervisors instructed the departments to review their examining procedures and the use of the "appraisal of promotability" form. A follow-up survey to determine if corrective action has been taken is scheduled for April, 1963.

In Last December, the Fire Commission of Los Angeles adopted unanimously a policy statement strengthening non-discrimination in the Fire Department. The action requires that all hiring, assignments and promotions be on a merit basis. It also provides for an education program to be conducted in cooperation with the University of California in Los Angeles to improve "harmonious relations among personnel in the department." Since 1955 the City Civil Service Commission of Los Angeles has required all applicants for municipal employment to pledge ~~ok~~ they will "willingly work with or for any associates regardless of race, color or creed."

The Philadelphia Commission on Human Relations conducted an investigation into charges of discriminatory employment policies in the hotel and restaurant business and found that such discrimination did exist. ~~As a result,~~ Subsequently, in 1960 the Greater Philadelphia Restaurant Operators Association agreed to hiring practices conforming to the city's FEP law, ~~which dates back to 1948~~ (passed in 1948). A similar agreement was reached with the Waiter and Waitresses union local. Philadelphia now ~~couples~~ combines its industry-wide investigating ~~technique~~ with ~~a~~ plant inspections ~~program, which it conducted~~ made last year at the rate of several per week.

~~The mayor of New York City, said this year, "The effort to assure full employment opportunity for all our citizens does not and cannot end~~

The Philadelphia Chamber of Commerce ~~now has~~ recently appointed a five-man advisory committee to work with the Commission ~~on programs~~ to promote ~~support for~~ merit hiring ~~practices.~~

In response to a query about employment policy in the city of Windsor, Ontario, City Manager E. Rowden Colter replied, "In regard to employment practice, Negroes are given equal consideration for all positions in the municipal administration. The City Solicitor, one of the senior officials, is a Negro and he has been outstanding in his profession. Colored persons are presently employed in Police, Fire, Engineers, Parks, Public Works, Clerk's, Public Market and Legal Departments as well as on the staffs of the Public Library, the ~~xxxx~~ General Hospital, School Boards and the Utilities Commission."

The ~~mayor of~~ Mayor Robert F. Wagner New York City touched on another ~~phase of employment~~ issue when he said ~~this~~ year, "The effort to assure full employment opportunity for all our citizens does not and cannot end with laws prohibiting discrimination and creating governmental agencies to enforce these prohibitions. Steps must be taken affirmatively to recruit and promote members of minority groups into positions of executive, professional, administrative and skilled responsibility." The statement came with ~~the mayor's~~ Wagner's announcement that a Mayor's Committee on Job Advancement had been formed to seek ~~to open to~~ for Negroes and Puerto Ricans thousands of higher level private and city jobs, by ~~seeking to~~ persuading labor unions to end discrimination in membership and apprentice training, analyzing annual reports from participating employers, and ~~conducting programs to~~ encouraging school children ~~from~~ minority groups to develop ~~the~~ skills ~~necessary~~ for higher paying jobs.

HOUSING – Assume this will be updated to cover Pres Exec Order last week.

Housing for minority groups ~~has become~~ is one of the most urgent problems facing many cities today. ~~Officials have watched with concern as~~ waves of newcomers, many from rural areas and often Negro, have crowded into central cities, creating or expanding slums because too often these are all available to them, and at the same time ~~they have watched~~ old, established families move to the suburbs, taking their tax dollars with them. Some ~~of these~~ cities ~~faced~~ experienced an earlier, migrant influx from foreign countries, but it was easier for those migrants who were white to fade in time into the city background and more difficult before the days of quick transportation for the older families to move farther out. As minorities, attracted by the promise of better jobs and a freer life, have moved into the cities, they have been crowded into ghetto-like areas ~~across the land~~, either because this is all they can find at the price they can afford initially or because discrimination bars them from better housing. Many cities know only too well how the over-crowding, the sub-standard housing, and prejudice have added to the problems of welfare, school, health, and police departments and have begun working on the matter of decent housing for both humane and economic reasons. Probably no community in the United States with a large Negro population has solved its housing problems, but some are trying. ~~Lack of~~ a comprehensive national policy has hampered cities, since the federal government plays such a major role in ~~the~~ housing, with its financing, ~~federal~~ mortgage ~~guarantee~~ insurance and public housing assistance programs.

Until the past few years almost all legislation prohibiting discrimination in housing applied only to public housing. However, and ~~to~~ municipal ordinances?

cities in over 20 percent of the country now are governed by state laws which prohibit racial and religious discrimination in some part of the private housing market. In something of a speed record in the civil rights field, 11 states, three cities and the Virgin Islands passed such housing statutes in the past five years.

The nation's first fair housing statute applying to private residences became law in New York City on the last day of 1957. Pittsburgh adopted a private housing ordinance ~~in 1958~~ the next year and Toledo, Ohio, followed in 1961 but was stalled by a court injunction shortly after the effective date of its housing law.

why single out Colorado?

In 1959, Colorado enacted a law banning discrimination in transactions involving all dwellings except owner-occupied units. The Act, applying to public and private housing and both rentals and sales, also bars inquiries and advertisements relating to the race, sex, [redacted] creed, or ancestry of prospective tenants or buyers. In April, 1962, Alaska adopted legislation banning discrimination in the entire housing field, and Minnesota fair housing legislation ~~goes~~ went into effect Dec. 31, 1962. The eight other states with fair housing legislation are Pennsylvania, New York, New Hampshire, New Jersey, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Oregon and California. All ~~the~~ these laws are enforced by administrative agencies except those of California, Alaska and New Hampshire.

The Virgin Islands has ~~added legislation~~ a new law barring discrimination in the sale and rental of housing ~~to~~ as well as earlier anti-bias laws covering employment and public accommodations. The new law has a unique feature ~~aimed at~~ preventing evasion by the private club device. It clearly states that the Virgin Islands prohibits "clubs from establishing a private clientele of either members or guests, which they have selected, and with which persons alone transact their business and commerce." Violators are subject to civil suits for actual damages, plus punitive should we cite unless we cite also some documentation?

damages for up to $5,000, and are liable to criminal punishment and license suspension or revocation.

The National Committee Against Discrimination in Housing (NCDH) found recently that even though the various laws have been in effect only a short time, slow but steady progress already has been made in opening formerly restricted residential areas to minority groups.

In 1960, Canada barred discrimination in all publicly-assisted housing, including that built with government insured loans and ~~last~~ a year later Ontario became the first Canadian province to enact a fair housing law prohibiting discrimination in private housing.

Some municipal governments have faced the problem of residential discrimination and have acted in a variety of ways, most often taking initial steps in the field of public housing, publicly-assisted and/or urban redevelopment housing. Nevertheless, an estimated 80 percent of public housing in the United States remains segregated. This is partly due ~~due in part~~ to the fact that ~~generally~~ more Negroes than whites qualify for admission to subsidized low rent public housing because of lower incomes. This, plus a concentration of Negroes in central cities, often adds up to such a large demand for available public housing that an all-Negro project results. Some local housing authorities with desegregation programs have ~~simply~~ have ~~not~~ been able to achieve a racial balance. However, in perhaps more cases ~~this is not the entire picture and~~ segregation does and can exist in ~~some~~ local housing projects by design. There also are cities which have Negro citizens, yet the public housing projects remain all white.

Still, a measure of the widespread realization of the existence of discrimination in housing is the fact that by 1961 a total of 401 towns and cities with public housing programs had adopted policies of non-discrimination. This represented about 36.6 percent of the cities with such programs. Of ~~this percentage,~~ there 40! however, only 52.8 percent ~~of the "open occupancy" localities~~ actually were integrated, according to the NCDH. And, some of the "integrated" projects had in fact very few Negro tenants.

City housing authorities or commissions which have passed resolutions against discrimination in public housing include Phoenix, Ariz.; Fresno and Richmond, Calif.; Omaha, Neb.; Superior, Wisc.; Hazel Park and Mount Clemens, Mich.; Toledo, Ohio; and Washington, D.C. Housing action often has followed a period of community preparation and discussion, as in Peoria, Ill., where the Council on Human Relations worked with city officials for several years. As a result, Peoria now has an explicit policy of non-segregation in all public housing in the community. Saginaw, Mich., has a similar policy.

"In some instances, the action by city authorities has preceded, if it has not precipitated, State legislation," the Commission on Civil Rights said in its 1959 report. "For instance, the resolution of the Hartford Court of Common Council in January 1949 prohibiting discrimination or segregation in any public housing or municipally assisted private housing development within the city, apparently the first such action, included a resolution that similar action be taken on a statewide basis by the general assembly. Six months later the Connecticut Legislature prohibited discrimination in public housing projects and four years later the legislature extended the prohibition to all publicly assisted housing."

Hartford also has experimented in the field of semi-private housing by enlisting the cooperation of the FHA, the city of Hartford, private lending companies, and construction and management firms. The city leased a two-acre tract for 50 years without fee to a non-profit private corporation, Hartford Homes, Inc., sponsored by the Greater Hartford Chamber of Commerce. Private lending institutions for the 40-unit "Twin Acres" pilot project provided the financing and FHA backed the mortgage while the city assumed no financial burden, but receives taxes; on full payment of the mortgage, land and buildings will revert to the city. Twin Acres, operated as a relocation project, is non-discriminatory. Since 1959, 22 white families have lived with 18 Negro families without incident. The director of the Hartford Department of Housing has said, "The acumen of private business and management have been harnessed for a social purpose, with the city represented via its departments, to assure the accommodation of those persons for whom the housing is intended and, when necessary, to assist families in their adjustment to a new enviornment."

~~The city council or redevelopment agency of such cities as Sacramento and Oakland, Calif., and Inkster, Mich., have passed resolutions of anti-discrimination in urban redevelopment projects. Other cities have enacted ordinances against discrimination in redevelopment projects, including Los Angeles, Cincinnati, Hamilton and Dayton, Ohio.~~

Des Moines, Iowa, bars discrimination in the sale or use of land for urban renewal. The entire matter of "urban renewal" has claimed increasing attention since the program, with its emphasis on slum clearance and rebuilding, was initiated in the 1949 Housing Act of the Federal government. The Housing Act of 1954 broadened

In recent years, the city of Windsor, Ontario, has constructed several rental housing projects of single family dwellings, duplexes, row houses and a high rise apartment. There is no segregation and the city manager has commented that persons of all races and creeds live in harmony.

The city council or redevelopment agency of such cities as Sacramento and Oakland, Calif., and Inkster, Mich., have passed resolutions of anti-discrimination in urban redevelopment projects. Other cities have enacted ordinances ~~xxxxxx~~ barring discrimination in redevelopment projects, including Los Angeles and Cincinnati, Hamilton and Dayton, Ohio.

Des Moines, Iowa, bars discrimination in the sale or use of land for urban renewal. The entire matter of "urban renewal" has claimed increasing attention since the program, with its emphasis on slum clearance and rebuilding, was initiated in the 1949 Housing Act of the Federal government. The Housing Act of 1954 broadened the concept into a huge Federal-local cooperative venture which involves a master city plan, rehousing of displaced families, housing codes and financing. The Federal government has ruled that private housing developers in federally aided urban renewal projects must comply with state and local anti-discrimination laws. In 1960 the Housing and Home Finance ~~Agency~~ administrator announced that a community-wide representative citizens' advisory committee was a prerequisite for approval of a city's renewal program. This has been both a challenge and opportunity for communities with such programs to enlist the aid and support of minority groups. A glance at just one state, Michigan, which is not necessarily typical, shows at least seven of the 16 urban renewal communities in existence last year had citizens advisory committees with substantial minority representation: Detroit, Jackson, Kalamazoo, Mount Clemens, Pontiac, Saginaw and Inkster.

However,"to have minority groups represented on zoning boards, as well as on planning commissions, is an important step in assuring the protection of minority group rights in urban growth and development," the Michigan State Advisory Committee to the Commission on Civil Rights said in its 1961 report. "In only one of the 12 urban renewal communities under consideration [in Michigan] is there a minority group member on the zoning board of appeals; the village of Inkster, where the principal minority is Negro, has two minority representatives on a board of seven."

Various voluntary groups representing churches, business and civic organizations have been formed in a number of localities to broaden--often in cooperation with city officials--the number of neighbbrhoods open to minority groups. In 1958 the Greater Seattle

Housing Council, representing builders, architects, real estate firms and lenders, joined church, labor, and civic agencies to combat housing discrimination. In 1961 the Council set up an experimental clearing service to ~~assist~~ help minority groups ~~families~~ find housing outside the central city, away from areas of racial concentration.

The Housing Authority of Seattle operates four low-rent public housing projects, two in the central part of the city and two in outlying sections. The projects, with a total of 4,000 units, operate on an open occupancy basis.

The Brookline, Mass., Fair Housing Committee's "Good Neighbor" pledge drive ~~brought praise from~~ was cited by President Kennedy ~~who called it~~ as "the kind of constructive response to a great problem that this nation needs." Clergymen of the three major faiths gave strong leadership to the drive, which was also endorsed by the Brookline Board of Selectmen and members of the state legislature and which received extensive coverage by newspapers, radio, and television. The drive is being followed up by ~~contacting~~ asking signers of the pledge ~~to persuade them~~ to establish neighborhood organizations for fair housing. Similar campaigns have followed in several other cities in the Boston area. The pledge itself reads:

"To keep Brookline ahead in a progressing nation, we the undersigned join the Good Neighborhood for Fair Housing pledge:

"1. We believe that all people regardless of race, religion or national origin should have equal opportunity for housing.

"2. When renting or selling the property we own or manage we agree to make it available to anyone without regard to his national origin.

"3. We want our neighborhood to welcome all regardless of race, religion or national origin and will encourage our neighbors to join us in achieving an integrated neighborhood."

Still other communities have offered different solutions to certain aspects of the housing question. Shaker Heights, Ohio, for example, passed an ordinance in 1961 ~~which prohibits~~ prohibiting real estate agents from attempting to stimulate panic selling in changing neighborhoods. Two years earlier, over 200 families in Shaker Heights, a suburb of Cleveland, had organized to protect their integrated neighborhood and "create a workable plan for democratic living among Negro and white families in the suburbs."

Gainesville, Ga., sought an answer ~~to its Negro housing problem~~ within the segregation framework of the Deep South. The Negro community has been hemmed in by industrial and white residential areas in Gainesville. The city commissioners appointed a committee to study how the space available for Negro housing might be expanded. As a result, a new high school for Negroes was planned for an open area and private enterprise encouraged to develop a subdivision in the area. The Committee developed into a community-wide improvement group considering the broader question of urban renewal.

The City Commission of Kalamazoo, Mich., ~~in 1955 declared its opposition to segregation in Housing. In 1960,~~ went on record against segregated housing in 1955. Five years later the Kalamazoo city manager, commenting on the inter-relationship of minority housing and development of the community as a whole, said "the problems of all persons and all groups in the city are mutual...unsolved problems of a social and economic nature retard the growth and advancement of the entire city." Later, at the instigation of the Council on Community Relations, more than 1,000 Kalamazoo citizens signed a newspaper advertisement which endorsed the right of all Americans to buy or rent a home in the neighborhood of their choice. "These positive actions by official agencies and citizens in Kalamazoo have resulted in greater freedom for non-whites to move out of segregated areas," the Michigan Advisory Committee to the Commission on Civil Rights ~~said last year~~ reported in 1960.

The City Council of Oakland, Calif., unanimously adopted an "open house policy" asking all citizens and the real estate industry to build, finance, sell and rent housing without discrimination.

The California Advisory Committee to the Commission on Civil Rights found that the "presence of Negro realty board members...has led to fruitful discussion concerning the role of realtors in dealing with problems connected with minority housing" in San Francisco and Sacramento. [The U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, said in its 1961 report on Housing,]

"The real estate broker is a key man in the majority of housing transactions. He finds buyers for housing and housing for buyers and he has detailed knowledge (or access to it) of the location of homes of various styles and prices. His policies and practices are among the foremost influences that determine where the various racial or religious groups will live...

"Certain states and municipalities have enacted legislation prohibiting discriminatory practices in varying degrees on the part of this unique group. Others have reached the same result through attorney general opinions and administrative regulations. State authority to license and regulate real estate brokers is also a formidable weapon and has been utilized in at least three states for purposes of insuring equal housing opportunity.

"Pennsylvania, Minnesota, Washington, New York and Oregon expressly cover real estate brokers and salesmen in their antidiscrimination housing laws. Similarly, Pittsburgh's and New York City's ordinances expressly apply to real estate salesmen. Baltimore has adopted an ordinance specifically directed against 'block busting' tactics." → so has Detroit

Whatever method is used to achieve open occupancy, the NCDH said in a 1961 report that experience had provided three guideposts for success: 1. A firm, clearly stated policy; 2. An early start on open occupancy, preferably at the planning stage; and 3. An open housing policy covering the major portion of the housing market, thus placing all buyers and sellers on the same competitive basis.

The report cited examples of the feasibility of integration "even when initiated under the most adverse circumstances" and mentioned that border cities such as Baltimore, Md.; Wilmington, Del.; St. Louis, Mo.; and Louisville, Ky., had desegregated long-established and segregated projects. It said that open occupancy had proved successful and profitable in high-rent urban renewal housing in such cities as Chicago, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, and others and in numerous suburban developments, including 60 in New York state alone. And, it added:

"Housing value seems to override even latent prejudice--no instance is known where the interracial character of a development has caused it to be a business failure."

INTERRACIAL TEACHING STAFFS

This is a report on an attempt to locate a number of cities which have had a successful experience of interracial teaching staffs. Letters were written to a number of city school superintendents inquiring whether their systems (1) employ interracial staffs in schools with interracial student bodies, (2) employ interracial staffs in schools with students of only one race, (3) have found their policy in this regard to be a successful one. This report is a summary based on 55 replies5 which indicate that interracial staffs are used.*

I. Summary of Statements

1. Thirty-one cities state a policy of non-discrimination, or employment on merit, and indicate no restriction on this principle. Typical is the reply: "the policy of the Board of Education has consistently been one of selecting and assigning employes on the basis of qualification and fitness for the position." Another says, "We have no discrimination whatsoever and both faculty and students are assigned without regard to geographical area, race, or origin."

Some of these 31 replies are from cities which in fact employ many Negro teachers, others have a much smaller number of Negro teachers. In several, it is apparent that this is a relatively new policy.

All of the 31 say that their policy is successful. "We have had no difficulty with interracial staffs in our city" or "We have had no incidents arising because of interracial staffing" are typical of the comments. One superintendent said there were some objections raised when a Negro teacher was placed in a predominantly white school, but the objections subsided when the policy was explained. Another writes:

> "When we started staffing our schools interracially ..... there were some slight objections, but the pupils and their parents have learned to accept the teachers upon evidence of ability and not because of racial background."

Of these 31 cities, 17 are in the northeast, 8 in the middle west, 5 on the west coast, and 1 in the southwest.

2. Sixteen cities report that they have some interracial teaching staffs but also state some reservation, restriction, or caution concerning the use of Negro teachers. Nine of the 16 restrict interracial staffs to schools with interracial student bodies or schools with all Negro or predominantly population; five indicated that they had taken initial and partial steps in a gradual plan; two siad a Negro teacher could be placed where it is acceptable to the faculty or to the neighborhood. Some stressed care in selecting the teacher and need for orientation of the school. Some stomments in this group are:

> "That works slowly for the Negro people but it seemed to insure success where tried."

*In addition to the 55 replies discussed here, 6 letters were received which did not indicate an affirmative reply to the question of whether or not interracial staffs are used. Two state that they have no policy in this regard, 2 have no Negro teachers, one does not use both races on the same staff, and one gives too little information for classification.

"It would be a mistake to invite controversy over the question by placing a teacher in a school in whose community the people were not ready to accept a teacher of her race. To do that would not only subject the teacher to personal embarrassment and hardship but would do the cause of better race relations damage. We always judge a teacher as an individual and not as a member of any particular group."

A Negro teacher can be employed "where we believe strong resentment in the community would not be raised."

"Our policy of employing Negro teachers is conservative, but it has been very effective."

Of these 16 cities, 3 are eastern, 10 are mid-western, and 3 are western.

3. There are eight replies which do not make a statement of current policy but report the successful interracial placement of a relatively small number of Negro teachers. Four of these letters are from eastern cities, three from the middle-west, one from the west coast.

One reports that they have at times employed one Negro teacher out of several hundred on the staff and adds "There was never any question about their employment and never any question about white children being in their rooms." Another writes, "We have a few Negro teachers...they are assigned wherever needed." Of the other six, four report one interracial staff, one reports two interracial staffs, one reports successful experience of, "one or two in the past" in predominantly white neighborhoods.

II. The Record of Experience

The letters reflect considerable awareness, on the part of Superintendents, of the policy of employment on merit, as opposed to placing emphasis on the number of Negro teachers employed. We quote several who spell out the procedure with notable clarity:

"The selection of public school teachers and supervisors...is based entirely upon competitive examination. Therefore, the element of race, color, or creed of applicants is entirely disregarded."

"The...Board of Education selects employees on the basis of their ability to execute a particular job and not on the basis of race, creed, religion, or nationality. This policy has now been in operation for six or seven years and we believe it is working very satisfactorily."

"All teachers are appointed from a regular certificate list without discrimination to race, color or creed."

"The employment of teachers in the...public schools is solely on the basis of educational background and professional competence. We raise no questions in our application or in our interview as to race, color, or creed."

"Personnel Division application forms, identification cards, and assignment forms do not ask any question in relation to race, color, or religious affiliations of any applicant for a position...Photographs are not required. Current Personnel Division records do not identify the race, color, or religion of any employee. This practice is considered consistent with the letter and spirit of the Board's policy that no racial discrimination be shown."

The Superintendents also make clear that non-discrimination applies in placement:

> "All teachers serve in schools when there are vacancies. Our plan works with great satisfaction."
>
> "Assignment of teachers is based upon the needs of our schools. There is no segregation of either pupils or teachers."
> "It can be briefly stated that teachers are assigned to individual classroom situations without any consideration as to the racial makeup of the pupil population or the teaching staff. Assignments are made on the basis of the teacher's ability to meet the particular needs of a class in a given school. We do try to maintain a balanced age in our school staffs so that the younger teachers may have the benefit of the teaching experiences of the older members, but the matter of race does not enter into the assignments of teachers in our public schools. We have found this practice to be very successful."
> "The only policy which we adhere to in all cases is the desire to employ the very best teachers available in the judgment of those responsible for making the decision. All teachers are assigned to the school staffs solely on the basis of the multiple factors which must be considered in assigning teachers where they will be able to render the greatest service and the best service to the school system...The above procedure we believe to be the only reasonable and proper procedure. We doubt very much that the multiplicity of factors involved and the prime purpose of rendering service to children and to the community would permit the operation of a plan which in any respect would be somewhat mechanical."

Many examples make it clear that this policy needs no modification where a given neighborhood may have few or no Negro children. A New Jersey city reports that 22 out of 37 schools have interracial faculties, including 2 Negro teachers in an all-white junior high school and 12 Negro teachers in 6 elementary schools which have only white pupils. Other Superintendents report the following:

> "Interracial staffs are used in schools where there is a high percentage (50 to 75%) of Negro students and also in schools where only a few Negro students are enrolled. It is our present policy to assign Negro teachers in terms of the needs of our schools rather than in terms of the character of the school enrollment."
> "We have had one colored teacher, who teaches practically all white children, for eight years. She has worked in two schools during that time."
> "In the interracial staffs that we have there are white teachers teaching white and Negro students, and there are Negro teachers teaching white and Negro students. In one of these schools, the principal is a Negro. It is our opinion that to date this policy has been very effective."

Many comments point to the fact that the outcome of initial experience with integrated staffs is a view of the Negro teacher as a person and a teacher rather than as a Negro.

> "I do have one senior high school predominantly white in which there is one Negro teacher. Nobody thinks in terms of her race and she is regarded by all of us as one of the outstanding secondary teachers in the school system."

"We have in our employ one Negro principal. She has served for three years in a school where the large majority of both children and teachers are white. For many years prior to her selection as principal, she taught in the same school. Parents, teachers, and pupils consider her a very successful elementary school principal."

"Frankly, I cannot tell you how many Negro teachers we employ, neither can I report as to the number of teachers who are members of other races. I am personally acquainted with some of the Negroes now employed by the school district and am proud to say that one of the strongest kindergarten teachers in the system is a young Negro girl who is doing an outstanding piece of work. Indidentally, she is assigned to a kindergarten in a residential area where there are no Negro families. Her race has nothing to do with the assignment. As a matter of fact, the area which she serves has the largest percentage of parents who are college graduates of any area in the...system. They understand education and demand the best."

"We find that the policy followed is generally successful and that parents appreciate the efforts of teachers regardless of race."

Only a few of the reporting Superintendents indicate that there were some complaints, and these tell an eloquent story of the administrator's role as integration begins.

"At the beginning there were a few complaints from white people who had come from the south about having their children with Negro teachers. However, when they understood that the teachers were of excellent quality, their objections were soon overcome."

"Once or twice, one or two parents did question Negro teachers in classes that were predominantly white. I pointed out in very friendly fashion to these parents that we do not operate segregated schools and that in selecting teachers ...we select them purely upon the basis of ability and not upon any basis of race, religion, or anything else. From our personal point of view we feel this policy has been generally very successful."

"There are many superior individuals regardless of race and, given comparable educational advantages, these individuals will naturally come to the top. So long as such individuals are recognized because of merit the position of a school administrator is entirely defensible. Any other position will lead to endless controversy in our opinion."

The record shows an absence of storm and stress surrounding the interracial policy. In the overwhelming majority of cases, a calm community acceptance prevails.

"We employ a number of Negro teachers, and they are assigned on the same basis as any other teacher. In the little over three years that I have been here I have never had a single complaint or criticism of this policy, and it seems to be completely successful."

"We have had no difficulty with interracial staffs in our city."

"We have had no incidents arising because of interracial staffing."

"Into

"Interracial staffs are used irrespective of the make-up of the student body... This policy has proven quite successful and, to the best of my knowledge, we have not had any critical situation arise in any district because of it. As a matter of fact, during the four and one-half years I have been on the Superintendent's staff, there have been only two letters of complaint about this policy and they were of no consequence."

III. Conclusions

The 55 letters summarized here report on the policy of using white and Negro teachers on the same staffs in city school systems. From analysis of these replies, the following conclusions may be drawn.:

1. Interracial staffs are employed in a number of cities, which represent many geographic areas, and show great variation in community racial pattern and reputation for discrimination or non-discrimination.

2. Interracial staffs are used with interracial student bodies, with all-Negro student bodies, and with all-white student bodies. Almost every conceivable variation is reported.

3. Success of co-employment of teachers is consistently reported. Successful experience is generally reported with pride of accomplishment, while explanation and apology are offered in many cases for slowness of progress.

4. Many report a recent change in policy or recent progress in non-discriminatory placement. This indicates that change is occurring in the direction of employment on merit.

ADDRESS BY ASSISTANT ATTORNEY GENERAL
BURKE MARSHALL BEFORE THE 53rd ANNUAL CONVENTION OF THE NAACP
ATLANTA, GEORGIA
JULY 2, 1962

I am very happy to have the opportunity to speak to the Lawyers' Conference of the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund. I feel like a student in law school addressing the members of the faculty. But I am trying to make progress and learn.

My work during the past 16 months has made me deeply aware of the debt our legal structure owes to the Fund and the members of this Conference. Almost everything we do in the Department of Justice to enforce and preserve the civil rights of our citizens has been shaped and made possible by rules of law developed in cases which were in their turn fashioned by the staff of the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund, and by the members of its Lawyers' Committee. Judge Thurgood Marshall, who is now as fine an ornament of the bench as he was of the bar, argued 32 cases to the Supreme Court before he received his judicial appointment in October 1961. Six other cases have now been argued by the present Director-Counsel and Associate Counsel for the Fund. The decisions in these cases have made a great contribution not only to the law but also to the social and political progress of the United States. I know of no contribution to the law equal to that which has been made in this way through the seeking of the realization of the rights of Negroes in America through the law.

The Solicitor General of the United States, Archibald Cox, is fond of quoting an ancient saying of Bracton -- "not under man but under God and law." This surely expresses one of the essential elements of our society and of western civilization. The decisions of the Supreme Court and the orders of the lower federal courts in the civil rights field have caused great emotion and great bitterness. But this is a necessary result of the achievement of revolutionary social and economic change through legal growth. Law exists to serve the needs of men, and when the needs of men are revolutionary in nature -- as has been true of the needs of Negroes in the United States in the past -- the courts and the processes of the law are blamed for doing what must be done. Yet the alternative is either chaos or rigid control through dictatorship without regard to the law. So it is best that the contemporary conflicts in society are reflected in tensions in the law, and are resolved through decisions under the law.

The conflict in society which cuts the deepest today in this country is between the ideals of liberty and equality of the Declaration of Independence -- that all men are created free and are equal before the law -- and the deep-rooted attitudes and social customs, North as well as South, which antedate the Declaration. The Legal Defense Fund and all of you have been deeply involved in the work of resolving this conflict through the law. The conflict itself is so clear and so personal in the daily lives of so many people -- both those struggling for the achievement of full civil rights and those resisting change -- that the legal issues to the public must seem equally clear and subject to easy resolution. Yet the fact is that there is an increasing danger of oversimplifying the task of the lawyers and the courts, and of failing to take into account conflicting principles which are ~~at stake.~~ beginning to emerge.

It is natural for the public at large and for the country to ignore the complexities of constitutional law where basic principles are involved. Since John Marshall was Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, it has been misunderstood, criticized and freely attacked for its constitutional decisions. In a different area, where other fundamental individual liberties were at stake, we have witnessed within the last week an example of this process.

Last Monday the Court decided that the State of New York could not -- consistently with the First and Fourteenth Amendments -- require a simple and non-denominational prayer, prepared by State officials, to be said aloud by the classes in the public schools of New York at the beginning of each school day. No sooner had the decision been handed down than the Court was violently attacked throughout the country -- by church groups, political leaders, and private citizens -- as hostile to religion and the destroyer of our basis heritage.

Yet when the Court's opinion is understood and put into perspective, nothing could be further from the truth.

As anyone who was in the Court last Monday could bear witness the opinion of the Court did not attack religion. Rather, it reflected deep religious convictions. The Court said that the history of man is inseparable from the history of religion, that it was not too much to say that since the beginning of that history many people have devotedly believed that "more things are wrought by prayer than this world dreams of." And Mr. Justice Black knew full well, and said, that men with that kind of faith in the power of prayer led the fight for the adoption of the Constitution and for the Bill of Rights.

It was not hostility to religion that brought the Court to its decision. It was the conviction, embodied in the First Amendment, that the governments in this country should stay out of the business of writing or sanctioning official prayers, and should leave what the Court called "that purely religious function" to the people and those to whom the people look for religious guidance.

This was surely not a startling innovation or a radial conclusion. As in almost all areas of constitutional law, it is a matter of degree. No one would argue, for example, that the state could compel the creed of a particular religion to be read aloud in a classroom each morning. There are too many members of other creeds, with equally deep religious convictions, who would be offended. And that is precisely what the First Amendment was intended to prevent.

It is true that the people who are protected by the Court's decision last Monday are probably very few -- without influence, without political power, without organization, and without many defenders. They are on the fringes of religious society -- either people with such strict religious convictions that they object to any prayer not of their own denomination, or ~~dedicated~~ atheists.

But it is precisely because these people are few that it is most important for their rights to be guarded and preserved, and that it is necessary that this be done through a rule of law not easily discarded at a moment of passion. The only basis on which this could be achieved, and the action of New York yet defended, would be on the ground that the prayer was in fact so devoid of content or of religious significance that its official sanction and compulsory use by the state did not constitute a religious act.

We do have a spiritual and religious heritage. But its heart is not in the adoption by any state of an official prayer or other religious observation. It is in the preservation of the United States as a place in which our citizens -- in the language of the Court -- can pray when they please to the God of their faith in the language they choose. In my judgment, this heritage has not been advanced by the attacks on the Court during the past week.

The attacks on the Court are the product of a failure to understand what the Court was deciding, what issues were at stake, and what reasons compelled its action. This is familiar to all of you. Such misunderstanding is common in civil rights cases, as it is in all cases involving the preservation of individual liberties. So it is part of the duty of the bar to try to explain the workings of our constitutional system as well as we can, and to make known and as clear as possible the conflicting issues and currents of law that are involved in the great constitutional decisions of the Court.

The Court is approaching now, and has been for some time, a constitutional issue as deep and complex and difficult as any it has ever faced. The issue arises from the display of idealism and courage that has been made in sit-in demonstrations at lunch counters and restaurants throughout the South and the border states. These matters are before the courts in many cases now. Nevertheless I think it appropriate and right for everyone to recognize the dimensions of the problems in these cases -- that the considerations are not all one way; that the processes and substance of the law that is involved are not as simple or clear as they must appear to be either to the Negro student who is refused service solely because of the color of his skin or to the restaurant owner who feels he has a right to conduct his business in accordance with the long-standing custom of his community.

The realization of the civil rights of the Negro in the United States through the law has thus far been by test case. The sit-in movement is different. It is a mass demonstration movement rather than one by carefully chosen test. This has achieved results in many communities without the pressure of the law, and that has been one of the great accomplishments and great sources of encouragement in very recent years. But the same arithmetic inflames passions and creates great unrest. This has legal as well as other results. It may in some instances justify action under the law which could not be defended if one person, and one test, were involved. I am sure that you are all aware of the legal history of the sit-down strikes -- an effective method of economic advance for the labor movement which was nevertheless finally struck down by the courts.

The sit-ins are not comparable to the sit-down strikes as a legal matter or in other ways. But they do demonstrate that the social utility of a method of demonstration does not always match its legal consequences.

The mass involvement in the sit-in movement also makes it necessary to look carefully at each case and each record. There may finally be different results in different cases. The diversity of considerations raised is illustrated -- and probably intentionally so - by cases which have now been accepted for decision by the Supreme Court -- a trespass charge from a sit-in in Kress' in Greenville, South Carolina, where there is a municipal ordinance requiring separate racial facilities; a similar case arising from Birmingham department and dime stores, coupled with the convictions of two Negro leaders there on charges of inciting the demonstrators to trespass; some unlawful assembly charges from Savannah against Negro boys for playing with a basketball on the so-called white city playground; criminal mischief charges arising from a sit-in in McCrory's Department Store in New Orleans; trespass charges based upon the presence of Negro youths in the Glen Echo Amusement Park outside Washington; and finally a trespass charge arising simply for a sit-in at another Kress' store in Durham, North Carolina.

There is of course a single, central and common public fact in this variety of cases. That is the fact that in each case a wrong has been done. Someone has been treated differently -- refused service -- for racial reasons alone, and that is contrary to our entire national policy and to all of the main currents of western thought and democratic principles.

But all lawyers know that it is not that easy for the Court, that the Court does not simply decide when a moral or economic or social wrong has been done, and that each of these cases may look greatly different to the Court under the Constitution. It would be improper for me to say outside a brief to the Court what positions, if any, the United States will express in these cases. But it is proper and useful, as the Solicitor General said in a speech on this subject at Princeton last April, for everyone to recognize and face up to the problems in the cases that the Court itself cannot escape.

Obviously the argument for the prosecution in the sit-in cases is that the decision not to serve Negroes at the lunch counters -- the decision to discriminate -- was the private decision of the owner of the premises, and that the State, when it prosecuted, was simply giving effect upon a wholly non-discriminatory basis to the right of a private property-holder to determine whom he will invite upon his premises and for what purposes. The States will argue that they would prosecute for criminal trespass anyone who persisted in remaining upon or using any private property against the will of the owner, however, sensible or selfish, moral or immoral, discriminatory or non-discriminatory the owner's motivation might be. They are treating all owners and all trespassers exactly alike, and not denying anyone equal protection of the laws.

In the legal world of shadows this argument might be compelling were it not for the Supreme Court's decision in Shelley v. Kraemer. Much the same argument was made in Shelley v. Kraemer, for there the discrimination originated in the private decision by the original owner of the land. But the Court rejected that contention. And as a result it is now frequently asserted that for a State government to back up private racial discrimination with the force of its laws and court decrees is sufficient State action to violate the Fourteenth Amendment.

But again, it is not really that simple.

In Shelley the decision to discriminate was not really that of a person privately interested in the situation. The covenant was inserted by a former owner somewhere back in the claim of title. Indeed the State court was really interfering with the free private decisions of the seller and the Negro purchaser to buy and sell the land. For a State to enforce restrictive racial covenants covering large blocks of land and written ten, twenty or fifty years earlier by persons who have scattered to other neighborhoods is in substance to write a public zoning ordnance requiring racial discrimination; and such an ordnance would be manifestly unconstitutional.

Further, the argument that Shelley forbids a State to back up any private discrimination with the force of law proves too much, and is weakened by that fact. The argument is unrelated to the character of the facilities involved. As stated so simply, it applies to the use of the State police power to enforce discrimination by a private club, or even in a private dwelling.

Everyone knows that something else must be involved because racial discrimination at a lunch counter in a department store open to the public is very different in its consequences and causes from discrimination which is not commercial or economic. But the police are there in both cases, and the Court will have to decide whether it can draw a line. So the problem must be faced.

I have referred in connection with the Engel case decided last week to the Court's protection of the right of the individual to pray when and how he chooses. We must recognize also in the sit-in cases the presence of a similar problem. The Court will inescapably be made aware of the values which in fact exist in allowing free individual decisions upon what is essentially a moral or ethical question, so long as the State does not put its finger on the scale when the decision is being made. The Engel case of course enforced the policy of religious freedom that is explicitly written into the Constitution. But even where no religious question is present, freedom to decide means freedom to be foolish as well as wise, to be wrong as well as right; indeed the chief justification for freedom is that it calls upon man to exercise his noblest quality -- the power of choice between good and evil. The States undoubtedly have power to forbid racial discrimination on the part of the owners of department stores, bus lines and other public places, but one way -- although an incomplete one -- of putting the question here is whether the Constitution forbids them to adopt the philosophy that this is a question upon which each property owner should be free to make his own decision.

And finally, the Court will be unable to escape the problem that everyone knows exists in these cases -- of self-help and force. To base the conclusion that the conviction of the "sit-in" demonstrators for criminal trespass is State action violating the Fourteenth Amendment solely upon the State's participation in arresting and prosecuting the demonstrators, while at the same time recognizing that the decision not to serve Negroes was private action not subject to the Fourteenth Amendment, would seem unduly to curtail the power of a State to preserve public order and might constitute an invitation to violence. Normally, when a property owner has the right to decide to whom he will open his premises, and for what purposes, he also has the right to use reasonable force to remove an unwanted intruder; and if the intruder resists, the owner is privileged to use the force necessary to protect himself against the resistance. It seems hardly a constructive solution to say that a property owner may make the private decision to enforce segregation and may resort to force to make it effective, but that the Fourteenth Amendment is violated if the State offers a peaceful way of effectuating his decision.

It would seem to me, therefore, that any decision invalidating the prosecution and conviction of "sit-in" demonstrators for criminal trespass must take in some of the consideration of Marsh v. Alabama as well as Shelley v. Kraemer. It must move in the direction of espousing the broader proposition that there is unconstitutional State action in maintaining a legal system which allows those who open their doors to the general public systematically and en masse to refuse certain services to Negro customers as a badge of inferiority. The real vice in the racial covenants when enforced by the State was that they tended to become the equivalent of State laws or municipal zoning ordnances. Similarly, the refusal of department store owners to allow white and Negro customers to eat together is the product of a social system. Obviously a somewhat different situation is presented where -- as is true now in one of the major cities of the South - nine of the ten leading department stores in a community serve

EXECUTIONS--1930-1964

INTRODUCTION

Fifteen executions were carried out by civil authorities in the United States during calendar year 1964. This is the lowest number of executions in any of the 35 years covered by this report—and six fewer than the 21 recorded in 1963.

A total of 3,849 prisoners have been executed under civil authority in the United States from 1930 through 1964. As Chart 1 indicates, there has been a general decline during this period in the use of the death penalty, from a high of 199 in 1935 to the low of 15 last year.

During the period covered, executions carried out under State authorities numbered 3,816, or more than 99 percent of the total, while the 33 Federal executions accounted for less than 1 percent.[1]

COVERAGE

The information for these reports is submitted annually to the National Prisoner Statistics program of the Federal Bureau of Prisons by cooperating prison officials in the 44 jurisdictions which had legal provisions for the death penalty during 1964. These included 42 States, the District of Columbia, and the Federal government.

At the close of 1964, capital punishment was illegal in nine States of the Union. Oregon in 1964 became the latest State to abolish the death penalty, when a public referendum carried with 60 percent of the vote in the November election. Michigan abolished capital punishment in 1846 for all crimes except treason, and in 1963 also eliminated the death penalty for this offense. North Dakota abolished capital punishment in 1915, Minnesota in 1911, Maine in 1887, Wisconsin in 1853, and Rhode Island in 1852. Alaska and Hawaii eliminated the death penalty in 1957, shortly before achieving statehood.

However, two of these States retain the death penalty for certain exceptional crimes. North Dakota provides the death penalty for treason, as well as for first degree murder committed by a prisoner serving a life sentence for first degree murder. Rhode Island has a mandatory death sentence for prisoners convicted of committing murder while serving a life sentence for any offense.

In addition to the nine States in which the death penalty is not now in effect, three other States have, during the past 35 years, experimented with abolition for varying periods of time—South Dakota from 1915 to 1938, Kansas from 1907 to 1934, and Delaware from 1958 to 1961.

Information is presented in this report on all prisoners executed under civil authority from 1930 through 1964. In addition, for the years 1960-64, data are presented on prisoners received from court under sentence of death, prisoners under sentence of death whose cases were disposed of by means other than execution, and prisoners who were under the death sentence at the end of the year. Prisoners under sentence of death who are being held in local or county jails ordinarily are not included in National Prisoner Statistics figures. Two exceptions are (1) prisoners held in the Cook County, Illinois Jail and the District of Columbia Jail (the only local institutions in which executions are carried out), and (2) a few cases in States where prisoners awaiting execution in State prisons are subsequently returned to a local jail pending outcome of an appeal or other legal action.

The "under sentence of death" interval begins when the court first pronounces the sentence of death and terminates either at the time of execution or at the time of some other disposition which releases the individual from the sentence of death, such as commutation, transfer to a mental hospital, grant of a new trial, reversal of judgment, vacated sentence, suicide, or death from natural causes. Many prisoners "under sentence of death" at the close of 1964 had received short stays or reprieves granted by State governors. In addition, a large number had appeals before State or Federal courts. The remainder had their dates of execution set for sometime in 1965—although these prisoners, too, could still appeal or receive executive or judicial stays.

EXECUTIONS CARRIED OUT IN EIGHT JURISDICTIONS

The declining number of executions since 1930 has been accompanied by a decrease in the number of jurisdictions implementing the death penalty.

In 1930, executions were carried out in 32 jurisdictions in the United States. This number held fairly constant until 1945, but generally declined from that time until 1964, when only eight jurisdictions implemented the death penalty. Table 2 indicates that since 1930 the 17 jurisdictions in the Southern region of the United States have accounted for 2,304, or 59.9 percent, of the 3,849 executions carried out during this period.

The eight jurisdictions holding executions in 1964 were Texas with five; Florida, Georgia, and Missouri with two each; and Alabama, Arkansas, Colorado, and Mississippi with one each. Five of these eight jurisdictions—Florida, Georgia, Mississippi, Missouri and Texas—also had executions in 1963.

METHOD OF EXECUTION

Eleven of the 15 executions in 1964 were by electrocution, and the remaining four were carried out in the gas chamber. Among the jurisdictions which retain the death penalty, 24 prescribe electrocution, eleven lethal gas, seven hanging, and one shooting or hanging. Executions ordered by the Federal courts are carried out in accordance with the method used by the State in which the sentence is imposed. If the laws of the State prohibit capital punishment, the court designates another State in which the sentence is to be carried out. Methods of execution in 1964 in the respective jurisdictions are shown in Table 2.

OFFENSE, RACE, SEX, AND AGE

Of the 15 men executed in 1964, nine were sentenced for murder and six for rape. Eight of those executed were white and seven were Negro; five whites and four Negroes were sentenced for murder, and three whites and three Negroes for rape. The median age was 31.9 years, and ranged from a 19-year old Negro executed in Texas for rape to a 44-year old Negro executed in Florida for murder. The median age was 32.9 years for the eight whites and 27.5 years for the seven Negroes.

Table 1 indicates that 2,064, or 53.6 percent, of the 3,849 prisoners executed in the United States from 1930 through 1964 were Negro, 1,743 or 45.3 percent were white, and 42 or 1.1 percent were of other races. Figure B shows that 19 of the 42 were American Indians, 13 were Filipinos, eight were Chinese, and two were Japanese.

Executions for murder account for 3,325, or 86.4 percent, of the executions carried out under civil authority in the United States since 1930. These were divided almost evenly between whites and non-whites. There were 455 executions for rape during the 35 year period, and 407, or 89.5 percent of these were nonwhite. (Table 3)

Figures C and D present information on the 32 women executed in the United States since 1930. Twenty of these were white and 12 were Negro. Except for the two Federal executions —one for espionage and one for kidnaping— all of the 32 were executed for murder.

ELAPSED TIME FROM SENTENCE OF DEATH TO EXECUTION

"Elapsed time from sentence of death to execution" refers to the period between the first imposition of the death penalty and the date of execution. The median elapsed time for those executed in 1964 was 20.5 months, and ranged from two months and three days for a rapist executed in Texas, to four years, two months and 17 days for a murderer executed in Alabama.

(a) "Elapsed time" for those executed is the period between the first imposition of the death penalty and the date of execution. In the case of those whose cases were disposed of by other means, it is the period between the date of the first imposition of the death sentence and the time of other disposition. For prisoners awaiting execution at year's end, elapsed time is computed from the date of the first imposition of the death sentence to Dec. 31, 1964.

Three of the 15 prisoners executed in 1964 had been sentenced that year, four in 1963, two each in 1962 and 1961, and four in 1960.

The elapsed time from sentencing to date of execution is determined by several factors. In addition to State laws governing the date of execution there are appeals, which may be made at all levels of the State courts as well as to the United States Supreme Court. These, together with judicial and executive orders granting stays or reprieves, account for the variation in elapsed time.

PRISONERS SENTENCED TO DEATH IN 1964

During 1964, 98 prisoners were sentenced to death—seven more than the 91 reported in 1963. Of the total, eighty-nine were convicted for murder, and 9 for rape. All of the 98 were males; 52 were white and 46 were Negro.

At the close of 1964, 90 of the 98 were still under sentence of death, three had been executed, and five had their cases disposed of by means other than execution (two were granted new trials, two were transferred to mental hospitals, and one died of natural causes).

OTHER DISPOSITIONS NOT RESULTING IN EXECUTION

During calendar year 1964, the sentences of 68 prisoners (65 males and 3 females) were disposed of by means other than execution. As noted, these "other dispositions" include commutations, transfers to mental hospitals, grants of new trials, reversals of judgment, vacated sentences, suicides, and deaths by natural causes. Figure G indicates that there were more "other dispositions" in 1964 than in any year since 1960, when this information first became available.

Fifty-five of these 68 "other dispositions" had their death sentences reversed, vacated, or were granted new trials (twelve of these were re-convicted and sentenced to prison terms), nine had their sentences commuted (eight to life and one to life plus 20 years), three were transferred to mental hospitals, and one died of natural causes.

Sixty-two of the 68 prisoners receiving a disposition other than execution had been sentenced for murder, and six for rape. The median elapsed time (the period from first imposition of the death sentence to the date of "other disposition") for the 68 was 23.5 months, and ranged from five days for a prisoner granted a new trial in Virginia, to eight years, nine months and 20 days for a prisoner granted a new trial in Illinois.

PRISONERS UNDER SENTENCE OF DEATH AT THE CLOSE OF 1964

At the beginning of 1964, 300 prisoners were under sentence of death. Including the 98 prisoners received from court during the year, the total number of prisoners under sentence of daeth during the year was 398. Of these, 15 were executed, 68 had their cases disposed of by means other than execution, and 315 were awaiting execution at the end of the year. This marks the highest year-end population awaiting execution since 1953 when statistics on this subject first became available.

Of the 315 prisoners awaiting execution at year's end, 267 had been sentenced for murder, 44 for rape, two for kidnaping (New Hampshire), one for assault by a life prisoner (California), and one for burglary (Alabama).

More than half (52 percent) of the prisoners awaiting execution at the close of 1964 were distributed among six States: California had 49, Florida 32, Louisiana 24, New York 21, Maryland 19, and Alabama 18.

The median age of the 315 awaiting execution at year's end was 30.4 years, and ranged from a 17-year old convicted of murder in Alabama, to a 63-year old murderer in New Jersey. One 18-year old and four 19-year olds were among the prisoners awaiting execution at year's end—all five of whom were convicted of murder.

Elapsed time for this group is computed from the first imposition of the death sentence to December 31, 1964. The median elapsed time for the total group was 26.8 months. The longest elapsed time was 11 years, nine months and eight days—for two Negro prisoners convicted of aggravated rape in Louisiana.

MOVEMENT OF PRISONERS UNDER SENTENCE OF DEATH: 1960-1964

In 1960 the Federal Bureau of Prisons revised the data collection form submitted to the officials participating in the "Executions" aspect of the National Prisoner Statistics program. The new form provided data on the number of prisoners under sentence of death at the beginning and end of the year, the number of prisoners received from court under sentence of death during the year, and the disposition of prisoners under sentence of death. The information derived from the expanded program is summarized in Figure G. As shown, the five year period from 1960 through 1964 was characterized by:

(1) a general decrease in the annual number of prisoners received from court under sentence of death; (2) a general decrease in the number of prisoners executed under civil authority in the United States each year; (3) an increase in the number of prisoners whose cases were disposed of by means other than execution; (4) an increase in the number of prisoners awaiting execution at year's end (a low of 210 in 1960 to a high of 315 in 1964); and (5) an increase in elapsed time for those awaiting execution at year's end (a low of 13.4 months in 1960 to a high of 26.8 months in 1964).

MILITARY EXECUTIONS

Executions carried out by the armed forces are excluded from this report. For the 35 year period since 1930, the Army (including Air Force) carried out 160 executions—148 of these during the period 1942-1950, three each in 1954, 1955, and 1957 and one each in 1958, 1959, and 1961. Of the 160 executions, 106 were for murder (including 21 involving rape), 53 were for rape and one was for desertion. The Navy has executed no one since 1849.

(a) The number of prisoners under sentence of death on January 1 is higher than recorded at the close of the preceding year for two reasons: (1) a few prisoners sentenced to death are not always brought to the attention of reporting authorities until the following year; and (2) a few prisoners previously reported as having been "disposed of by other means" by reason of having been granted a new trial, are subsequently re-sentenced to death but are included in the current "awaiting execution at beginning of year" figure rather than being counted as a new court commitment.

(b) Information not available for 1960.

(c) Includes reversals of judgment, vacated sentences, grants for new trial, suicide, or death from natural causes.

January 6, 1967

TO: Cooperating Organizations
FROM: Arnold Aronson, Secretary

JANUARY 10th: OUR CHANCE TO CHANGE THE FILIBUSTER RULE

Within this week, the fight to change the filibuster rule will be joined on the Senate floor. When the 90th Congress convenes on January 10th, the first order of business will be the adoption of its rules. And that is when our chance to modify Rule XXII occurs.

The Leadership Conference, as our last few MEMOs and messages attest, has been working to mobilize support for a change that will make it easier to end filibusters. At this moment the prospects for a change look good. They will look even better if we can have your help in these last few days.

A Majority Should Prevail

Our canvasses of the members of the new Senate indicate a majority is ready to modify Rule XXII and ease the strangle-hold of unlimited debate. What needs to be established is that at the opening of a new Congress a majority can adopt and change the rules and not two-thirds of those present and voting.

A bipartisan group of six Senators has already argued this view in a round robin letter to all Senate members. They affirm the position advanced by Vice President Nixon in a 1957 advisory opinion that "when the membership of the Senate changes...the majority of the new existing membership...under the Constitution, has the power to determine the rules under which the Senate will proceed." Those signing the letter were Senators Joseph S. Clark (D., Pa.) and Clifford P. Case (R., N.J.), joined by Philip A. Hart (D., Mich.), Jacob K. Javits (R., N.Y.), William Proxmire (D., Wisc.) and Thomas H. Kuchel (R., Calif.).

Both the New York Times and the Washington Post, in editorials we include with this MEMO, urge the Senate to act so that it can be more responsive to the will of the majority. The Times says, rightly, "time-wasting talkathons do not enhance the deliberative process of the Senate; they stultify it. A majority of the Senate can reassert proper control over its own work by abolishing the filibuster in the new Congress."

The Post declares "the time has come to sweep away this irrational handicap." And we agree with that.

Your Support Is Needed Now

Heads of the national organizations that participate in the Leadership Conference and their Washington representatives will be convening here in Washington on January 11th and change of Rule XXII is one of the matters to which they will direct their attention. What is needed now is evidence of public support for a change in Rule XXII. If your organization has not already done so, now is the time to adopt a resolution urging the Senate to modify Rule XXII. Send it to 100 Senators. Much of what we hope to see accomplished in this Congress may depend upon the establishment of majority rule in the Senate.

AN INDEPENDENT NEWSPAPER THURSDAY, JANUARY 5, 1967

First Job for the Senate

The first major decision the Senate will have to make in 1967 is whether to continue its deference to minority rule. A group of Senators will try once more to upset the notorious Rule 22, which requires a vote of two thirds of the Senators present and voting to cut off debate. If they succeed, a new era of majority control will begin in the Senate. If they fail, the country will continue to be plagued by the filibuster with its frustration of the national will in many vital areas of policymaking.

Numerous efforts to upset Rule 22 have failed in the past in some measure because they have been linked with the argument that the Senate is not a continuing body and is therefore entitled to adopt new rules at the beginning of each new session. Since the Senate has traditionally functioned as a continuing body, this line of reasoning has met with stiff resistance. But a shift of emphasis this year could lead to better results. It is entirely reasonable to argue that, even though the Senate is a continuing body, its members have a right at the beginning of a new Congress to modify their rules by majority action if they so desire.

This right stems from the Constitution, which provides that "a majority of each [house] shall constitute a quorum to do business" and that "each house may determine the rules of its proceedings." In effect Rule 22, as it now stands, denies this right of majority control, for it permits a minority to defeat any change in the rules by an endless filibuster.

The first responsibility for initiating a change will fall upon Vice President Humphrey. He will be asked to rule that the Senate has authority to adopt new rules at the beginning of its session under ordinary parliamentary procedure, Rule 22 notwithstanding. If he does so, an appeal to the Senate will be taken, but any Senator could then move to force the issue, thus cutting off debate. And if a majority should sustain the Vice President, majority cloture could then be adopted by a majority vote of those present.

In 1963 Vice President Johnson, who is the author of the present two-thirds cloture rule, declined to make the ruling that will be sought from Mr. Humphrey. He took the view that the Vice President does not have power "to determine when he thinks Senators have talked enough." But this seems to us an evasion of the real issue. What the Vice President is asked to do is not to determine the issue for the Senate but to give the Senate an opportunity to decide for itself—without being frustrated by endless debate.

Vice President Nixon gave an advisory opinion in 1957 that the Senate could adopt new rules "under whatever procedures the majority of the Senate approves." Rule 22, he concluded, could not deny the membership of the Senate "the power to exercise its constitutional right to make its own rules." Here is the nub of the issue. As it now operates the undemocratic Rule 22 is depriving the Senate of its constitutional right to make rules by majority action.

Of course the fact that the Senate attempted to insulate its rules against change unless a two-thirds vote to end debate could be obtained, does not alter the constitutional provision for majority action. We think the Senate ought to put the Constitution above Rule 22, and this will create an opportunity to change the rule by majority vote.

Aside from the constitutional question, the reform is long overdue. Filibusters waste an inordinate amount of time in the Senate and often result in minority decisions on the most vital issues. The time has come to sweep away this irrational handicap on the Senate without prejudice to its standing as a continuing body.

Majority Rule in the Senate

The filibuster has for too long besmirched the reputation of the United States Senate. It is a parliamentary device that enables a minority to outvote a majority. It is an opportunity for die-hards to substitute stubbornness and lung power for compromise and reason in the conduct of public business, and to do so successfully. Once regarded as the shield for the racial preferences of a particular region, it has become the handy weapon for all sorts of special interests.

When the Senate meets next week to organize for the coming two years, it has its biennial opportunity to revise the rule that permits the filibuster. As matters now stand, a vote of two-thirds of the members present and voting is required to end debate on any issue, including the question of revising the rules themselves. But when the Senate of a new Congress organizes, it does not have to continue the old rules in force. It can simply decide by majority vote to close debate and adopt new rules.

The only requirement is that the Vice President, the presiding officer of the Senate, affirm that the majority does have this power at the outset of a new Congress. If there are the votes to back up his judgment, there can be no reversion to filibuster. Richard M. Nixon, while serving as Vice President, twice expressed this opinion, but the votes were not present to sustain him. Vice President Humphrey will have a comparable opportunity next week. Since he publicly agreed with Mr. Nixon's rulings in the past, there is no reason to suppose that he will reverse himself now that the responsibility has passed to him.

It used to be argued that the rules automatically continued in force since the Senate is a "continuing body." But, clearly, it continues only in the severely limited sense that its members have overlapping terms.

Otherwise, all proposed bills, treaties and resolutions die every two years at adjournment. The committees and employes of the Senate also have to be redesignated biennially.

Time-wasting talkathons do not enhance the deliberative process of the Senate; they stultify it. A majority of the Senate can reassert proper control over its own work by abolishing the filibuster in the new Congress.

A FILIBUSTER STOPS THE DRIVE AGAINST FILIBUSTERS

If only there were some way to drape this MEMO black! The fight to change the filibuster rule at the opening of the 90th Congress had good prospects for success. It is painful to have to record now how that effort was defeated.

Every Congress Since 1953

To those who are sick of seeing the Senate strangle good legislation in talk and who have waged the campaign to change Rule 22 every two years since 1953, the new Congress appeared to offer a splendid opportunity. Vice President Humphrey, who as a Senator was one of the half dozen men who initiated the first effort to change the Rule, was going to preside. It seemed fairly certain he would make the crucial ruling: that a majority of the Senate has the power at the opening of a new Congress to change its rules. It also appeared that the mood of the incoming Senators was favorable for change.

The Campaign Begins

On January 12, the principal bipartisan resolutions to change Rule 22 were introduced by Senators George McGovern (D., S.D.) and Thomas Kuchel (R., Calif.) As always happens, the proposals were met with a filibuster by Southern Democrats and Republican reactionaries, ready to defend the Senate's sacred right to talk itself to death.

On Wednesday, January 18, a carefully planned move to stop the filibuster got underway and here the action moved into the rarified, chess-like atmosphere of higher parliamentary procedure. Mr. McGovern, whose resolution to take up a rules change was on the floor, moved under the Constitution that the debate be ended, a motion that he said could be adopted by a majority. Minority Leader Everett M. Dirksen raised a point of order, insisting a majority could not close debate. Mr. McGovern then indicated he was ready to move to table the point of order. This was the situation when Vice President Humphrey was asked to rule. Without facing the issue directly, he set in motion the procedure that would have made it possible for a simple majority to end debate and get on with the business of modifying Rule 22. The best hope for modification seemed to lie with the McGovern resolution, which would have reduced the number of Senators needed to end a filibuster from two-thirds of those present and voting to three-fifths, from at most 67 Senators to 60.

The Fear of Majority Rule

That resolution was never reached. McGovern and his colleagues contended that a majority could end debate in the Senate only at the opening of the session and then only on the issue of a change in the rules. But the opposition, headed by Senator Dirksen, proceeded to intimidate a good many Senators by arguing that the vote on the rules would establish a precedent whereby a majority could vote to end debate at any time on virtually any issue. Majority Leader Mike Mansfield (D., Mont.), a professed advocate of the three-fifths change, added to the pressures against voting with McGovern by taking up Dirksen's argument and warning that the procedure advocated by McGovern and the other champions of change would "destroy the character of the Senate as a parliamentary body." He and Dirksen and others of the opponents foresaw dire if fanciful possibilities: times when a mere handful of Senators, 6 or 7, could close debate and push the country into war or violate the rules and add legislation to an appropriations bill. In the end they prevailed. When the critical vote needed to close debate came up, the vote on the McGovern motion to table the Dirksen point of order, the needed majority wasn't there. It had dwindled down to 37 Senators who were ready to go against the combined leadership of the Senate. We enclose the vote on the McGovern motion with this MEMO.

On To Cloture

When the McGovern motion went down, the only thing left to do was to try to end debate by means of the old Rule 22. In short, two-thirds of the Senate had to be marshalled in support of changing the rule that two-thirds are needed to break a filibuster. And so the old vicious circle was set in motion again, with predictable results. The cloture petition was filed on the 19th, taken up on Tuesday, January 24, and beaten by a vote of 53 to 46. We enclose that vote with this MEMO, too. So ended the effort for 1967. Mansfield, who sometimes gives up too quickly, saw no reason to continue, even though a majority could have kept up the fight, particularly in the early days of the session when there is very little other business to consider.

A Dirksen Doublecross

It is impossible to finish this account without mentioning something more about Senator Dirksen's role in the Rule 22 maneuvers. On January 18, when he was arguing against the right of a majority to close debate, he raised a hope that he might be willing to work out some sort of compromise. "Iam in the mood now," he said, in the Senate's most cajoling voice, "if they file a cloture motion....to put my name on it and see where we go. I would then give assurance to the Senator from South Dakota (McGovern) that I will sit down with him and see if we cannot negotiate a reasonable time to discuss this matter and let it come to a vote. I do not mind. I am prepared to do it, and surely in the wisdom and genius of this body we can find the right answer without forfeiting the safeguards that have meant so much to this country."

If this meant anything, it appeared to many of his listeners to mean he would join the cloture move and support a three-fifths reform. But with Dirksen things are seldom how they seem. He signed the cloture petition but he told the press he would vote against it.

Without his help the effort was doomed. Roy Wilkins, chairman of the Leadership Conference, who had been watching the cloture fight from the gallery, emerged to tell reporters, "Senator Dirksen is inexplicable." He was struck, he said, by Dirksen's argument that the Senate is a continuing body and has not changed since its first session in 1789. "The fact that there haven't been any changes is what's wrong with the Senate," he declared. He had a warning of his own. The Senate's inability to change a rule that has been used historically to block civil rights legislation and was used precisely for that purpose in 1966, would be noted and cited by extremists as an illustration of the futility of trying to win equal rights through established channels.

What's Left?

The Senate's inability to change Rule 22 because of a fear of what a majority might do, leaves intact a rule that permits a minority to continue to dictate to the body. Senators representing less than 12 percent of the population, can continue to block the will of the majority whenever they are disposed to do so.

But the effort so many put into this year's campaign is not wasted. Something has been established. As the Washington Post pointed out editorially, "the Vice President's ruling will stand as a precedent. It means the anti-filibuster forces are free to press a motion for majority cloture at the beginning of any Senate session, that when a point of order is made against such a motion it can be voted down by a simple majority and that motion for cloture reform would then become the pending question. It is an open door to victory as soon as a majority in the Senate can find the courage to stand for the constitutional principle of government by the majority."

Until that time what can we do? It would be in order, first, for all of our organizations to express their appreciation to the 37 Senators who voted for the McGovern tabling motion. They deserve our thanks.

Looking beyond that, we must acknowledge that getting civil rights legislation through Congress without a change in Rule 22 is admittedly difficult. But we were able to surmount that obstacle in 1964 and 1965 by showing there was a national consensus for laws needed to give all citizens equal rights. In 1967, we must demonstrate again that the public sentiment for levelling the last barriers is still there. If we do that, even the Senate must respond.

A NEW CIVIL RIGHTS BILL REACHES CONGRESS

The President's civil rights message to Congress is a summons to us all. We will be meeting with greater frequency in Washington from now on and you may expect more MEMOs. The campaign for Civil Rights Act of 1967 is underway.

We Applaud The President

The Conference's Legislative Committee, composed of the Washington representatives of our participating groups, met last Wednesday, February 15, the very day the President sent his message to the Hill. Our initial reaction was to applaud Mr. Johnson's legislative proposals for the determination they displayed. The President was clearly unimpressed by those who warned him to go slow. The proposals would carry the country far toward ending discrimination in housing and jury selection. They would provide greater protection against violence for Negroes and civil rights workers. They would empower the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission to issue cease and desist orders, extend the life of the U.S. Civil Rights Commission five years and nearly double the budget of the Community Relations Service.

The statement we adopted at last week's meeting is enclosed with this MEMO. So is the text of the President's message. We will be analyzing the proposals in the weeks to come and reporting our conclusions.

The Bill Needs Sponsors

Just as last year, the principal sponsors of the bill will be Rep. Emanuel Celler (D., N.Y.) in the House and Sen. Philip A. Hart (D., Mich.) in the Senate. What needs to be done immediately is to gather additional sponsors for the Senate bill. We call upon all our organizations and all our readers to help here. We urge you to write your Senators at once urging them to become cosponsors of the Administration's civil rights bill.

Vice President Hubert Humphrey, in a new American Jewish Committee pamphlet, wrote: "Every American citizen can actively participate in congressional debates over civil rights legislation.....Congress is reluctant to move into new areas--like housing, for example--unless it has a clear go-ahead from the American people. When the American people speak out, loudly and clearly, the members of Congress hear them and act accordingly. Most citizens can afford a letter and a postage stamp or even a phone call to their Senator or Representative. Let them exercise this right frequently and persuasively."

Now's a good time to start exercising that right. Help flood the Senate with letters to prospective sponsors.

Introduction of a new civil rights bill means a new period of intense activity for the Conference and many more mailings. Because of our mounting costs we ask each of our readers to "subscribe" to the MEMO. Postage for each person on our mailing list amounts to at least $5 a year. Let that guide you.

LEADERSHIP CONFERENCE STATEMENT ON THE PRESIDENT'S CIVIL RIGHTS MESSAGE

The Leadership Conference on Civil Rights applauds the President's appeal for new civil rights legislation. We are gratified that Mr. Johnson has refused to be dissuaded from a call for new laws by those who have urged him to slow down, as if justice or equality could ever come too soon. We agree with the President that the way to deal with racial tensions that wrack our country is to go forward and eliminate the inequities that cause them.

The President's proposals would bring us well along toward full equality. The Leadership Conference in the past few years has urged and worked for them already. We hope to mobilize again the coalition of civil rights, labor, religious and civic groups that have proved so effective in obtaining enactment of all the civil rights legislative milestones of the past decade. When the bill is before Congress we will bring representatives of our groups to Washington to urge members to vote for a strong law.

Mr. Johnson is right, we believe, in seeing the inseparability of the next advances. While discrimination in housing is the most pervasive and destructive of the discriminations still prevalent in this country, the President is correct in calling for its elimination as only one among a number of badly needed reforms. Equally as urgent are his proposals to reform federal, state and local jury systems; to provide Negroes and all who work or speak for racial justice with protection against interference with their rights; to strengthen the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission by giving it the power to issue cease and desist orders; and to extend the life of the U.S. Civil Rights Commission.

The Leadership Conference in supporting these proposals before, has urged additional measures to strengthen them. We anticipate that in due course we will want to advocate amendments to the proposed legislation.

But today we wish to hail the President for his determination and to pledge the support of the more than 100 national organizations that participate in our work.

We are fully aware of how hard the fight for the new law is going to be. We remember well the fate of the Civil Rights Act of 1966. And mindful of that fate we call upon all members of the Senate to respond to the President's appeal to conscience and resist the filibuster that is sure to be mounted against this bill. Senators should know that the sincerity of their devotion to full equality for all citizens will be demonstrated by the extent to which they meet a filibuster with the resolve to fight until it is ended, even if it takes months to do so. If they do that, we will have a new civil rights law and this country will take another long step toward freedom.

February 15, 1967

CIVIL RIGHTS—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate a message from the President of the United States. Without objection, it will be printed in the RECORD without being read and appropriately referred.

The message was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

Almost two centuries ago the American people declared these truths to be self-evident: "That all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness."

Seventy-five years later, a savage war tested the foundations of their democratic faith. The issue of the struggle was, as Lincoln said, whether "we shall nobly save, or meanly lose, the last, best hope on earth."

Democracy triumphed in the field in 1865. But for the Negro American, emancipation from slavery was but the first engagement in a long campaign. He had still to endure the assaults of discrimination that denied him a decent home, refused his children a good education, closed the doors of economic progress against him, turned him away at the voting booth, the jury box, at places of public accommodation, seated him apart on buses and trains, and sometimes even threatened him with violence if he did not assent to these humiliations.

In 1948 President Truman ordered the Defense Establishment to accord equal treatment to servicemen of every race. That same year the Supreme Court declared that State courts could not enforce racial covenants in the sale of houses. The Court later struck down racial discrimination in public transportation.

In 1954 segregated education was found to be inherently unequal and in violation of the 14th amendment.

In 1957 the first Civil Rights Act in 82 years passed the Congress.

Three later acts were adopted within the next decade—in 1960, 1964, and 1965. Congress prohibited interference with the right to vote—to use any hotel, restaurant, or theater—to secure a job on the basis of merits. It barred the use of Federal funds to any agency that practiced racial discrimination.

Within these 20 years, the institutions of democratic government have begun to make the ancient, self-evident truths a reality for all Americans.

Though much of our task still lies before us, it is important to measure the progress we have made in the past few years.

THE STRUGGLE AGAINST DISCRIMINATION

VOTING

Since the passage of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, the number of Negroes registered in the five States where voter discrimination was most severe has increased by 65 percent—from 715,099 to 1,174,569. The vast majority of the new voters—about 334,000—were registered by local officials, in voluntary compliance with the act.

The remainder—some 125,000—were registered by Federal examiners in 47 counties of the five States. Federal observers were present in many counties during the 1966 primary and general elections to insure that the newly registered voters were permitted to vote without interference.

In 1960, a Negro citizen complained that for 10 years he had tried without success to register to vote. Not a single Negro had been registered in his county for 60 years. In 1966, he ran for a seat on the local school board—and won.

Today, 20 Negroes serve in southern legislatures. Several important local offices, such as school boards and county commissions, now have Negro membership.

The electorate in these States has begun to change. The right to vote—the fundamental democratic right—is now exercised by men and women whose color served in years past to bar them from the polls. After centuries of silence, their voice is being heard. It will never again be stilled.

SCHOOLS

In the 1963–64 school year, 10 years after the landmark Brown decision, 1 percent of the Negro students in the 11 Southern States were in schools also attended by white students.

Then came the 1964 Civil Rights Act and its prohibition against the use of Federal funds to support racial bias.

In September 1966, 12.5 percent of the Negro students in those same States were enrolled in desegregated schools. We expect this figure to increase significantly next fall. We will proceed with the task of securing the rights of all our children.

HOSPITALS

This year, Negroes are being admitted to hospitals which barred them in the past. By January, 7,130 hospitals—more than 95 percent of the hospitals in the Nation—had agreed to provide services without discrimination. More than 1,500 of those hospitals have had to change past policies to make that commitment.

Getting rid of discriminatory practices has benefited hospital systems, as well as the people they serve.

Last year, for example, half the beds in an all-white hospital were unoccupied. Yet Negroes in the community were sent to a completely segregated and overcrowded hospital. The half-empty hospital changed its policies to admit Negroes, and it now operates at full capacity. The formerly Negro hospital will be converted into a nursing home serving both races. The effect of the change was to provide better medical care for the entire community.

PUBLIC ACCOMMODATIONS

When the 1964 Civil Rights Act was passed, prohibiting racial discrimination in places of public accommodations, fears were expressed that this sharp change in established customs would bring about serious economic loss and perhaps even violence.

Yet from the start there has been widespread voluntary compliance with the law. Thousands of restaurants, motels, and hotels have been opened to Americans of all races and colors. What was thought to be laden with danger proved generally acceptable to both races.

Because all businesses of a similar type are covered, each businessman is free, for the first time, to operate on a nondiscriminatory basis without fear of suffering a competitive disadvantage.

Now Negro families traveling through most parts of their country do not need to suffer the inconvenience of searching for a place to rest or eat where they will be accepted or the humiliating indignity of being turned away.

PROGRAMS FOR SOCIAL JUSTICE

The struggle against today's discrimination is only part of the Nation's commitment to equal justice for all Americans. The bigotry of the past has its effects in broken families, men without skills, children without learning, poor housing, and neighborhoods dominated by the fear of crime.

Because these effects are encrusted by generations of inferior opportunities and shattered hopes, they will not yield to laws against discrimination alone. Indeed there is no swift medicine, no matter how potent or massively applied, that can heal them at once. But we know some of the things we must do if the healing process is to begin—and we are doing them.

EDUCATION

Headstart has given deprived children a chance to learn in later years—instead of being merely exposed to school. Through this and other preschool programs, 2 million children have been offered better education and health care.

More than 7 million children in 70 percent of all school districts in the United States have participated in programs under title I of the 1965 Education Act. These programs have a single aim: to improve the education of disadvantaged children. The better libraries, larger professional staffs, advanced instructional equipment, and other services they provide are investments in the future of children who need them most.

In my message on America's children and youth I asked the Congress to provide an additional $135 million to strengthen Headstart. With these funds, we will launch a Headstart follow-through program in the early grades of elementary school to maintain the momentum the child has gained and we will extend the Headstart program downward to cover more 3-year-olds.

Extraordinary help at the start of life is necessary for all disadvantaged children. It is particularly necessary for the Negro child reared in poverty and encumbered by generations of deprivation.

JOBS AND TRAINING

Thousands of job opportunities for the young have been created by the Neighborhood Youth Corps and the Job Corps. The first, active in both urban and rural areas, has enabled many young people to earn enough to remain in school, and provided employment and remedial education for dropouts.

The Job Corps—also meant to help those between 16 and 21—has offered other thousands both a change of environment and the opportunity to acquire education and job training.

The Manpower Development and Training Act gives men without jobs or skills the chance to acquire both, by combining government planning and resources with private industry. The work experience program offers welfare recipients a means of obtaining the experience they need for gainful employment.

Today's strong economy, which last year put almost 3 million more Americans on the payrolls, is also of tremendous benefit to needy persons in search of dependable employment. But for the long term, and as demand for better qualified workers grows, training and remedial education will be of even greater importance to the disadvantaged. This is particularly true for those who leave the farm and move to urban areas in search of employment, without the skills an urban society requires.

During the last 3 years, our training programs have provided the means of self-sufficiency to almost a million men and women. The value of these programs to the Negro American is especially great.

The unemployment rate for Negroes is more than double that for whites. About 650,000 Americans, more than 20 percent of all unemployed, are nonwhite. About 213,000 of these are between 14 and 19 years of age. Job training is essential to enable them to get off the welfare rolls and to go on the tax rolls.

Our economy is also strengthened by these programs. If Negroes today had the same skills as other Americans, and if they were free from discrimination in employment, our gross national product could become $30 billion higher.

I will shortly submit recommendations to strengthen and expand these training programs. I am asking the Congress for an additional $135 million in appropriations for the Office of Economic Opportunity for a special program to open the doors of opportunity and meaningful employment to our most disadvantaged citizens.

I will call for the active assistance of private industry and organized labor to provide skills and jobs to those now confined to the welfare rolls and the slums.

THE NEED FOR PERSEVERANCE

There are those who believe this series of accomplishments is long enough. There are those who grow weary of supporting great social programs, impatient with the failures that attend them and cynical about those they are intended to help. There are those who think "equal justice" is a rhetorical phrase, intended only as an admonition to judges, not as a guiding principle for national policy.

To them I can only say: consider the consequences if the—Nation—and I as the President—were to take what appears to be the easy way out, abandon the long, hard struggle for social and economic justice and say that enough has been done.

There would be little hope of strengthening the economy of the country through the improved earning power and productive capacity of Negro Americans.

There would be little hope of avoiding massive welfare expenditures for people denied the training and jobs they need to become self-supporting.

There would be little hope of ending the chain of personal tragedies that began with ancient bigotry and continues to this hour.

There would—above all—be little hope of achieving the self-respect that comes to a nation from doing what is right.

Our task is far from over. The statistics demonstrate the magnitude of the effort required.

The life expectancy of the Negro is 5 years shorter than that of his white contemporary and the infant mortality rate for Negroes is 40 percent higher.

The adult white has had at least 3 more years of education—and has been educated in better schools—than the average adult Negro.

The unemployment rate for nonwhites aged 21—even in this time of near full employment—is double that of whites.

Negroes are characteristically more densely housed in units only 56 percent of which meet health and safety standards.

The income of the average Negro family is about 40 percent lower than that of the average white family.

The programs we have adopted in the past few years are only a beginning. We have made a good start.

But we must remember that it is only a start. We must realize that civil rights are also civil opportunities. Unless these rights are recognized as opportunities by Negro and white alike, they can achieve nothing. We must realize that training and education programs provide skills and opportunities. But only where there is both the will to seek the job and the willingness to hire the job applicant, can these programs achieve their ultimate objectives.

The next steps are harder, but they are even more important. We shall need years of trial and error—years in which children can be strengthened to grow into responsible young adults, years of better training, better jobs, better health, and better housing—before the results of what we have done so far can be seen.

Perseverance, the willingness to abandon what does not work, and the courage to keep searching for better solutions—these are the virtues the times require.

CIVIL RIGHTS LEGISLATION

Last year I proposed the enactment of important civil rights legislation. I proposed that legislation because it was right and just.

The civil rights legislation of 1966 was passed by the House of Representatives, and brought to the floor of the Senate. Most of its features commanded a strong majority in both Houses. None of its features was defeated on the merits.

Yet it did not become law. It could not be brought to a final vote in the Senate.

Some observers felt that the riots which occurred in several cities last summer prevented the passage of the bill.

Public concern over the riots was great, as it should have been. Lawlessness cannot be tolerated in a nation whose very existence depends upon respect for law. It cannot be permitted because it injures every American and tears at the very fabric of our democracy.

We want public order in America, and we shall have it. But a decent public order cannot be achieved solely at the end of a stick, nor by confining one race to self-perpetuating poverty.

Let us create the conditions for a public order based upon equal justice.

THE CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1967

The act I am proposing this year is substantially the same as last year's bill. Some revisions have been incorporated to take account of useful suggestions and perfecting amendments made by the 89th Congress. I believe these revisions offer a basis for common action.

I recommend the adoption of a national policy against discrimination in housing on account of race, color, religion, or national origin. I propose the adoption of progressive steps to carry out this policy.

I recommend the clarification and strengthening of existing Federal criminal laws against interference with Federal rights.

I recommend requirements for the selection of juries in Federal courts to guard against discrimination and insure that juries are properly representative of the community.

I recommend legislation to eliminate all forms of discrimination in the selection of State court juries.

I recommend that the Civil Rights Act of 1964 be amended to authorize the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission to issue, judicially enforcible cease-and-desist orders.

I recommend the extension, for an additional 5 years, of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights.

I recommend a 90-percent increase in appropriations for the Community Relations Service.

These measures are not new. I have recommended and supported them in the past. I urge the Congress to act favorably upon them because justice and human dignity demand these protections for each American citizen.

EQUAL JUSTICE IN HOUSING

For most Americans, the availability of housing depends upon one factor—their ability to pay.

For too many, however, there are other crucial factors—the color of their skin, their religion, or their national origin.

When a Negro seeks a decent home for himself and his family, he frequently finds that the door is closed. It remains closed—though the Negro may be a serviceman who has fought for freedom.

The result of countless individual acts of discrimination is the spawning of urban ghettoes, where housing is inferior, overcrowded, and too often overpriced.

Statistics tell a part of the story. Throughout the Nation almost twice as many nonwhites as whites occupy deteriorating or dilapidated housing. In Watts, 32.5 percent of all housing is overcrowded, compared with 11.5 percent for the Nation as a whole.

In Harlem, more than 237,000 people live in an area consisting of 3½ square miles. This is a density of 105 people per acre. Ninety percent of the buildings in Harlem are more than 30 years old, and almost half were built before the end of the 19th century.

The environment of most urban ghettoes is the same: inferior public facilities and services—street, lighting, parks; sanitation and police protection; inferior schools; and isolation from job opportunities. In every sphere of urban life the ghetto-dweller is shortchanged.

A child growing up in such an environment must overcome tremendous man-made obstacles to become a useful citizen. The misery we tolerate today multiplies the misery of tomorrow.

Many of our existing and proposed programs—though not directed simply at relieving the problems of any particular minority group—will relieve conditions found in their most acute form in the urban ghetto. These programs are necessary and they must be fully supported.

But money and assistance are not enough. Since the ratification of the 14th amendment to the Constitution, this Nation has been committed to accord every citizen the equal protection of its laws. We must strengthen that commitment as it relates to discrimination in housing—a problem that is national in scope.

The legislation I recommend would ultimately apply to all housing in the United States. It would go into effect by progressive stages.

The proposed legislation would direct the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development to carry out education and conciliation measures to seek an end to discrimination in housing. He would call conferences of leaders in the housing industry, consult with State and local officials, and work with private organizations.

The prohibition against discrimination in the sale or rental of housing would become effective progressively over a 2-year period:

Immediately, to housing already covered by the Presidential order on equal opportunities in housing.

During 1968, to dwellings sold or rented by someone other than their occupant, and to dwellings for five or more families. Essentially, this stage would cover large apartment houses and real estate developments.

In 1969, the act would apply to all housing.

This act would be aimed at commercial transactions, not at the privacy of the home. It would outlaw discriminatory practices in financing housing and in providing real estate brokers' services. It would prohibit "blockbusting," by which unscrupulous dealers seek to frighten homeowners into selling quickly, out of fear that the value of their homes will decline.

In every instance the legislation would require the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development to try to achieve a voluntary solution. Only if such a settlement could not be reached would the Secretary be authorized to hold an ad-administrative hearing. If, after an administrative hearing, a violation of the law were found, the Secretary would be authorized to issue a judicially enforcible cease-and-desist order.

The Secretary would work with State and municipal fair housing agencies that already exist. In appropriate cases he would be authorized to rely on their enforcement of the State and city laws.

The Attorney General would be empowered to support these enforcement efforts, when he had reason to believe that a general pattern or practice of discrimination exists.

Last year the legislation I proposed to ban discrimination in housing stirred great controversy. Although a majority of both Houses in the Congress favored that legislation, it was not enacted. Some of the problems raised by its adversaries were real; most involved myths and misinformation. The summer riots in our cities did as much damage to the chances of passing that legislation as the unfounded fears of many Americans and the opposition of special interest groups.

There should be no need for laws to require men to deal fairly and decently with their fellow man. There should be no need to enact a law prohibiting discrimination in housing—just as there should have been no need to send registrars to enforce voting rights, to issue guidelines to require desegregation of our schools, to bring suits in Federal courts to insure equal access to public accommodations, and to outlaw discrimination in employment.

But the Civil Rights Act of 1957, 1960, and 1964 and the Voting Rights Act of 1965 were necessary and they have moved this country toward our goal of providing a decent life for each of our citizens.

I am proposing fair housing legislation again this year because it is decent and right. Injustice must be opposed, however difficult or unpopular the issue.

I believe that fair housing legislation must and will be enacted by the Congress of the United States. I was proud to be a Member of the Congresses that enacted the Civil Rights Acts of 1957 and 1960 and as President to sign into law the 1964 and 1965 acts. I believe that generations to come would look upon the enactment of this legislation by the 90th Congress as one of its proudest achievements. I cannot urge too strongly that the Congress act promptly on this legislation.

Today the subject of fair housing is engulfed in a cloud of misinformation and unarticulated fear. Some believe the value of their homes must decline if their neighborhoods are integrated. They fear the conversion of their communities into unsightly slums, if a family of a different color moves into a house across the street. Neither of these events need occur. In an atmosphere of reason and justice, they would not occur. In the scores of cities and States that have such laws these events have not occurred.

The task of informing the minds and enlightening the consciences of those who are subject to these fears should begin at once. Churches can help perform this task with a unique competence—and they should. So should civic organizations, public officials, human relations commissions, labor unions, and private industries. It must be done. The sooner it is done, the nearer we will come to that just America it is our purpose to achieve.

INTERFERENCE WITH RIGHTS

Another basic test of equal justice is whether all men are free to exercise rights established by the Congress and the Constitution. A right has little meaning unless it can be freely exercised. This applies in particular to Negro Americans who seek to vote, attend school, and utilize public accommodations on an equal basis.

Negro children have been abused for attending previously segregated schools. Shots have been fired into the homes of their parents. Employers who practiced nondiscrimination have been harassed. Most shocking of all are the crimes which result in loss of life. Some of the victims have been Negroes; others were whites devoted to the cause of justice.

State and local officials are primarily responsible for preventing and punishing acts of violence. In many cases, however, these officials have not been able to detect or prosecute the perpetrators of the crimes. In some, unfortunately, they have not been willing to meet their obligations. For these reasons and because violence has too often been used to deny Federal rights, there is need for Federal legislation.

Present Federal statutes are inadequate in several respects. Maximum penalties are too low for crimes which cause death or serious injury. Only in some instances do the statutes reach misconduct by private persons not acting in concert with public officials. Existing laws do not spell out clearly the Federal rights which they protect.

To remedy these deficiencies, I recommend legislation to—

Specify the activities which are protected, including voting, purchasing a home, holding a job, attending a school, obtaining service in a restaurant or other place of public accommodation.

Prohibit acts or threats of violence, by private individuals acting alone or public officials, directed against Negroes or members of other minority groups because they are or have been participating in those activities.

Authorize victims of violence to bring civil actions for damages or injunctive relief.

The penalties prescribed are graduated, depending on the gravity of the offense. When physical injury results, the maximum penalty is $10,000 and 10 years. When death occurs, the sentence may be imprisonment for any term of years or for life.

FEDERAL AND STATE JURIES

A fair jury is fundamental to our historic traditions of justice.

Fairness is most likely to result when the jury is selected from a broad cross section of the community. The exclusion of particular groups or classes from jury duty not only denies defendants their right to an impartial jury. It also denies members of the excluded group the opportunity to fulfill an important obligation of citizenship and to participate in the processes of their government.

On many occasions, I have emphasized the importance of respect for the law. Yet, creating respect for legal institutions becomes virtually impossible when parts of our judicial system operate unlawfully or give the appearance of unfairness.

Current methods of Federal court jury selection have sometimes resulted in the exclusion of Negroes and other minority groups. Often the cause lay in the method of selection.

I recommend legislation to—

Eliminate discrimination in the selection of juries in Federal courts.

Insure that juries in Federal courts are uniformly drawn from a broad cross section of the community.

To reduce to a minimum the possibility of arbitrary exclusion of certain groups, the act will spell out in detail the selection procedures to be followed in all Federal district courts. Names of prospective jurors would be obtained by random selection from voter lists—a broadly representative source in almost all parts of the country, now that the Voting Rights Act of 1965 is being implemented. Under the bill only objective standards, including basic literacy requirements found in existing law, could be used to determine the qualifications of a prospective juror.

Legislation to deal with selection of State court juries is also needed. There has been persistent, intentional discrimination in juror selection in some localities. A recent case involved jury discrimination in a county whose population in 1960 was more than 70 percent Negro. Of the persons listed on the jury rolls between 1953 and 1965, less than 2 percent were Negro. No Negro had ever served as a member of a jury in that county.

Numerous criminal convictions obtained in State courts have been set aside on the ground that Negroes were excluded from the juries. Such court decisions may assure justice in a particular case. They cannot reform the jury selection systems.

The 14th amendment establishes equality before the law and charges the Congress with enforcing that requirement. Such flagrant, persistent abuses as are revealed in many recent jury selection cases cannot be tolerated by a society which prides itself on the rule of law.

I recommend legislation to—

Prohibit discrimination on account of race, color, religion, national origin, sex, or economic status in the selection of State or local juries.

Authorize the Attorney General to sue State or local jury officials who exclude Negroes or members of other minority groups from juries.

Prescribe new remedies to make it easier to prove jury discrimination.

Authorize the courts to issue a variety of orders specially tailored to eliminate the most common methods by which jury discrimination is practiced.

EQUAL JUSTICE IN EMPLOYMENT

The Civil Rights Act of 1964 prohibited discrimination in hiring, promotion, and working conditions, as well as discrimination in the membership practices of labor organizations. The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission was created to carry out the congressional mandate.

The Commission was directed to eliminate discriminatory employment practices by informal methods of conciliation and persuasion. By the end of this fiscal year, the Commission will have have completed over 2,000 investigations and more than 500 conciliation efforts. This is hard work, but when it succeeds, case by case it opens up new opportunities to:

The minority group employees of an aircraft company, who no longer are confined to deadend jobs but now have training opportunities in 40 job classifications.

The employees of a large ship construction firm which has improved the job rights of over 5,000 Negroes.

Unlike most other Federal regulatory agencies, the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission was not given enforcement powers. If efforts to conciliate or persuade are unsuccessful, the Commission itself is powerless. For the individual discriminated against, there remains only a time-consuming and expensive lawsuit.

In considering the proper role of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, it is important to bear in mind that nonwhite unemployment remains disproportionately high:

In 1966, the unemployment rate was 3.3 percent for white persons. It was 7.3 percent for nonwhites.

Nonwhite unemployment in 1965 was twice the rate for whites. In 1966, the ratio rose to 2.2 to 1.

Among youth not attending school, the unemployment rate in 1966 was 8.5 percent for whites and 20.3 percent for nonwhites.

No single factor explains the differences in the unemployment rates of nonwhites and whites. But part of the disparity is clearly attributable to discrimination. For that reason, effective remedies against discrimination are essential.

I recommend legislation to give the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission authority to issue orders, after a fair hearing, to require the termination of discriminatory employment practices.

The cease-and-desist orders of the Commission would be enforceable in the Federal courts of appeal and subject to judicial review there. These powers are similar to those of other Federal regulatory agencies.

Enforcement power would harmonize the procedures of the Commission with the prevailing practice among States and cities that have had fair employment practices agencies for many years. It would reduce the burden on individual complainants and on the Federal courts. It would enhance the orderly implementation of this important national policy.

THE COMMISSION ON CIVIL RIGHTS

The U.S. Commission on Civil Rights has, since its creation in 1957, proved to be an exceptionally valuable agency. This bipartisan factfinding agency has contributed substantially to our determined effort to assure the civil rights of all Americans. Its investigations and studies have contributed to important changes in the laws and policies of the Federal Government. Publications of the Commission—in the fields of voting, housing, employment, school segregation, and equality of opportunity in Government programs—have been helpful to other Government agencies and to private groups interested in equality of opportunity.

The Commission has also served as a clearinghouse for information on civil rights matters. It has provided information on Federal laws, programs, and services to assist communities and private organizations in dealing with civil rights issues and with economic and social problems affecting race relations.

Under existing law, the term of the Commission expires on January 31, 1968. But much more remains to be done.

I recommend that the life of the Commission be extended for an additional 5 years.

COMMUNITY RELATIONS SERVICE

The Civil Rights Act of 1964 recognized the importance of providing bridges of understanding for communities across the land struggling with problems of equal justice and discrimination. Last year, I recommended, and you in the Congress approved, the transfer of the Community Relations Service to the Department of Justice to make it a more effective instrument of national policy.

This year, I recommend that the funds for the work of the Community Relations Service be increased by 90 percent—from $1.4 million to $2.7 million.

In city after city and county after county, the men of the Community Relations Service have worked, quietly and effectively, behind the scenes, to conciliate disputes before they flared up in the courtrooms or on the streets.

I deeply believe that, under our democratic system, the work of conciliation can be brought to bear increasingly to remove many of the injustices, intentional and unintentional, which derive from prejudice. It is in this spirit and with this conviction that I request a substantial increase in the funds appropriated to the Community Relations Service.

EQUAL JUSTICE

We adopted a Constitution "to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure the domestic tranquility," and "provide for the common defense."

In our wars, Americans, Negro and white, have fought side by side to defend freedom. Negro soldiers—like white soldiers—have won every medal for bravery our country bestows. The bullets of our enemies do not discriminate between Negro marines and white marines. They kill and maim whomever they strike.

The American Negro has waited long for first-class citizenship—for his right for equal justice. But he has long accepted the full responsibilities of citizenship.

If there were any doubt, one need only look to the servicemen who man our defenses. In Vietnam, 10.2 percent of our soldiers are American Negroes bearing equal responsibilities in the fight for freedom—but at home, 11 percent of our people are American Negroes struggling for equal opportunities.

The bullets at the battlefront do not discriminate—but the landlords at home do. The pack of the Negro soldier is as heavy as the white soldier's—but the burden his family at home bears is far heavier. In war, the Negro American has given this Nation his best—but this Nation has not given him equal justice.

It is time that the Negro be given equal justice. In America, the rights of citizenship are conferred by birth—not by death in battle.

It is our duty—as well as our privilege—to stand before the world as a nation dedicated to equal justice. There may be doubts about some policies or programs, but there can be no doubt about the rights of each man to stand on equal ground before his government and with his fellow man.

On June 4, 1965, at Howard University, I spoke about the challenge confronting this Nation—"to fulfill these rights." What I said then has even greater importance and meaning for every American today:

Freedom is the right to share fully and equally in American society—to vote, to hold a job, to enter a public place, to go to school. It is the right to be treated in every part of our national life as a person equal in dignity and promise to all others.

But freedom is not enough. You do not wipe away the scars of centuries by saying: Now you are free to go where you want, do as you desire, and choose the leaders you please.

You do not take a person who, for years, has been hobbled by chains and liberate him, bring him up to the starting line of a race and then say, "You are free to compete with all the others," and still justly believe that you have been completely fair.

Thus it is not enough just to open the gates of opportunity. All of our citizens must have the ability to walk through those gates.

This is the next and more profound stage of the battle for civil rights. We seek not just freedom but opportunity—not just legal equity but human ability—not just equality as a right and a theory, but equality as a fact and as a result.

For the task is to give 20 million Negroes the same chance as every other American to learn and grow, to work and share in society, to develop their abilities—physical, mental and spiritual, and to pursue their individual happiness.

* * * * *

There is no single easy answer to all of these problems.

Jobs are part of the answer. They bring the income which permits a man to provide for his family.

Decent homes in decent surroundings, and a chance to learn—an equal chance to learn—are part of the answer.

Welfare and social programs better designed to hold families together are part of the answer.

Care of the sick is part of the answer.

An understanding heart by all Americans is also a large part of the answer.

To all these fronts—and a dozen more—I will dedicate the expanding efforts of the Johnson administration.

MEMO: No.4-67

FROM: Arnold Aronson, Secretary

THE CIVIL RIGHTS BILL BEGINS TO DRAW SUPPORT

In the short time since the President sent his civil rights message to Congress, we have begun to receive encouraging reports of a growing support for his proposals.

As this is written, seven national organizations in the Conference have sent us copies of statements they have issued publicly endorsing the message and the Civil Rights Act of 1967 which would translate it into law. Four other organizations have asked us for additional copies of the message for use in campaigns to get their members working for passage of the bill.

The Legislative Situation

The new civil rights bill was introduced into the Senate and the House on February 20 and referred to the Judiciary committees of both bodies. (In the House, the bill number is H.R.5700, in the Senate, S.1026.)

No one expects the Senate Judiciary Committee, under that civil rights graveyard keeper Senator James O. Eastland (D., Miss.) to do very much with the bill. But Senator Philip A. Hart (D., Mich.), who will be floor leader for the bill and other cosponsors of the measure are exploring ways to bring it to the Senate floor without waiting for Judiciary to act.

In the House, Rep. Emanuel Celler (D., N.Y.), Chairman of the House Judiciary, has not announced yet when he will start hearings on the bill.

The Senate bill had 27 sponsors when it was introduced. The Civil Rights Act of 1966 had only 20. More Senators would certainly have added their names to the bill if it had been permitted to lay at the Clerk's desk for a few days, but an objection by Senate Republican Leader Everett M. Dirksen prevented that. In addition to Senator Hart, the other sponsors of the bill are:

Daniel B. Brewster (D., Md.), Edward Brooke (R., Mass.), Clifford P. Case (R., N.J.), Joseph S. Clark (D., Pa.), Thomas J. Dodd (D., Conn.), Hiram L. Fong (R., Hawaii), Ernest Gruening (D., Alaska), Vance Hartke (D., Ind.), Daniel K. Inouye (D., Hawaii), Jacob K. Javits (R., N.Y.), Edward M. Kennedy (D., Mass.), Robert F. Kennedy (D., N.Y.), Edward V. Long (D., Mo.), Eugene J. McCarthy (D., Minn.), Walter F. Mondale (D., Minn.), Wayne Morse (D., Ore.), Edmund S. Muskie (D., Maine), John O. Pastore (D., R.I.), Claiborne Pell (D., R.I.), William Proxmire (D., Wisc.), Jennings Randolph (D., W.Va.), Abraham A. Ribicoff (D., Conn.), Hugh Scott (R., Penna.), Joseph D. Tydings (D., Md.), Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D., N.J.), Stephen M. Young (D., O.).

What We Should Be Doing

What needs to be done now is to increase the kind of activity already underway. If your organization has not yet issued a statement, now is the time to do it. The groups that have notified us of statements and efforts in support of the bill are: the AFL-CIO, the American Jewish Committee, the Boston Archdiocese, the NAACP, the National Association of Real Estate Brokers, the National Board of the YWCA, the National Catholic Conference for Interracial Justice, the National Federation of Settlements and Neighborhood Centers, the National Urban League, the UAW, the United Packinghouse Workers.

Issue a statement, start a campaign and we will be glad to add your name to the list. Wherever possible, try to get press coverage for your activities. Editorials particularly can help build support for the bill (we enclose recent ones from the Washington Post and the New York Times). Favorable public opinion is a crucial factor in a successful fight for the Civil Rights Act of 1967. We must begin to create that opinion now.

Civil Rights Commitment

The President's Civil Rights message ought to extinguish the last lingering remnant of skepticism about his unwavering commitment to the principle of equality and the practical proposals available to achieve it.

It is a long message. And it contains a lot of homely truths that it should not be necessary to repeat at this stage of the Nation's history. But the experience of the last session showed clearly enough that the Congress had either forgotten or did not ever know some of the facts of life that the President recited. And it revealed plainly enough that repetition of first principles still is necessary.

The proposals themselves are perfecting and improving devices for existing programs, for the most part. It is difficult to see how Congress could seriously object to most of them. The President has used great skill and persuasive talent to try to bring around those who opposed the fair housing proposal last session. Whether his three-stage plan is more palatable than his one-jump plan remains to be seen, but it shows his desire to be conciliatory and his old urge to find a consensus.

The country still has far to go to achieve its goals and purposes. The progress which the President detailed is impressive, but it counsels no diminishing of our exertions.

Important as his legislative proposals are, it is quite clear that it is equally important to have the President of the United States, year after year, reaffirm the broad principles on which the country stands. President Johnson has succeeded in getting Congress to approve more civil rights measures than any other Administration in our history. He still is at work on that legislative program. But perhaps, even more significant, is the fact that he has renewed the national commitment in a way that leaves no room for doubt.

A Question of Time...

In his message on civil rights, President Johnson assumes that acceptance of nondiscriminatory practices in the sale and rental of housing is merely a question of time. It is probable that this assumption reflects a prudent judgement of Congress's currently hostile mood rather than an expression of optimism about the nation's eagerness for residential desegregation.

The real estate industry and its political allies, notably Senator Dirksen, are not likely to be more receptive to open housing effective in 1969 than they were to last year's call for speedier action. Mr. Johnson has chosen to take refuge on political middle-ground.

The remainder of the civil rights package is much the same as last year. Mr. Johnson would strengthen existing Federal criminal laws to protect civil rights workers in the South and would eliminate racial discrimination in the make-up of both Federal and state juries. He also urges that the commission on equal employment opportunity be empowered to issue legally enforceable orders against racial discrimination.

The need for these improvements in Federal law enforcement and the judicial system in the South is reflected in thhe dismaying news that Byron de la Beckwith intends to run for Lieutenant-Governor of Mississippi. His candidacy is proof of the open contempt in which the lives and opinions of Negroes are still held in parts of the South. Mr. Beckwith's sole claim to political preferment is that he has been twice tried though not convicted for the murder of Medgar Evers, the Mississippi leader of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

Tighter Federal laws are imperative to make murder a crime, whatever the color of th victim's skin is.

Dear Friend:

Under Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, institutions receiving federal funds are required not to discriminate. Under Title III of the Act, the Attorney General can file suit to desegregate public (that is, governmentally owned or operated) facilities.

These provisions of the law have led to some desegregation. The extent of progress, however, has been nowhere near the potential which could be obtained if the laws were fully enforced. One reason has been an insufficient number of complaints. In order to remedy this, the Committee on Compliance and Enforcement of the Leadership Conference seeks your assistance in generating complaints on the local level.

Because the medicare program is so comprehensive in its coverage, we have decided to begin with hospitals and nursing homes. Accordingly we are distributing the attached questionnaire relating to this type of institution. Please have it completed with respect to hospitals and nursing homes in your area. If you need additional copies please contact this office.

Sincerely yours,

James Hamilton

QUESTIONNAIRE

NURSING HOMES AND HOSPITALS

Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 forbids discrimination in the use of federal funds. Although it has not been enforced as effectively as we believe it should be, some progress has been made in combatting discrimination in federally-assisted facilities.

A good number of hospitals and other medical facilities have been desegregated under Title VI. Again, progress has not been what we should expect, but there have been a significant number of changes. Much of the progress that has occurred has been a result of complaints filed by Leadership Conference organizations.

On January 1, 1967, nursing homes became eligible to particpate in the medicare program. Accordingly, they fall under the non-discrimination provisions of Title VI. Almost all nursing homes will have medicare patients (unless they fall below the quality standards set by the government.) In order to make the non-discrimination policy effective, we ask that you fill in the questionnaire below. Please fill out a separate one for each nursing home and hospital in your community.

NAME OF NURSING HOME OR HOSPITAL _____

LOCATION _____

Describe any segregation or other discrimination practiced by the institution (refusal to accept Negro patients, segregated wards or floors, separate restrooms or other facilities, lack of Negro doctors on staff, etc.) _____

Please give any remarks, special circumstances, etc. _____

Under Title III of the Civil Rights Act, the Attorney General can file suits to desegregate hospitals, nursing homes or other medical facilities if they are governmentally operated (state, city or county). If any such institution in your community practices discrimination, please fill out the following:

NAME OF NURSING HOME OR HOSPITAL _____

LOCATION _____

Is there any person or persons in your community who would be willing to file a written complaint against such institution?

YES _____ NO _____

If so, please give names and addresses: _____

In filling out the attached questionnaire, please consult this checklist to determine whether discrimination is practiced.

Do patients have access to all of the following facilities without regard to race?

Entrance and waiting rooms	All rooms
Emergency rooms	Operating, X-ray and Other special service rooms
Clinics	Dining rooms and cafeterias
All floors	Bathrooms
All wards	Other

Does the institution discriminate against minority group doctors, nurses and other professionals in:

Granting full hospital privileges?

Staff appointments?

Accepting interns and residents for training?

Employing or promoting nurses and technicians?

Has the institution made public a policy of non-discrimination?

HELP ORGANIZE CIVIL RIGHTS VISITS THIS EASTER

From March 23 to April 3, Congress will observe its annual Easter recess. Most members will return to their states and districts. It is a good time to see them and talk with them about the Civil Rights Act of 1967.

We are writing to you now to ask you to urge your local chapters to begin organizing Easter delegations. The NAACP has already announced plans to visit members in various parts of the country. We suggest that your local groups get in touch with NAACP chapters first and help plan joint delegations.

Be Broadly Representative

Wherever possible delegations should try to represent as broad a cross-section of Leadership Conference groups as possible. In most communities labor, civil rights, religious and civic groups are already in touch with each other. There can be no better way to observe Easter than to visit members on behalf of civil rights.

What To Say

1. In all visits to members of Congress delegations should attempt to obtain commitments to the Civil Rights Act of 1967 and pledges to work for its passage.

2. Wherever possible, try to publicize the visits. Following visits with members, the delegations should issue statements to press, TV and radio, reporting on the outcome of the interviews.

Senate Sponsors Needed

It is still possible for Senators to add their names to the Senate Civil Rights bill (S.1026). Senator Gaylord Nelson (D.,Wisc.) just recently became the 28th sponsor of the bill. The others are:

Daniel B. Brewster (D., Md.), Edward Brooke (R., Mass.), Clifford P. Case (R., N.J.), Joseph S. Clark (D., Pa.), Thomas J. Dodd (D., Conn.), Hiram L. Fong (R., Hawaii), Ernest Gruening (D., Alaska), Vance Hartke (D., Ind.), Daniel K. Inouye (D., Hawaii), Jacob K. Javits (R., N.Y.), Edward M. Kennedy (D., Mass.), Robert F. Kennedy (D., N.Y.), Edward V. Long (D., Mo.), Eugene J. McCarthy (D., Minn.), Walter F. Mondale (D., Minn.), Wayne Morse (D., Ore.), Edmund S. Muskie (D., Maine), John O. Pastore (D., R.I.), Claiborne Pell (D., R.I.), William Proxmire (D., Wisc.), Jennings Randolph (D., W.Va.), Abraham A. Ribicoff (D., Conn.), Hugh Scott (R., Penna.), Joseph D. Tydings (D., Md.), Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D., N.J.), Stephen M. Young (D., O.).

Please let your members know who the sponsors are. If their Senators' names are missing they should urge them to join the bipartisan group already backing the bill. A Senator can ask unanimous consent to add his name to the bill and should have no difficulty in getting it.

Mail Still Needed

Besides asking them to make personal visits, please ask your members to write. Letters to Senators who are not yet sponsors of the Civil Rights bill should express disappointment that they have not backed the bill. Senators whose names are on S.1026 should be congratulated.

Letters to House members should point out how urgently needed the new bill is. We enclose with this MEMO an analysis of the bill by J. Francis Pohlhaus, Special Consultant to the Leadership Conference. If you need extra copies please let us know.

We are always glad to get reports on what delegations learn in their encounters with members of Congress. Please pass along to us any information you obtain.

SCHOOL DESEGREGATION FUND REQUEST NEEDS BACKING

The Office of Education has asked the House Appropriations Congress for a substantial increase in funds for Title IV of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. This is the section that enables the Office, wherever local communities ask for help, to make grants that permit school districts to set up institutes and training programs aimed at solving problems they encounter in desegregating their schools.

These programs have grown in size until now the Office has a backlog of applications for funds totaling $48 million. Last year the Office received $8 million for Title IV. This year it is asking $30 for fiscal 1968, the year starting July 1.

The request is presently before a House Appropriations Subcommittee headed by Rep. John Rooney (D., N.Y.). This is another instance of a badly needed civil rights program that has been starved for lack of money. Please urge your members to write members of the subcommittee (or see them when they are home for Easter) and urge them to grant the full $30 million.

The other Democratic members of the subcommittee, besides Mr. Rooney are:

Robert L.F. Sikes (Fla.), John Slack (W.Va.), Neal Smith (Iowa), John Flynt (Georgia), Charles Joelson (N.J.).

The Republicans are:

Frank T. Bow (Ohio), Glenard P. Lipscomb (Calif.), Elford Cederberg (Mich.), and Mark Andrews (N.Dak.)

A CHANCE FOR HEARINGS ON THE CIVIL RIGHTS BILL

Signs of movement at last! After a month in which the Civil Rights Act of 1967 languished in Committee, Senate sponsors of the bill have engaged in a series of maneuvers designed to get hearings on its provisions.

Back To Judiciary

The six sections have been reintroduced as separate bills. Title I, which would prohibit discrimination in the selection of federal juries and Title II, which would extend similar prohibitions to the selection of juries in state courts have been reintroduced by Sen. Joseph Tydings (D., Md.). Their numbers are respectively, S.1319 and S.1318. Both of these bills have been referred to the Senate Judiciary Committee, whose chairman, James O. Eastland (D., Miss.) has shown his customary disposition to bury the omnibus bill.

However, it may be possible to get hearings on these separate sections. Senator Tydings, as chairman of a Senate Judiciary Subcommittee hopes to hold hearings on the federal jury bill and in fact has already begun to hold hearings on other jury reform measures he has introduced. The state jury section may be sent to an uncertain fate, a subcommittee headed by Senator Sam Ervin (D., N.C.).

Title V, of the omnibus bill, which would make any interference with constitutional rights a criminal offense, has been reintroduced by Senator Philip A. Hart (D., Mich.), as S.1362 and goes to Judiciary as does S.1359, Title VI, the section that would extend the life of the U.S. Civil Rights Commission for five years beyond its scheduled termination date of January 31, 1968.

Equal Jobs and Equal Housing

The remaining two sections of the bill have been removed from Eastland's grasp. Title IV, the section that would eventually prohibit discrimination in the sale and rental of all housing has been reintroduced as S.1358 by Senator Walter F. Mondale (D., Minn.) and referred to Senate Banking and Currency Committee. Title III, to strengthen the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission is now S.1308 and goes to Labor and Public Welfare. It was introduced by Senator Joseph Clark (D., Pa.).

Chances for Hearings are Improved

Complicated as these actions sound, their net result is a brightened prospect for hearings on different parts of the omnibus bill. (S.1026). After hearings are completed, the next step will be to get one or more of the sections reported out of Committee. Once a section reaches the Senate floor the other parts can be added as amendments and the entire measure reassembled. An alternative would be to attach the omnibus bill as an amendment to a minor measure and get it before the Senate that way.

It is easy to say that but saying it takes little note of the pitfalls that lie between possibilities and accomplishment. The chief drawback we face is a familiar one: apathy in Congress and in the nation.

Urgency is the Key

Last year, when he was addressing the White House Conference on Civil Rights, Roy Wilkins told the delegates that if there was to be any legislation that year they had to remember that "urgency is the key." It still is. Very little will happen unless we convey to our Senators the desperate need for the Civil Rights Act of 1967.

The first session of this 90th Congress is moving slowly. Members have already begun to talk about when they are going to quit. According to the Washington Post (March 24, 1967), shortly before the Easter recess, "Democratic and Republican leaders compared legislative notes and found only one common denominator: they would like to pass all appropriations bills plus a number of priority items and adjourn sine die by August 1." There was talk of a September first adjournment at the latest. The same article says the President's 1967 civil rights recommendations are not among the priority items.

We Must Make the Change

That Congress does not assign a high priority to civil rights is scarcely news. The civil rights bills of 1963 and 1965 were fairly low down on the lists until public indignation compelled Congress to deal with the issues.

Congress will continue to dally with civil rights legislation unless we insist that action be taken. The obligation falls on the groups in the Leadership Conference to organize in 1967 the kind of broad scale national support that brought us the legislative advances of the last few years. Congress responds to a unified demand.

It's Still the Omnibus Bill

The introduction of the six sections of the bill as six separate bills need not confuse anyone. The goal for us is still the total civil rights package, the omnibus bill, S.1026. Mail on the bill is terribly low. Every group in the Conference has to set its own priority list at once, put S.1026 at the top of it, and get members to write urging their Senators to work for early passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1967.

THE CAMPAIGN AGAINST "ONE-MAN, ONE-VOTE" LEGISLATURES REVIVES

The attempt to upset the Supreme Court reapportionment decisions has taken a new tack. Defeated twice in their efforts to get Congress to approve a constitutional amendment that would nullify the Court ruling that state legislatures must apportion themselves on a "one-man, one-vote" basis, opponents led by Minority Leader Everett M. Dirksen have carried the campaign to the states. While they are gaining support here, the prospects for ultimate success are dubious.

A Call for a Constitutional Convention

Article V of the Constitution prescribes that Congress upon "the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several states shall call a convention for proposing amendments....." That call is pressing upon Congress as it never has before. Two-thirds of the several states is 34 and already 32 have passed resolutions calling for the Constitutional convention. Dirksen has predicted that the remaining two calls will reach Congress soon.

How it Began

Most of the petitions for a convention are not new. The first of the pending ones were passed in 1963. Indeed, Senators William Proxmire (D., Wisc.) and Joseph Tydings (D., Md.), leaders of the opposition to the convention call, estimate that at least 26 of the 32 state legislatures were malapportioned when they passed their convention resolutions. The Senators contend these petitions are invalid.

However, this issue is not clear. Very little connected with the campaign is clear since there is no precedent for calling a convention. There are numerous questions that need to be settled. Must all of the resolutions be identical? Is a petition good indefinitely? How does Congress go about calling a convention and must it call one if 34 states ask? Most troubling of all is whether a constitutional convention, if it were called, would limit itself solely to an amendment on reapportionment. It is entirely likely that the country would be faced with a "runaway convention" ready to change the Bill of Rights or alter other provisions of the Constitution.

Even if the campaign for the constitutional convention does not succeed, Dirksen may be using it as a means of gaining leverage for another attempt to get the Senate to adopt his amendment. Last year he failed by only seven votes. He may hope that Congress will be sufficiently intimidated by the call from the states to agree to his proposal.

What's at Stake

The present move in the states is aimed at the adoption of an amendment that would permit one house of bicameral legislature to be apportioned on some basis other than population. But such an amendment would almost certainly undermine the progress being made toward reapportioning legislatures responsive to the needs of most of the voters in the states. It could very well result in legislatures where the actions of one house that represented people could be blocked in the other body by the hide-bound, largely rural interests that have for so many years blocked state action on socially progressive legislation.

Maryland provided a vivid example this year of what a fairly reapportioned legislature can do. The reconstituted body passed a fair housing law, a relatively mild one, but one that puts the state firmly on record in support of open occupancy. It would be tragic if such progress were halted or reversed.

A Complicated Matter

Despite the urgency and dangers of the present situation it needs to be handled with caution. The complexities and time tables for adjournment one encounters among the legislatures of 50 states makes it impossible to put forward a single blueprint for action. In some states, vigorous campaigns against convention calls could stir opposition. In any case, there should be close consultation with state legislators who support reapportionment before any campaign is undertaken. Here are some rough guidelines.

At present there are 16 state legislatures meeting and the last two calls may come from them. In two of the states, Alaska and Iowa, the threat is imminent. In each state a convention call has passed the House and is now being considered by committees of the Senate. Groups in the Leadership Conference with strong chapters in Iowa should keep alert to the situation. An open campaign might be unwise but letters to Governor Harold Hughes expressing concern and asking him to use his influence with the Senate could be helpful here.

In the following states convention calls have been introduced but no action has been taken on them as this MEMO is written: Michigan, Pennsylvania, Vermont and Wisconsin.

In these states, no calls have been introduced as yet: California, Connecticut, Delaware, Hawaii, Maine, Massachusetts, New Jersey, Ohio, Oregon, Rhode Island. Here no action is needed but your chapters should keep close watch, remembering that the recent calls have usually been rammed through with little advance notice and no debate.

32 Calls

Here are the 32 states in which convention calls have been adopted:

Alabama	Louisiana	North Dakota
Arizona	Maryland	Oklahoma
Arkansas	Minnesota	South Carolina
Colorado	Mississippi	South Dakota
Florida	Missouri	Tennessee
Georgia	Montana	Texas
Idaho	Nebraska	Utah
Illinois	Nevada	Virginia
Indiana	New Hampshire	Washington
Kansas	New Mexico	Wyoming
Kentucky	North Carolina

Senator Tydings, in a recent speech, presented tables that describe the actions of these states in detail. We include these tables with this MEMO to supply information you may need to plan a course of action for your organization.

RE: The Quie Amendment

A NEW THREAT TO SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

In their search for ways to evade or hobble school desegregation, Southern members of Congress are seizing on a new device: the Quie amendment to the Elementary and Secondary Education Act. (ESEA)

The proposal advanced by Rep. Albert H. Quie (R., Minn.), would scrap the present method of making funds available for specific and clearly defined programs. It would substitute in its place a system of block grants to the states for general educational purposes.

To his credit, Mr. Quie disavows any intention of using his proposal as a way of avoiding the requirements of the school desegregation guidelines or undermining Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, which prohibits discrimination in all federally-assisted programs.

A Bandwagon for Southerners

But what Mr. Quie professes is one thing. What many Southern members see in his proposal is another. Encouraged by some Republicans, they are lining up behind the Quie amendment because they hope it will help them get out from under the school desegregation guidelines.

Because the present education act requires that funds be allocated in strict categories, the federal government can keep fairly close watch on how the money is being used. But a block grant would leave it up to state officials to allocate the money among their school programs.

It is hard enough now to check on compliance with the school guidelines and title VI. The Quie amendment, by giving greater control to the states, would make it even more difficult to catch evasions.

The Southerners are so eager to try the new plan that many of them are backing the Quie bill even though under its formula authorizations to 16 Southern and border states would be reduced by $373 million. (It would also, incidentally, cut the authorizations for New York, California, Illinois and New Jersey by $134 million.)

Other Flaws in the Quie Bill

Mr. Quie's proposal suffers from other defects.

1. Only 50 percent of all the funds would be set aside for the educationally deprived. The ESEA would make 80 percent of the funds available to these children.

2. With control in the hands of state education departments, agencies that often have a strong rural bias, there is a likelihood that cities will suffer discrimination in the allocation of funds.

3. The Quie bill would wipe out some of the innovative programs developed under the ESEA, the Teacher Corps, most notably, but also special education for children in state institutions for the handicapped, neglected or delinquent, etc. It would also eliminate programs meant to benefit specific groups such as the children of migrant workers, foster children and children on Indian reservations.

Every major education group opposes the Quie proposal even though it has been amended four times in an effort to secure support.

Some Alarming Consequences

Entirely apart from the merits or defects of the Quie proposal, there is another issue involved here. Opponents of the Great Society are out to wreck its major programs. The Quie amendment offers them a chance to carve up education. If they succeed, the coalition of Southern Democrats and hide-bound Republicans that has blocked much socially necessary legislation in the past would be encouraged to attack other programs such as those dealing with health and poverty.

Attempts would be made to apply the system of block grants to other programs and since all of them are subject to Title VI this could provide another way to undermine that section of the Civil Rights Act.

The Conference Opposes the Quie Amendment

For many of these reasons, Washington representatives to the Leadership Conference, at a meeting on April 26, agreed to oppose the Quie amendment.

At the moment, the Elementary and Secondary Education Act has been reported out of the House Education and Labor Committee and the Rules Committee. It is being readied for action on the House floor and may be brought up within the next week or so. At that point Mr. Quie will offer his proposal as a substitute for the committee bill (H.R.7819). No doubt the segregationist forces will begin to offer amendments of their own, changes intended to weaken Title VI and restrict its enforcement. We anticipate attempts to stop or slow school desegregation.

Things You can do.

We urge all of our organizations to oppose the Quie amendment.

1. Adopt a resolution against the Quie proposal and release it to the press.

2. Try to get local papers to run editorials in opposition (we enclose with this MEMO two good ones from the New York Times and the Washington Post). Send copies to your Congressmen and ask them to insert them in the Congressional Record.

3. Ask your members to write to their House members urging them to vote not only against the Quie amendment but against all amendments that might weaken Title VI.

4. Cities stand to lose under the Quie proposal. Try to enlist mayors and councilmen in the opposition to it.

The kind of legislation we get from the 90th Congress may be determined by the outcome of this fight. We have got to win it.

NEW YORK TIMES, Wednesday, April 26, 1967

School Aid Under Attack

The House Republicans are playing a dangerous game with the program for Federal aid to elementary and secondary schools.

As worked out in the 1965 law, this program managed skillfully to steer around racial and religious antagonisms that had previously killed school-aid bills for a generation. Instead of general school aid, the law provides for assistance to individual school districts based upon the number of their children from families with annual incomes under $3,000. This provision funnels the aid to the districts that need it most.

Under this law the Feleral funds remain under the control of public officials, but children in parochial schools are qualified to receive the same kind of supplementary assistance as those in public schools. In practice, such aid means providing them with the services of a remedial reading teacher or a guidance counselor or with a hot breakfast program. No money goes directly to any private or parochial school. Naturally, the program involves some fairly detailed Federal requirements including racial equality, but it has worked well because it also elicits cooperation between public and parochial school administrators at the local district level.

In place of this intricate and ingenious compromise, the Republican minority on the House Education and Labor Committee under leadership of Representative Quie of Minnesota proposes the substitution of block grants to the states for educational purposes. The formula of the Quie bill would provide less money for the impoverished rural districts of the South, but it appeals to racist sentiment because state education commissioners in the South could more easily evade Federal desegregation requirements.

The Quie bill attempts to pacify parochial school supporters by including a proviso that one-half of the block grants would have to be used for special programs in which poor children in religious schools could participate, much as they do now. But most states have language in their constitutions forbidding the spending of public money for private schools, and this restrictive language might be held to apply if the states received any genuine discretion in the use of these Federal grants. Moreover, unfortunately, some states have a history of bitter ill-will between their state departments of education and parochial school systems.

If Republicans and Southern Democrats unite to substitute the Quie bill for the simple renewal of the existing law, the effect may be to kill school aid altogether. This is because most Catholic members are likely then to vote against the bill on final passage. In short, there is serious danger that the nasty quarrels of the past will be exacerbated.

It is possible that block grants to the states might usefully be substituted for some existing Federal programs, but such a change would have to be made on an extremely limited, experimental basis and with great caution. The highly charged school aid program is the least promising place to begin.

The Washington Post

Congress and the Schools

The whole character and purpose of Federal aid to education is now under challenge. Congressman Quie's amendment promises to derange far more than the benefits to parochial schools. The Act was specifically written to funnel Federal funds into the schools that serve the most bitterly deprived children. Congressman Quie now proposes to dilute this commitment to a point at which it would become meaningless.

The national pledge to come to the rescue of the slum schools, both urban and rural, is the heart of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act. That pledge is now the target of the attack that, under Mr. Quie's leadership, is now gathering in the House of Representatives.

The Quie amendment would set up a new distribution formula putting far less money into those states where blight and poverty are most severe. According to the figures offered by the author himself, the states that would receive substantially larger proportions of the Federal aid are Utah, Ohio, Idaho, New Hampshire and Indiana. Those that would receive much smaller shares are New York (on a catastrophic scale), Mississippi and California. The District's share would be cut to less than half the present level.

The partisan advantage to Republican Congressmen is obvious enough. Within the states Mr. Quie would require only half of the Federal money to go to deprived children, compared with the present allocation of well over three quarters. That means less for the inner city up North and less for the rural countryside down South. It means much more for the suburbs and the prosperous small cities.

But the amendment has a powerful appeal that reaches well beyond the Republican Party. It would require the Federal Government to give each state its annual share in one big block grant, to be divided up within the state by the state education authorities. This procedure is drawing support from all those Congressmen who resent in principle the Federal influence on the local schools. It is drawing support from all those Congressmen who are fed up with the administrative complexities and delays that, in practice, the present rules have generated.

Under the law as it now stands, a school system has to draw up a separate application under each title of the Act, justify it in detail to state authorities, then wait for an equally detailed Federal review. This process gives the Federal Office of Education extremely precise control over the use of the money locally. But it also imposes a fearful burden of forms and questionnaires upon local school administrators, as well as excessive delays (the final distribution of Title I money for the current school year is just now reaching, for example, the classroom level in Virginia).

The Office of Education will have to be prepared, in the coming debate, for a great deal of solid and justified criticism of administrative requirements that force an average local school superintendent to deal with 15 or 20 separate Federal bureaucracies, administering separate funds under separate (and annually changing) regulations. Since the Commissioner of Education, Mr. Howe, is an extremely able and sensible man, he can be expected to recognize the urgency in reorganizing and radically simplifying the Federal procedures. Mr. Howe has already begun that process. It can be carried a great deal further without requiring Congress to destroy the purpose of the Education Act.

The slum schools, city and country, are the least effective in the Nation. They are the least successful in teaching their pupils to read and write. They desperately need more resources. The Federal aid is only beginning to take effect there. To disperse these crucial funds now, to scatter them indiscriminately among the best schools with the worst and the richest communities with the poorest, would be a dereliction of national duty. It would be a betrayal of the promise of equal opportunity to the country's least fortunate children.

May 17, 1967

An Urgent MEMO

TO: Participating Organizations

FROM: Arnold Aronson, Secretary

A MAJOR ATTACK ON SCHOOL DESEGREGATION BEGINS

The gains of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 have never been in graver danger than they will be the week of, May 22. That's when the House begins to consider new amendments to the Elementary and Secondary Education Act (ESEA).

In our last MEMO (No. 8-67) we discussed the threat to school desegregation posed by the amendment Rep. Albert Quie (R., Minn.) plans to offer once the bill reaches the floor Monday. But other amendments are being readied, too. Taken together, these proposed changes are part of an attempt to cut the heart out of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. They are meant to halt school desegregation by hacking away at Title VI of the Act, the section that prohibits discrimination in Federally-assisted programs.

The Office of Education's school desegregation guidelines are based on Title VI. If these amendments succeed the whole basis for the guidelines will be undermined and we will lose the most effective means we have for dual school systems.

Start Now

We hope as you read this MEMO you will start planning what you and your organization can do to rally forces we need to repel this new attack.

Worse than Quie

Some of the proposed amendments would be more crippling than the Quie Amendment. Quie, as we pointed out last time, would scrap the present system of grants for specific programs in elementary and secondary schools and substitute in its place a system of making block grants for education to the states to spend pretty much as they please. The greater latitude this would give state officials in deciding how to spend the money would almost certainly result, in some states, in new attempts to evade the desegregation guidelines. In many states block grants might offer a way to shortchange the cities and their large underprivileged and minority populations.

Worse things face us. One of the amendments that may be offered would amend Section 704 of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act in such a sweeping fashion that schools would be removed from the coverage of Title VI. (We enclose a description of that amendment with this MEMO).

Fountain Amendment Again

We also anticipate that one of last year's worst amendments will be introduced again. This is a proposal by Rep. L. H. Fountain (D., N.C.) that would prevent the Office of Education from witholding funds for new programs from a school district it has good reason to believe discriminates until it had completed full hearings on the matter. One HEW attorney described the possible effect of the Fountain amendment by saying, "Governor Wallace could come to us and say he was going to use his funds to build new schools for whites and buy cattle prods to keep Negro students out of them and we would have to give him the money until we fininished the hearing a year from now." Although that amendment passed the House by a big vote, 221 to 116, a reasonable compromise was worked out in conference. It is some measure of the difficulties we face today that the amendment may be reintroduced next week not by Mr. Fountain but by Rep. Edith Green (D., Ore.) who certainly cannot be considered a segregationist.

What We Can Do

The votes on the ESEA this coming Monday and Tuesday are being heralded as a test of the Administration's ability to get its programs through Congress. It is no less a test of the civil rights movement. Title VI was one of the major achievements of our efforts in 1963 and 1964. It's about all we have to compel desegregation of schools, hospitals, nursing homes and other beneficiaries of Federal programs. If it is weakened or gutted this country will slip far back in its attempts to achieve full equality through law. What that will in public disillusionment, frustration and bitterness is simply beyond calculation.

ELEMENTARY AND SECONDARY EDUCATION ACT

PL 89-10 (ESEA 1965)

Federal Control of Education Prohibited

Sec. 604. Nothing contained in this Act* shall be construed to authorize any department, agency, officer, or employee of the United States to exercise any direction supervision, or constrol over the curriculum, program of instruction, administration, or personnel of any educational institution or school system, or over the selection of library resources, textbooks, or other printed or published instructional materials by any educational institution or school system.

Redesignated Sec. 604 as Sec. 704 and added before the period:", or to require the assignment or transportation of students or teachers in order to overcome racial imbalance."

*An amendment to Sec. 704 now is being proposed that would add (at the asterisk above) the words "or any othe Act." Such an amendment would eliminate the application of the Civil Rights Act and its Title VI to ESEA.

This is not a minor amendment. Its implications are obvious. It must be rejected.

We must make our position clear to Congress and the Administration:

1. Wire or write to House members

Urge them to stay on the floor during the two or three days the ESEA will be considered and vote against all amendments aimed at weakening the bill as reported by the Education and Labor Committee.

2. Wire or write Speaker John McCormack (D.,Mass.) and Republican Leader Gerald Ford (R., Mich.)

Tell them we see next week's vote as a test of their commitment to civil rights and ask them to reject all attempts to undermine Title VI and its enforcement.

3. Wire or Write President Johnson

Urge him to come out publicly and oppose all amendments to the bill with the same vigor he has opposed the Quie amendment. But please start at once. We have less than a week to save. A law that carries so great an investment of work and hopes.

URGENT

TO: Participating Organizations

FROM: Arnold Aronson, Secretary

HELP SAVE TITLE VI

The Leadership Conference observed the 13th anniversary of the U. S. Supreme Court school decision by issuing, on May 17, an attack on the latest efforts to make that historic ruling meaningless.

As the statement we enclose with this MEMO points out, the Elementary and Secondary Education Act (ESEA), which the House will take up this Monday, May 22, is being used as a means "for reversing court decisions and Federal law and halting the efforts to end segregated dual school systems."

Many amendments are being readied for introduction when the Act comes up. Debate may be finished Monday and the final votes are expected to come on Tuesday. That doesn't give us much time to act. We appeal to all of our participating organizations and to those interested and concerned persons who get our MEMO to do one thing:

Write, wire, or phone your Congressmen at once and urge them to stay on the House floor those two days, vote for the Committee bill (H.R. 7819), and vote against all amendments aimed at crippling or nullifying Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

There are all sorts of ways to commemorate an anniversary. There's no better way to remember May 17th than to do what we can to save the start we have made toward school desegregation.

Leadership Conference Statement on the Anniversary of the 1954 Supreme Court School Decision

Scarcely three years after Congress undertook to end racial discrimination through law, we face a mood in Washington that seems intent upon wiping out whatever progress has been made. Today, on the 13th anniversary of the Supreme Court school decision, we witness the most disheartening manifestation of this mood: a drive in Congress to halt the few steps we have taken toward school desegregation.

Evidence of this new attempt to turn back the clock continues to multiply.

In the appropriations committees of Congress we see efforts to legislate by appropriation. Funds badly needed for civil rights enforcement are cut back. Bargains are exacted from government agencies that are doing no more than trying to carry out the responsibilities placed upon them by the Congress in the Civil Rights Act of 1964. We find further evidence of the retreat in the Senate, where the Civil Rights Act of 1967 is quite clearly bogged down.

The most glaring example of the tendency in Congress to placate Southern segregationists occurs ironically on this anniversary. It is the attempt to use the Elementary and Secondary Education Act (ESEA) as a means for reversing court decisions and Federal law and halting the efforts to end segregated dual school systems. We see this in the Quie amendment to substitute block grants for categorical aid. We sense a willingness in some quarters to accept as a price for defeating the Quie amendment other amendments that may be even more destructive of civil rights enforcement.

Disillusionment with the efficacy of legislation is already widespread. Nothing is more calculated to further that disillusionment than capitulation in Congress to segregationist pressures and timidity on the part of the Federal agencies in carrying out their civil rights obligations.

We in the Leadership Conference do not believe that the people of this country are ready to turn back. We call upon the President to exercise the leadership he has supplied before, by backing the government officials and agencies that are trying to carry out their responsibilities and exerting his full influence to block amendments to ESEA that would have the effect of destroying Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. We call upon the Democratic and Republican leadership in the House and Senate to stop the retreat in Congress and to get on with their constitutional obligations to end the last vestiges of enslavement and inequality. We call upon the millions of Americans represented by our participating organizations to express the kind of national concern that led to the enactment of the major civil rights laws of recent years. We cannot turn back. We will not see the destruction of laws that carry so great an investment of our work and hope. The alternative to progress through law is anarchy. There is no other course for this country but to move on toward freedom.

June 5, 1967

TO: PARTICIPATING ORGANIZATIONS

THE HOUSE VOTES CURBS ON SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

What the House ended up doing to the Elementary and Secondary Education Act (ESEA) was not as bad as we feared it would be. Nevertheless, the effect of the changes adopted during the three days of bitter, often confusing debate would be to impede effective civil rights enforcement and to make progress toward school desegregation more difficult.

Quie Amendment Defeated

Most of the campaign against weakening changes was directed at the Quie amendment and that was defeated, 197 to 168. As proposed by Rep. Albert Quie (R., Minn.), it would have scrapped the present system of direct federal aid to impoverished school districts and instituted, instead, a system of block grants to the states, to spend on education as they saw fit.

By giving the states greater control over programs, the Quie amendment offered Southern school districts a possible way of avoiding their legal obligation to desegregate. In spite of Quie's denials that his amendment could be used in such a way, Southern Democrats were attracted to it.

The task of defeating the Quie amendment thus largely became the task of persuading Southern members to vote against it, since it had almost complete Republican support. The situation gave the Dixiecrats of Congress a strategic advantage. Though rumors of deals were resolutely denied, it seems unlikely that the Southerners did not wring a few concessions. The votes on a few of the amendments indicate they did win some.

Move to Nullify Title VI also Defeated

Although it drew little attention in the press, the most notable victory for civil rights was the defeat of an amendment offered by Rep. L.H. Fountain (D., N.C.), that would have had the effect of nullifying Title VI, the section of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 that requires all federally-supported programs to be administered without discrimination.

Its defeat by a standing vote of 167 to 101 suggests that if the 90th Congress is ready to slow down Title VI enforcement, it is not yet ready to repeal the Title outright.

The Amendments That Got In

While the Quie amendment was beaten, two "mini-Quies" as the press dubbed them, were adopted. Offered by Rep. Edith Green (D., Ore.), they would give the states control over the $515 million the Act would authorize for experimental programs and the $80 million it would authorize for strengthening state departments of education.

The experimental programs constitute one of the finest achievements of the ESEA. Giving the states control of these funds probably means a large part of the money would be spent on existing programs and on unimaginative ones.

Other troublesome amendments were added to the bill:

1. A second proporal by Mrs. Green that would require all HEW rules, regulations, guidelines, etc., to be applied uniformly to all 50 states and to carry citations of their statutory or legal authority.

2. Another Fountain amendment that would prevent the Department of Health, Education and Welfare (HEW) from withholding funds for new education programs from any school district it believes is practising discrimination until it has completed hearings in the matter and found a violation.

3. An amendment by Rep. John N. Erlenborn (R., Ill.) that strikes from the ESEA an authorization to continue the Teacher Corps, after June 30.

Of all these amendments, the most dangerous is Mr. Fountain's. It would deprive HEW of one of the few weapons it has for compelling compliance with the law. The same amendment was adopted by the House last year. However, a conference between the House and Senate worked out a compromise that permitted HEW to withhold funds for 90 days if it completed its hearing in that time. One of our major objectives when the ESEA comes before the Senate will be to try and get the Fountain amendment struck or at least to have last year's compromise reestablished.

A Chance for the Teacher Corps

All may not be lost with the Teacher Corps. An authorization to continue it is contained in the Higher Education Act now before a House Education and Labor subcommittee chaired by Mrs. Green. But if the Corps is not to be dismantled, action will have to be taken before June 30, when its present authorization expires.

What do the Green Amendments do?

For those who know what a good voting record she has on civil rights and education, one of the great disappointments of the debate was finding Mrs. Green siding most of the time with the foes of desegregation. Her proposals generated most of the heat in the debate and very little light.

Most puzzling of all was her amendment requiring uniform application of all HEW rules, regulations, etc. This was clearly aimed at the school desegregation guidelines HEW first issued in 1965. But that is all that is clear. Seldom has the House witnessed such utter confusion as that which attended the floor debate on this proposal.

While Mrs. Green's call for a uniform application of the guidelines has a surface fairness, it is based on a misunderstanding of what the desegregation guidelines were meant to do. They were never meant to apply to all school districts in the nation. As HEW Secretary John W. Gardner explained in a letter to House members, they were issued to help about 2,000 districts in the South by providing a measure for the progress they must make toward ending their dual school systems, if they are to continue to receive federal funds.

How these guidelines can be applied to Northern districts was never fully clarified. Mrs. Green's amendment, Rep. James O'Hara (D., Mich.) observed, was "either meaningless or mischievous." However he, Rep. Frank Thompson (D., N.J.) and other House liberals questioned Mrs. Green so skillfully as to her intentions they established a legislative history for the amendment that suggests it might conceivably be used against de facto segregation in the North and to speed desegregation in the South.

The Harm of the "Mini-Quies"

Mrs. Green's "Mini-Quie" proposals apply to only a small portion of the funds authorized by the ESEA. But they open a path toward state control that opponents of federal standards for education will now try to enlarge. Rep. Wayne Hays (D., O.) put the matter in a true and caustic light when he observed, "The Green amendments.....ought to be called 'The Green amendments for the further deprivation of already deprived children.' I will try to tell (you) why. Who are the people who have neglected the children, that made the federal government get into this field? The states. My state is the sixth of the seven richest in the country and it is 39th in what it does for education. And the state department of education tried to veto every single grant for the deprived areas of Ohio and the grants had to be made around (it).

"The deprived children of Ohio, who are now getting some help....are going to have it taken away from them." The situation in Ohio is not unique.

An Old Alliance is Revived

One striking aspect of the ESEA debate was the revival at strategic moments of the Republican-Dixiecrat coalition. Republican leader Gerald Ford, in a recent speech, pronounced it dead. His strategy, he said, was to drive the Dixiecrats into the arms of the Democratic party. If he meant it, he must have been embarrassed by the frequency with which the Southerners embraced the members of his own party. Most of the votes on the ESEA amendments were unrecorded. Yet it was easy to see from the gallery the many occasions on which Southerners and Republicans stood up on their sides of the aisle and marched through the teller lines together. The Fountain amendment that was added to the bill won because only 6 or 7 Republicans stood up against it. The coalition was never more evident than in the final hours of debate; its members blocked every attempt to conclude a session that lasted to nearly 2 A.M.; and whenever Mrs. Green spoke, she received standing ovations and rebel yells from Republicans and Dixiecrats.

Effects on HEW

The real casualty of the debate on ESEA is not the act so much as the morale of the officials in HEW who must administer it and carry out their responsibilities under the civil rights laws. They have already been intimidated by congressional criticism. They will probably be even more cautious after this.

The ESEA debate was not the only blow against the department. The day after the House added restrictions to the Education Act, it took up the matter of HEW's appropriations for fiscal 1968. Included in that was the Department's request for an extra $2 million to expand its civil rights enforcement work. It got only $1 million more--and a reprimand. The Appropriations Subcommittee wrote into its report a statement saying it had received testimony suggesting that HEW had gone beyond the law in enforcing its guidelines and cautioned the Department to follow the law and administer it "with firmness and fairness among all the states."

Since the testimony came from Southern congressional delegations bent on having no guidelines at all and since the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals has already twice upheld the constitutionality of the rules, the committee report was little more than a calculated insult. Rep. Byron Rogers (D., Colo.) was good enough to rise and defend HEW against its detractors. But the Department finds few champions and just as much harm as the Southerners are able to do to the spirit of the Department can be done by the silence of those in Congress and in our own organizations who should defend it.

What the Leadership Conference must do now.

Before the debate and during it the Leadership Conference and many of our organizations sent wires and statements to House members urging them to vote against Quie and all other weakening amendments. A number of Washington representatives worked tirelessly to protect the Act. All this effort certainly helped stop some of the most damaging changes proposed. But we must recognize that the response of the Conference organizations as a whole fell short of what was needed to meet the many threats that confronted the ESEA.

The fight now shifts to the Senate where we are determined to press for the elimination of some of the weakening amendments added to the bill. But if we are to succeed there we must redouble our efforts.

HOW MANY COPIES OF THE PRESIDENT'S CIVIL RIGHTS MESSAGE CAN YOU USE?

Thanks to the generosity of the AFL-CIO, which underwrote the cost of printing, we were able to offer free copies of the eloquent civil rights message President Johnson sent to Congress at the start of this session.

If you have a convention coming up or a large meeting, we urge you to plan a session on the Civil Rights Act of 1967. Each of your members ought to have a copy of the message. We will send copies as long as the supply lasts. On large orders we will have to charge postage, but that charge is minimal.

A NEW PAMPHLET ON "RIGHT TO WORK" AND MINORITY RIGHTS

Bayard Rustin has written an excellent pamphlet, entitled "Right to Work" Laws--A Trap for America's Minorities. A copy will be sent to you shortly. You may order additional copies from the A. Philip Randolph Institute.

CONGRESS BUILDS DISCRIMINATION INTO THE WESTON ATOM SITE

Within the week Congress will begin considering a proposal to build a $300 million atomic energy facility in a heavily segregated section of Illinois.

The matter comes before the House and Senate in a bill (H.R.10918) reported out by the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy. The joint House-Senate body approved $7.3 million for fiscal 1968 that would permit the Atomic Energy Commission to begin designing a 200-billion electronic-volt accelerator for Weston, Illinois, even though there is every indication that Negroes could not find housing near the plant and could thus be frustrated in their attempts to find employment there.

A Closed Housing Market

The joint committee approved the Weston site, 11 to 3, even though it is now clear that the Illinois state legislature, which is scheduled to adjourn at the end of this month, will not pass a fair housing law. In fact it has killed eight pending laws. Thus if the huge facility is built, it will be located in a tiny farm community, 35 miles west of Chicago, that offers no prospect of adequate housing for minority workers. The National Committee Against Discrimination in Housing estimates that 83 percent of the housing in the area is closed to Negroes. That means most colored workers will have to live in Chicago and commute about 70 miles a day if they take a job at Weston.

Pastore Protests

The joint committee's action was taken in spite of the vigorous protests of its Co-Chairman, Senator John O. Pastore (D., R.I.). He was joined by Senators Henry M. Jackson (D., Wash.)

and George D. Aiken (R., Vt.) in objecting to the location of the facility where it can only perpetuate discrimination in housing and employment.

In separate views in the report on the bill, Senator Pastore pointed out that of the six states under consideration as possible sites for the atom smasher, AEC chose the one that has no open housing law. This, he said, in spite of its announced policy that "the local status of civil rights and non-discrimination would be of primary concern in making its choice." He observed, "having introduced civil rights and non-discrimination as a major issue, the AEC then conveniently set it aside. In effect, the Commission took a bold and forthright public position--while privately, its position was one of compromise and retreat."

The Senator denounced the selection in passionate words: "In the name of advancing science and technology we should not be guilty of retreating from our boasted principles of equity, equality, humanity. That would be an offense to our conscience. That would be an affront to our intelligence . . . . . I do not exaggerate--the soul of man is at stake when his dignity is endangered by discrimination. Let us be done with such inequity."

The Situation in Congress

Pastore has indicated he is ready to lead a fight against the Weston site once the AEC authorization bill comes to the Senate floor. However, action on the joint committee's report will come first in the House. Last Thursday the House Rules Committee cleared the bill for action allotting two hours for debate and permitting amendments. The bill may come up this Wednesday. When it will come before the Senate isnot known as this MEMO is written.

A number of organizations in the Leadership Conference have already begun to voice their objections to the Weston site. All organizations, all individuals opposed to it, must let their Congressmen, the AEC and the White House know immediately, if they are to have any effect.

July 7, 1967

TO: Participating Organizations

FROM: Arnold Aronson, Secretary

RE: A Summary of New Developments

CONGRESS BEGINS TO MOVE ON CIVIL RIGHTS

Just before it quit for the July 4th recess, Congress began to stir on civil rights. This MEMO is an assessment: of what happened in the last few weeks; of our immediate prospects; and of what we need to do.

Action in House and Senate

For the first time since the beginning of this session, the House has shown signs of activity. The House Judiciary Committee has reported out two sections of the Civil Rights Act of 1967 as separate bills.

One, H.R.2516, is essentially Title V of the omnibus Act. It is meant to give Negroes and civil rights workers greater protection against racist attacks. It prescribes stiff penalties for anyone who injures or intimidates another person, because of that person's race, color, religion or national origin, while he is exercising his constitutional rights to vote, attend public school or college, enjoy federal or state programs or facilities, seek employment, engage in jury service, use public transportation, or enjoy places of public accommodation or amusement. The maximum penalty would be $10,000 fine and 10 years' imprisonment if there is bodily injury (or life imprisonment in the case of death); and $1,000 fine and one year's imprisonment for unlawful threats or harassment.

The second bill the Committee reported out, H.R.10805, would simply extend the life of the U.S. Civil Rights Commission for five years, from January 31, 1968, its expiration date, to January 31, 1973. This is Title VI of the omnibus bill.

The Price for Title V

A subcommittee of House Judiciary sought to join the Title V protections to one of the many anti-riot acts that have been introduced in this Congress. However, the Chairman of the House Rules Committee, William M. Colmer (D., Miss.), told Emanual Celler (D., N.Y.), Chairman of House Judiciary, he would not clear the combined bill for floor action. He insisted that the anti-riot act and the Title V measure be offered as separate bills and promised if they were to grant a rule on each one. Mr. Celler reluctantly agreed.

The anti-riot bill (H.R.421) would make it a federal crime to cross state lines with the intent of inciting people to riot. It's chief sponsor, Rep. William Cramer (D., Fla.) insists the bill is directed against racist groups like the American Nazi Party and the Klan, but it is so broadly and vaguely drawn it might lend itself to use against peaceful demonstrations and peaceful picketing.

The Leadership Conference will fight the bill, but we realize fully how hard it will be to block such a measure, considering the current mood of Congress.

Last year Mr. Cramer put forward a similar proposal as an amendment to the Civil Rights Act of 1966. It carried overwhelmingly, 389 to 25. When the 1966 bill was stopped in the Senate, so was the anti-riot act. As a separate bill it may well be enacted into law--potentially a dangerous and mischievous one.

On the Senate Side

In the Senate, a subcommittee of Labor and Public Welfare, headed by Senator Joseph Clark (D., Pa.), has completed hearings on S.1308, a measure intended to strengthen the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, mainly by giving it authority to issue cease and desist orders. The bill is expected to be reported to the full committee shortly. It is Title III of the omnibus bill.

As for the remaining titles of the omnibus bill, Title I, which would prohibit discrimination in the choice of federal juries has been the subject of extensive hearings by a subcommittee of Senate Judiciary; Title II, which would extend similar prohibitions in the selection of state juries has yet to be set for hearing; a subcommittee of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee may hold hearings on the fair housing section, Title IV, sometime in August. Senator Walter Mondale (D., Minn.) will chair these sessions.

The Conference Will Testify

The Leadership Conference will certainly present testimony in support of the Fair Housing bill. On August 8, the Conference is scheduled to testify before a Senate Judiciary Subcommittee headed by Senator Sam Ervin (D., N.C.), on the entire omnibus bill (S.1026), all six titles.

Funds and ESEA and Atom Smasher Sites

Other civil rights measures in which the Leadership Conference is keenly interested are still pending. Two subcommittees of the Senate Appropriations Committee should begin work shortly after the current recess ends on July 10. Three appropriations matters of vital concern to the Conference are: funds for the Department of Health, Education and Welfare's civil rights enforcement work in fiscal 1968; the fiscal 1968 budget for the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission; and funds for HEW's program under Title IV of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, to help school districts deal with problems incident to desegregation. The House cut all of these appropriations and we need to work for restoration of the full amounts. (See MEMO: No.11-67.)

A subcommittee of Labor and Public Welfare should begin consideration, soon, of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act, which passed the House with several amendments we consider harmful (see MEMO: No.10-67). We will attempt to have these amendments knocked out in the Senate.

Although the House approved an initial amount to start work on the multimillion dollar atom smasher at Weston, Illinois, in a heavily segregated section of the state, an attempt will be made to stop the project when authorization for it comes up on the Senate floor, probably soon after the recess ends.

Summary of Civil Rights Activity

1. Civil Rights Act of 1967

Title I - Federal Jury Reform	- In Senate Judiciary Subcommittee hearings still continuing
Title II - State Jury Reform	- In Senate Judiciary Subcommittee no hearings scheduled yet
Title III - Strengthen EEOC	- In Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee - hearings concluded
Title IV - Fair Housing	- In Senate Banking and Currency. Hearings scheduled to start in August.
Title V - Protect Constitutional Rights	- Reported out by House Judiciary June 29, 1967

Title VI - extend U.S. Civil Rights Commission 5 years -

Reported out by House Judiciary June 29, 1967

2. Appropriations

HEW Civil Rights Enforcement - $5,411,000 - In Senate Appropriations before Lister Hill Subcommittee. Chairman Lister Hill (D., Ala.)

Title IV and EEOC - fiscal 1968 budgets - In Senate Appropriations subcommittee Chairman John McClellan (D., Ark.)

What to do

Leadership Conference organizations and individuals who support civil rights can help by following the course we have advocated in recent MEMOs. We need a barrage of mail to Senators Hill and McClellan and the members of their subcommittees, urging full appropriations for civil rights programs and no "riders" to these bills that will make enforcement difficult.

At summer meetings and conventions, urge your members to write to their Senators and Congressmen urging action on the Civil Rights Act of 1967 this year.

RUSTIN SCORES THE "RIGHT TO WORK" LAWS

As we promised in MEMO No.10, we include with this mailing a copy of Bayard Rustin's new pamphlet, "Right to Work" Laws - A Trap for America's Minorities. Additional copies of this valuable booklet can be ordered direct from the A.Philip Randolph Institute, using the coupon on the last page.

A CALL TO ACTION ON OFF-BASE HOUSING

Within the past month, the Defense Department has taken a laudable step toward ending housing discrimination. It has declared off-limits to all personnel, those apartments and trailer camps near six military bases in Maryland that refuse to accommodate Negro servicemen.

On June 23, when the Department issued its first directive, the one aimed at segregated housing near Andrews Air Force base, Leadership Conference Chairman Roy Wilkins sent a telegram to Defense Secretary Robert S. McNamara hailing the move as an important first step, but urging him to employ the same sanction against segregated housing at all the large bases in the country--nearly 300 of them. That was our position when Mr. Wilkins and a delegation drawn from the Conference's Committee on Compliance and Enforcement met with Secretary McNamara and his staff back in May. It is still our position. The Executive Committee of the Leadership Conference now calls upon all of our participating organizations to join in an intensive campaign to end discrimination in all off-base housing.

The Department has the Power

If there was ever any question about the Department's authority to issue directives against segregated off-base housing, it has been clearly settled by the moves against the six Maryland bases. What must be done now is to convince the Department to take the same action everywhere.

Secretary McNamara is sensitive to the problem. He showed that in his meeting with Leadership Conference representatives and in his own public statements. Noting, recently, that the more than 300,000 Negro servicemen in the armed forces can count on full equality in the ranks and on the base he observed that once they go off the base "equality is a lamentable casualty. Thousands of men in uniform, many of them combat veterans, and their families are being subjected to humiliating discrimination by the refusal of landlords to rent or sell because of race, color or creed."

He has called for a nationwide census of housing near some 300 bases and expects the base commanders to report back to him by Aug.15.

Why Maryland?

Meanwhile, the Secretary has shown, in Maryland, that the Department is ready to act before the study is fully completed. There are several reasons why he chose to make his first move against bases in that state. For one thing it is close to the nation's capital and discrimination that close to the nation's capital can be a source of acute embarrassment. For another, the Maryland legislature this last session and the governor of the state, Spiro T. Agnew, both urged the Department to end discrimination against military personnel.

Another factor in the Maryland situation, and one that should be very instructive to organizations in the Conference, was the six months campaign of a determined and energetic local fair housing group ACCESS (the Action Coordinating Committee to End Segregation in the Suburbs). This group is a model for what local action can accomplish. Organizations throughout the country ought to start emulating it.

What Your Organization can do

The Executive Committee of the Leadership Conference recommends that all participating organizations give top priority to the campaign to open all off-base housing to servicemen:

1. If your organization is holding a convention why not schedule a workshop on off-base housing? We can supply material.

2. Wires and letters and convention resolutions should be sent to Secretary of Defense Robert S. McNamara, c/o The Pentagon, and President Lyndon B. Johnson, congratulating them on the first steps but urging them to see that the off-limits sanction against segregated off-base housing is extended as quickly as possible.

4. If you have chapters in communities with military bases, get them to join with other interested groups and have them send delegations to commanding officers urging them to ask Secretary McNamara to issue a directive where voluntary attempts to persuade local real estate interests to desegregate have met with failure.

5. Local groups should visit their mayors and governors and newspaper editors and urge them to take up the campaign for open housing for servicemen. It was just this kind of local pressure by ACCESS that helped move the Defense Department on Maryland.

6. Every group should have its members write to members of Congress urging them to communicate with Secretary McNamara, praising him for his efforts but asking him to extend them.

The Executive Committee does not see this campaign as an alternative to a national fair housing law. We shall still press for that. But we do see that the needs of Negro servicemen are so immediate and the wrong so glaring, we must move on this at once. When a man is ready to lay down his life for his country he ought to be able to find a place to rest his head.

HAVE YOU SENT YOUR MESSAGE IN SUPPORT OF CIVIL RIGHTS APPROPRIATIONS YET?

The appropriations for civil rights enforcement, equal employment work and school desegregation programs are still before two Senate Appropriations Subcommittees.

1. The Department of Health, Education and Welfare's budget for enforcement work in fiscal 1968 was scaled down by the House to $4,511,000. The Department is asking $5.4 million.

2. The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission is seeking $7.2 million for fiscal 1968. The House cut that to $6.5 million.

3. HEW is asking for $30 million to help meet a backlog of applications from desegregating school districts seeking expert help under Title IV of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. The House voted only $10 million.

What you can do

What's needed now are messages and convention resolutions to the two Senate Appropriations subcommittees now considering these budget requests, urging them to restore the House cuts.

Letters calling for full enforcement funds for HEW should go to these subcommittee members:

Democrats	Republicans
Hill (Alabama) Chairman	Javits (New York)
Russell (Georgia)	Cotton (New Hampshire)
Magnuson (Washington)	Case (New Jersey)
Stennis (Mississippi)
Bible (Nevada)
Byrd (West Virginia)
Holland (Florida)
Bartlett (Alaska)

Letters urging a full budget for the EEOC and for Title IV programs should go to these Senators:

Democrats		Republicans
McClellan (Arkansas)	Chairman	Smith (Maine)
Ellender (Louisiana)		Hruska (Nebraska)
Holland (Florida)		Cotton (New Hampshire)
Pastore (Rhode Island)		Case (New Jersey)
McGee (Wyoming)		Javits (New York)
Byrd (West Virginia)
Mansfield (Montana)

The subcommittees may act within the next few weeks so try to get your messages out now.

RE: A Summary of Civil Rights Actions

THE RIGHTS PROTECTION BILL MOVES TO SENATE: OTHERS STILL PENDING

To an accompaniment of bitter speeches denouncing urban riots and black militants, the House last week did an important and heartening thing. It passed by an overwhelming vote of 326 to 93 a bill the Leadership Conference has long worked for and advocated; a measure that gives the Justice Department greater powers to move against anyone interfering with constitutionally-protected civil rights.

Passage of the bill (H.R.2516) is evidence that in spite of the generally hostile mood of this Congress it is still possible to get approval of basic legislation.

A Substantial Measure

Although there were nine amendments to the bill, some of them reflecting the current preoccupation with the riots, the measure that was finally voted out is still significant and substantial. It would protect against injury or intimidation persons exercising their rights in eight areas: voting, attending public schools, using facilities supported by the federal government or the state, seeking employment, serving on juries, using any kind of public transportation, enjoying the benefits of any federally-assisted program, visiting restaurants or hotels or any places of public accommodation. Violations of the law would be subject to penalties ranging from a minimum of $1,000 fine and not more than one year in jail to $10,000 and ten years in the case of serious bodily injury. In case of death, the maximum sentence could be life imprisonment.

The bill is now before the Senate.

Violence and Juries

The civil rights protection bill is essentially Title V of the omnibus Civil Rights Act of 1967. It complements Title I of that bill, the section that would prohibit discrimination in the selection of federal court juries. The protection bill would be much more effective if any cases that arose under it were tried before juries representative of the general community. Title I, as a separate bill, is now pending before a Senate Judiciary Subcommittee. All six titles of the omnibus bill have been introduced as separate bills. Here is a brief rundown of where they are:

Title I - Federal Jury Reform (S.1319)	In Senate Judiciary Subcommittee. Hearings before Sen. Joseph Tydings (D., Md.) completed. Awaiting markup and report.
Title II - State Jury Reform (S.1318)	In Senate Judiciary. Subject to hearings before Sen. Sam Ervin (D., N.C.) as part of omnibus bill (S.1026).
Title III - Strengthen Equal Employment Opportunity Commission by giving it power to issue cease-and-desist orders. (S.1308)	Hearings before Sen. Jos. Clark (D., Pa.) completed. Reported to full Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee and pending there.
Title IV - Fair Housing Act (S.1358)	Three days of hearings held before a Senate Banking and Currency Subcommittee under Sen. Walter Mondale (D.,Minn.). Record still open.
Title V - Protect Constitutional Rights (H.R.2516)	Passed House, August 16, 326-93.
Title VI - Extend U.S. Civil Rights Commission 5 years to Jan.31, 1973 (H.R.10805).	Passed House July 10, 282-89. Referred to Senate Judiciary Committee.

The omnibus Civil Rights Act of 1967 (S.1026), which contains all six titles, is the subject of what promises to be extensive and not very productive hearings before a Subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary headed by Senator Sam Ervin (D., N.C.), who in the last Congress used similar hearings to voice his opposition to the legislation.

Other Civil Rights Developments

1. The "Anti-Riot Act." Passed by the House July 19, 347 to 70, the bill would make it a federal crime for anyone who crossed state lines with the intent of inciting a riot. Crossing state lines can be done by mail or telephone. Vaguely and broadly drawn, the bill defines "public disturbance" in such a way that only three people need be involved and actual damage or injury need not occur. Senator Ervin has expressed misgivings about the constitutionality of the bill and as a result, Senator Eastland has taken over the bill and has been conducting hearings before the full Judiciary Committee.

2. Elementary and Secondary Education Act. (H.R.7819) Passed by the House, May 25, the bill now contains one amendment that would weaken enforcement of Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the section that prohibits discrimination in all federally-assisted programs. The "Fountain amendment," named after its sponsor, Rep. L.H. Fountain (D., N.C.), would prohibit HEW from cutting off funds for new programs in a school district it believes is discriminating, until there has been a hearing in which the district is found to be out of compliance. The same amendment was adopted last year by the House and compromised into harmlessness by a House-Senate conference. As it stands, it could deprive HEW of one of the few weapons it has to compel compliance with Title VI. The bill is now before Senate Education and Public Welfare. Other House amendments that ought to come out of the bill, would take controlover some of the programs away from the federal government and give it to state departments of education. Senator Wayne Morse (D., Ore.) is presently conducting hearings on this bill.

3. Off-Base Housing. Prodded into action by civil rights groups, the Defense Department has begun to try to correct a national disgrace: the denial of decent off-base housing to Negro servicemen and their families. In Maryland, at four bases, the Department has declared off-limits to all servicemen housing units that refuse to accept Negro servicemen. The Leadership Conference has repeatedly urged the Department, at the very least, to extend the same sanction to discriminatory housing near bases throughout the country. Almost 300 bases are under study by the Department.

What Needs to be Done

All Leadership Conference organizations and their sponsors should begin at once to concentrate on the Senate in urging fast action on the pending bills. Resolutions and letter-writing campaigns are the easiest way to begin. But the Labor Day recess is coming up and delegations to Senators would be the most effective way to act. The recess will run from September 1 through September 10. Plan now to visit Senators when they are home.

1. Urge members of the Senate Judiciary Committee to work for prompt passage of the full civil rights package.

2. Urge members of the Senate Labor Committee to report out the bill (S.1308) to strengthen the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

3. Urge all Senators to support the major civil rights measures outlined here when they reach the Senate floor.

LET'S BACK THE ANTI-POVERTY BILL!

Later this month, anytime from September 20th on, the Senate plans to take up the latest proposals for continuing the War on Poverty and, as part of it, to provide between 200,000 and 300,000 emergency jobs a year.

Mindful of how basic these programs are to any advances in civil rights, the Executive Committee of the Leadership Conference calls upon all participating organizations, if they have not yet done so, to back the latest anti-poverty bill (S.2388) and, particularly, the "Emergency Employment Act of 1967," an amendment added to the bill in committee by Senators Joseph Clark (D., Pa.), Jacob Javits (R., N.Y.), and a number of other sponsors.

The Bill Bears Out Conference Purpose

In urging support of the anti-poverty program, the Executive Committee does no more than give specific endorsement to legislation that will move us toward the goals of the Leadership Conference. The statement of purpose we adopted in January of this year declared that civil rights meant "not only the establishment and enforcement of rights in law, but also the realization of social and economic conditions in which alone the fulfillment of these rights is possible."

At its first meeting in March, the newly established Executive Committee endorsed, in principle, support of the War on Poverty as the logical consequence of our broad purpose. And if we need to mention any further precedent we recall, as we have on many occasions, that the slogan of the August 1963 March on Washington was "Jobs and Freedom."

Clark-Javits Plan Needs Special Support

That cry only emphasizes the importance of supporting the section of the anti-poverty bill that offers the most immediate antidote to the disorders of this past summer and the section that will probably face the heaviest attack once the bill is brought up on the Senate floor.

This is the Clark-Javits proposal for emergency employment. It would authorize a $2.5 billion program--$1 billion for fiscal 1968, to generate 200,000 immediate jobs and $1.5 billion in fiscal 1969 to open 300,000 more.

The program would put the unemployed largely unskilled poor of the cities and rural areas to work at once, cleaning and beautifying streets and parks, serving as aids in schools, hospitals and recreation areas--in short, tackling the immense backload of work needed to be done in the public service. The Labor Department would administer the program. Besides authorizing grants to public and private agencies to pay for the programs it would also provide financial assistance to assure that those employed would be given opportunities for further education and training in order to prepare them to obtain better regular jobs in the future.

Already Growing Support For The Idea

The Clark-Javits proposal is hardly new. An even broader bill, one that would provide at least 1 million emergency jobs each year, has been introduced in the House by a group of 76 members. The new Urban Coalition of labor, religious, civil rights and business forces, in the statement it adopted on August 24 (see MEMO No. 16-67) endorsed the idea of the Federal government as "employer of last resort" and called for an emergency work program whose first goal would be "putting at least 1 million of the presently unemployed into productive work at the earliest possible moment."

Three Presidential Commissions (the National Commission on Technology, Automation and Economic Progress; the White House Conference "To Fulfill These Rights," and the National Advisory Commission on Food and Fiber) have called for similar programs.

But no matter how widespread the idea is or how much support it is gathering, that support will mean very little unless it is in evidence when the anti-poverty bill comes up.

Basic Features of the Anti-Poverty Bill

The bill that comes before the Senate would authorize, in addition to the funds for the Clark-Javits program, another $2,258 billion to carry on the present poverty programs, such as the Job Corps, work and training for youth and adults, the Community Action programs, Head Start, volunteer projects involving VISTA, aid to the rural and urban poor, small business assistance, and a new program of day care for children of low-income families whose parents want to work or take vocational training.

The bill also keeps the Office of Economic Opportunity (OEO) as the central anti-poverty agency of the Federal government. And it returns local matching contributions for community action programs to a formula that would require 10 per cent in local funding to match 90 per cent in Federal money. Many rural areas and smaller cities have been unable to afford the 80-20 formula that went into effect July 1st.

What You Can Do

The summer riots only underscore what was perfectly plain already: that we can do little that is meaningful in civil rights without, at the same time improving the lot of some 34 million poor people. We therefore call upon all of our organizations to phone, wire and write their Senators urging them to vote for the Committee bill (S.2388) without any amendments.

It is one way to restate in 1967 the 1963 shout of "Jobs and Freedom."

NOTE: The Leadership Conference testimony on the omnibus Civil Rights Act of 1967 will be presented this coming Wednesday, September 20, at 10:30 a.m. before a Senate Judiciary Subcommittee headed by Senator Sam Ervin (D., N.C.). The hearing will be in Room 2228, New Senate Office Building. We urge all Washington representatives to be there.

A THREAT TO TITLE VI AND A NEW BURDEN TO SOCIAL SECURITY

The Social Security Bill, which came from the House with several features in it that would make life harder for people on welfare, has become the target of a new threat to civil rights enforcement.

A full action MEMO on Social Security legislation is in the process of being prepared and we hope to get it to you shortly. But an amendment (S. 2074) that Senator Herman Talmadge (D-Ga.) has put forth in the Senate Finance Committee, which is considering the Social Security bill, presents such an immediate danger to civil rights we want to call your attention to it at once. His proposal would open a way for hospitals to avoid coverage of Title VI, the section of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 that empowers the government to cut off funds to all Federally-assisted programs guilty of discrimination.

Patients and Standards Would Suffer

The Talmadge amendment would permit patients in hospitals not in compliance with the requirements of the Medicare program to receive a 75 per cent reimbursement of their medical expenses. In other words, these hospitals could practice discrimination with impunity and even fail to meet proper medical standards and patients in them would still get some of the Medicare benefits.

At present only 200 hospitals, most in Mississippi, Georgia and Louisiana, have refused to participate in the Medicare program because of Title VI. Their patients would be the immediate beneficiaries of the Talmadge amendment. But its harmful effect would not stop there. It would provide an enormous temptation for other Southern hospitals to drop out of compliance. It might also furnish a blueprint for legislation designed to help other Federally-assisted programs evade Title VI.

What You Can Do

The Talmadge amendment may be considered by the Senate Finance Committee this week. We urge all our participating organizations to wire members of the committee at once (a list of them is included with this MEMO). Urge them to oppose the Talmadge amendment (S. 2074). The Leadership Conference has already sent the following telegram to those members of the Committee who voted in favor of Title VI back in 1964:

"THE PROPOSED TALMADGE AMENDMENT (S. 2074) WOULD TURN BACK THE CLOCK AND REPUDIATE YOUR VOTE FOR TITLE VI OF THE CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964. WE URGE YOU TO OPPOSE A MOVE WHOSE ULTIMATE EFFECT WOULD BE TO LOWER MEDICAL STANDARDS AND DEPRIVE THOUSANDS OF THEIR RIGHT TO FULL EQUALITY IN MEDICAL TREATMENT."

Similar telegrams were sent to other Committee members. We are also wiring the President and Secretary of HEW John Gardner, urging them to voice their opposition to the Talmadge amendment as one more evidence of the dangerous trend in Congress to whittle Title VI away.

Please send your own wires to the Senators, the President and Mr. Gardner today!

CIVIL RIGHTS BILL FACES NEW THREAT IN COMMITTEE

The kind of civil rights bill we will get from this Congress may very well be determined on Wednesday, October 25. The full Senate Judiciary Committee has scheduled a meeting on one section of the Civil Rights Act of 1967 but will very likely consider others.

Our energies, in the next few days, must be directed toward seeing that the Committee members who will support a meaningful civil rights bill are present and voting.

To Protect the Rights of Citizens

The matter immediately before the Committee is legislation to protect Negroes and civil rights workers in the exercise of their constitutional rights -- Title V of the six titles in the omnibus Civil Rights Act.

As we have already reported, a bill to protect such rights, H.R. 2516, passed the House August 16. When it reached the Senate, it was referred to Senate Judiciary with instructions that it be reported back in 60 days. That time expires tomorrow, but the Senate will extend the time another week.

In Senate Judiciary, the bill came first before the Constitutional Rights Subcommittee, which Senator Sam Ervin (D-N.C.) chairs. Here, he won approval for his own version of H.R. 2516, a bill drastically different from the House-passed measure and, on the whole, much weaker. It tends to cut back on the rights protected and, in addition, attempts to fashion the bill into an instrument that could be used against organized labor.

Faults and Features of the Ervin Substitute

1. Coverage - Where the Ervin bill falls conspicuously short is in the kinds of activities it would protect. Like the House version of H.R. 2516, it would protect citizens exercising their rights to: vote in Federal elections; serve on Federal juries; enjoy Federally-sponsored and Federally-assisted benefits and programs; obtain equal opportunities in employment covered by the 1964 Civil Rights Act; and enjoy places of public accommodation.

But it omits other activities that the House version would protect such as state elections; service on state juries; enjoyment of exclusively state administered or assisted programs; attendance at public schools; use of public transportation; and all employment.

Senator Ervin would include about four other kinds of activities within coverage of the bill, but they are all negligible except one, protection for persons travelling in interstate commerce -- such as Col. Lemuel Penn, the Washington, D. C. man who was shot and killed on a public highway as he drove home from reserve officer training.

(Note: The rights Senator Ervin would remove from coverage are much more important than the ones he would add to the list. Southern elections and Southern schools, for instance, are notorious for the opportunities they afford for intimidation, harassment and physical violence. Ervin argues that schools would be covered anyway, since most of them participate in Federally-assisted programs. But not all schools do; the worst ones refuse Federal assistance so that they will not have to desegregate. The protection is still badly needed.

2. Exemption for Law Enforcement Officers and Firemen - Senator Ervin would exempt police, members of the National Guard and the U. S. Armed Forces engaged in suppressing riots or civil disturbances or while restoring law and order, regardless of the legality of their actions.

Considering how irresponsibly some policemen and guardsmen acted during the Newark and Detroit riots, such a blanket exemption seems unwise and dangerous.

3. Constitutional Basis - The Ervin substitute removes all references to the 14th Amendment, the foundation of all civil rights legislation.

4. Persons Protected - By dropping all reference to "race, color, religion, etc." Ervin would extend protected protections to everyone. Desirable as this may be, in some instances it could be too much of a good thing, since the broader coverage would tend to dilute enforcement. It would also offer protection to persons who don't need it, which is to say most white Americans. Negroes and civil rights workers in hostile Southern states would benefit from narrower and more specific coverage.

5. Penalties - The Ervin substitute keeps the penalties of previous versions of the bill, namely, a maximum fine of $1,000 or up to one year in prison or both; a maximum sentence of $10,000 or 10 years or both in the case of serious bodily injury; and a maximum sentence of life imprisonment in the case of death.

The "Union-Busting" Provisions

The most harmful features of the Ervin substitute are probably the two additions that don't belong in a civil rights bill at all -- amendments aimed at organized labor.

1. The first would subject to the penalties of the law, anyone who interfered with a person because he was working on a job or travelling to or from his place of employment. In short, it would encourage strike-breaking.

2. The second would prohibit any labor union or court from fining or taking any disciplinary action against any member who chose not to participate in "any strike or other concerted activity." Besides creating a situation highly injurious to union morale, the amendment would also reverse a decision of the U. S. Supreme Court, which held that such fines and disciplinary actions were justified.

An Alternative to Ervin

When the House meets on Wednesday morning, Senator Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.) intends to offer a substitute for the Ervin version, that is even better than the House-passed bill. It keeps the broadened coverage of the original Title V and it eliminates some of the less-desirable features of the House bill. It offers, therefore, a bill that deserves our wholehearted support.

What Happens Next

The 16-member Committee plans to meet on October 25 and complete action on the bill in a single day. Here is the Committee membership:

James O. Eastland (D-Miss.), Chairman

Democrats	Republicans
John L. McClellan (Ark.)	Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill.)
Sam J. Ervin, Jr. (N. C.)	Roman L. Hruska (Neb.)
Thomas J. Dodd (Conn.)	Hiram L. Fong (Hawaii)
Philip A. Hart (Mich.)	Hugh Scott (Pa.)
Edward V. Long (Mo.)	Strom Thurmond (S. C.)
Edward M. Kennedy (Mass.)
Birch Bayh (Ind.)
Quentin N. Burdick (N. D.)
Joseph D. Tydings (Md.)
George Smathers (Fla.)

At least nine of those Committee members, a clear majority, can be expected to support a strong civil rights measure: Senators Hart, Kennedy, Bayh, Dodd, Long, Burdick and Tydings among the Democrats and Senators Scott and Fong among the Republicans. If they are present and stay with the Committee all day, we can expect a good bill.

We, therefore, urge all of our participating organizations to wire these Senators today. Urge them to be present on October 25 and to stay in the committee room until all voting is completed and to support the Hart substitute. It is possible that efforts will be made in committee to add other titles of the omnibus civil rights bill to H. R. 2516. If so, members should be asked to vote for these additions.

Wednesday, October 25, can be a day of fateful decisions. We must help make certain that these decisions are the correct ones.

A SOCIAL SECURITY BILL THAT PUNISHES THE POOR

What began as an attempt by Congress to modernize the Social Security Act has, in the bill the House approved, resulted in several proposals that seem both backward and punitive.

Some of the House proposals come close to taking the long discredited view that the proper way to handle welfare is to insult the people who need it and try to push or scare them off the rolls.

When Newburgh, New York, in 1962, proposed to cut off assistance to recipients who refuse to take any jobs offered to them, it was excoriated throughout the nation for its medieval attitude. Yet the House-passed bill (H. R. 12080) has a provision that would authorize much that sort of treatment to dependent mothers and their children.

When Louisiana sought to cut off aid to mothers who gave birth to illegitimate children after going on relief, the Department of Health, Education and Welfare ruled the plan invalid. Yet the House, by placing a ceiling on aid to needy children seems to be trying, indirectly, to put its own limits on births.

The social security amendments are now before the Senate and it is here that we must concentrate our efforts for improvements in the 32-year-old statute that will make it responsive to the present needs of American society.

A Loophole for Hospitals

In one of our recent MEMOs (No. 19-67, October 9), we sounded the alarm in regard to an amendment that was not in the House-passed measure but was to be proposed as an addition to the bill during current consideration of it by the Senate Finance Committee. This was the amendment offered by Senator Herman Talmadge (D-Ga.) that would enable patients to receive Federal medical benefits in hospitals that are not in compliance with the Civil Rights Act of 1964. We pointed out, then, the obvious danger this poses to adequate enforcement of Title VI of the Act, the section that enables the Federal government to cut off funds to any Federally-assisted program that discriminates.

A Compromise Effected

As this MEMO is written, a compromise appears to have been worked out between HEW and Senator Talmadge. Patients in non-complying hospitals would still be reimbursed, although the percentage of reimbursement no longer appears to be fixed. But instead of allowing such reimbursements for a period running from the start of Medicare in 1966 to December 31, 1968, the compromise would move the cutoff date for such treatment to December 31, 1967.

While this is an improvement, the amendment still opens a loophole in Title VI enforcement and should still be opposed.

New Burdens on the Poor

While the Talmadge amendment is the one that deals most specifically with a matter of civil rights, other proposals in the House bill would fall so heavily upon the urban poor and their large minority groups, that it seems incumbent upon the Leadership Conference to oppose them.

At the last meeting of the Washington representatives there was unanimous agreement that in addition to opposing the Talmadge amendment, the Conference should express its opposition to three others:

1. Compulsory Work and Training Programs

States would be required to set up work and training programs and adults and children over 16, who are not in school, would be required to participate or face the loss of assistance. To mothers getting help under the Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC) program, this provision would come as a blow. They would be forced to take jobs or training even though, in many cases, there was no adequate day-care for their children and even though it was more important for them to stay home and care for their youngsters.

What's more, there are no assurances that the training would be thorough or lead to anything. It could very well force them, in the end, to work in dead-end jobs for low wages. And certainly forcing people to either work or lose the help they need for themselves and their children returns welfare to about the level of the mid-Victorian poorhouses.

2. Limits on Aid to Children

The House bill would limit assistance under the AFDC program to only the percentage of children in broken homes, as related to all children under 21 in each state, that was receiving help in January 1967. For instance, if three percent of the minor children in a state were in broken homes and on AFDC in January, the state could not get Federal funds for more than three percent in subsequent years, no matter how large an increase there might be in the number of poor, fatherless youngsters living in it.

Hardest hit by this proposal would, again, be the people least able to bear the burdens it would impose -- the migrants coming from the rural South to the cities. For those states in which such migrants usually settle, the choice would be bleak: either to assume the increased costs of caring for the destitute or to simply ignore them and invite further chaos.

3. Benefits

The House bill would increase social security benefits by only 12 1/2 percent and raises the minimum benefit from the present $44 to only $50. This is clearly insufficient to meet the needs of individuals and families whose incomes are already being eroded by inflation. The Administration proposal calls for a 15 percent across-the-board increase and a 59 percent increase in the minimum to $70.

While many groups within the Leadership Conference feel even this increase is insufficient, they are willing to endorse it as the minimum amount. The Conference consensus covers the amendments outlined thus far.

There are other amendments in the bill that individual groups in the Leadership Conference oppose. One particularly, is the drastic restriction the House bill imposes on the new Medicaid (Title XIX) program of medical care for the needy. Income limits would be established at one-third over the AFDC payments level which would actually cut off from Medicaid eligibility welfare recipients in some states. The bill also permits states to cut back on the range of medical care services provided, including the possibility of providing neither hospital nor physician services if other less essential services are provided instead.

What Needs To Be Done

We urge all our participating organizations to join in opposing at least: the Talmadge amendment on hospitals; the mandatory work-training provisions and the freeze on the percentage of dependent children who can be helped. We should strongly urge substantially larger increases in social security benefits, both across the board and in the minimum payments.

Please write to members of the Senate Finance Committee (list attached) and urge them to vote against these and any other amendments that would lead us backward, plunge millions of poor people into despair and play into the hands of cynics who say Congress is unable to meet the pressing needs of our communities.

But please act now! To a growing and alarming extent, the War on Poverty appears to be shifting into a War on the Poor.

THE ANTI-POVERTY BILL FACES A HOSTILE HOUSE

On Tuesday, November 7, the House is scheduled to start debating the anti-poverty bill. The measure (S. 2388), as it comes from the House Labor Committee after a round of stormy public sessions, is weaker than the bill the Senate approved on October 5.

Given the present mood of the House, however, the bill has little chance of being strengthened on the floor. The fight there will be to keep the bill from being mutilated altogether, so that it can be improved when it finally goes to conference between the House and Senate.

What Must Be Done

This is an urgent appeal to all Leadership Conference organizations that recognize the importance of the anti-poverty bill to any advance in civil rights to wire or write House members at once and urge them to do at least two things:

1. Oppose any further cuts in anti-poverty funds. The House Labor Committee approved an authorization for fiscal 1968 of $2,060,000,000 for the war on poverty. The Senate authorized $2,258,000,000. Neither amount is sufficient to carry present poverty programs forward on a large enough scale. Further cuts would be disastrous.

2. Oppose any attempts to dismantle the Office of Economic Opportunity (OEO). There will be an all-out effort made on the House floor to take OEO apart and reassign its programs to the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, Labor and other government agencies. OEO has demonstrated its value as the coordinating mechanism for poverty programs and must be kept as intact as possible.

PLEASE ACT AT ONCE IF YOU HAVE NOT ALREADY DONE SO. An outpouring of public concern can make the difference between saving a critically-needed program or seeing it wrecked.

CONFERENCE LEADERS CALL FOR IMMEDIATE ACTION ON CIVIL RIGHTS BILL

The need for immediate Senate action on the civil rights protection bill was urged upon Senate leaders and White House this weekend by Roy Wilkins and Arnold Aronson.

In similar telegrams to Democratic Majority Leader Mike Mansfield (D., Mont.) and Republican Minority Leader Everett M. Dirksen (R., Ill.), the Chairman and Secretary of the Leadership Conference declared, "The civil rights protection bill died in the Senate last year in spite of majority support for it. Unless you act at once, the Senate will permit another year to pass without providing safeguards against terrible injustice."

In their wire to the President, Mr. Wilkins and Mr. Aronson said that while "it is a narrow bill" it is, "as you indicated in your civil rights message one badly needed to assure justice for all citizens...

"Failure to act again this year will be a serious blow to those of us who share your conviction that progress in securing equal rights can be made through the legislative process."

The wires were sent because so far the Senate shows no disposition to take up the bill even though it was reported out by the Senate Judiciary Committee on November 2.

What's In the Bill

The bill (H.R. 2516) which the Committee approved is better than the version passed by the House on August 16. Essentially, it is Title V of the omnibus Civil Rights Act of 1967. It prescribes stiff penalties for anyone - private citizen or public law enforcement officer - who interferes by force or threat of force with a person because of his race, color, religion, or national origin and because he seeks to exercise such rights as voting; attending public schools or colleges; enjoying the benefits of Federal state or local programs or facilities; applying for employment, union membership, or the services of an employment agency; serving on juries; using busses, trains, or other vehicles of transportation; participating in Federally-assisted programs; and enjoying hotels, theatres, restaurants, and other places of public accommodation. The maximum penalties range from $1,000 fine and one year in prison for the misdemeanors; to $10,000 and 10 years imprisonment where bodily injury results; and to life imprisonment in the case of death. (Under this law, the murderers of Chaney, Schwerner, and Goodman would all face life sentences.) The protections of the bill would also apply to civil rights workers engaged in urging others to enjoy their rights; and to public officials and others, such as hotel or restaurant owners or employers who seek to treat all members of the public alike and face harassment or abuse for doing so.

....MORE....

A Cliffhanger

Few bills have reached the Senate floor under more dramatic circumstances. Although the Senate Judiciary Committee is headed by that implacable foe of civil rights, Senator James O. Eastland of Mississippi, it has more liberals serving on it than conservatives. Attempts by Senator Sam Ervin (D, N.C.) to rewrite the bill were defeated by scant votes of 8 to 7. At the urging of the Leadership Conference, Senator Hugh Scott (R., Pa.) flew back from London in an Army plane in order to supply the one vote margin. Senator Thomas Dodd (D., Conn.), who would most likely have voted with the majority was taken ill and was unable to make the crucial committee meeting.

Other Senators who voted in favor of a strong bill were: Philip A. Hart (D., Mich.) who will lead the floor fight on the measure, Edward V. Long (D., Mo.), Edward M. Kennedy (D., Mass.), Birch Bayh (D., Ind.) Quentin N. Burdick (D., N.D.), Joseph D. Tydings (D., Md.) and Hiram L. Fong (R., Hawaii).

Every one of them deserves a note of thanks from Conference organizations.

Where the Bill Is Now

Although the bill is ready for debate, Senate leaders still delay bringing it up. The rush is on for adjournment and the bill is controversial. What is more, Senator Everett Dirksen (R., Ill.) who voted against the bill in Committee has predicted it will run into a filibuster once it gets on the floor. Senate leaders fear consideration of the bill may block action on other vitally needed measures. But few bills are as urgently needed as this one and the Senate ought to act on it at once and certainly before it goes home.

....MORE....

A Bill That Won Approval

Of the six titles in the omnibus civil rights bill introduced as separate bills early in this session, one has finally passed both Houses. This is Title VI, the section that extends the life of the U. S. Civil Rights Commission five years to January 31, 1973. It passed the House in August and the Senate on November 1. However, the Senate limited its annual budget to $2,650,000 and the bill is now in conference.

Where The Others Are

Here is a status report on the other titles of the omnibus bill:

Titles I & II - to end discrimination in the selection of Federal and State juries. Still pending in the Senate Judiciary Committee, though Title I (Federal juries) is ready to be reported out and has a good chance of being sent to the floor.

Title III - to strengthen the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission by giving it power to issue cease-and-desist orders. Still in the Senate Labor Committee, it, too, is ready to be reported out.

Title IV - to establish a Federal Fair Housing law. Hearings before a subcommittee of Senate Banking have been completed. It now awaits further action.

What Needs To Be Done

We must not let the Senate adjourn without passing the Civil Rights Protection Bill this year. Attached to this MEMO are copies of the telegrams Roy Wilkins sent to the President and Mike Mansfield. We urge our organizations to get busy and send their own wires at once.

We respectfully and earnestly urge you to exert your full influence to have Democratic majority leader Mansfield bring to the Floor of the Senate at once the civil rights protection bill approved by the Senate Judiciary Committee last week and already passed by the House of Representatives. It is a narrow bill but as you indicated in your civil rights message one badly needed to assure justice for all citizens. In spite of majority support for the bill, the Senate failed to act on it last year. Failure to act again this year will be a serious blow to those of us who share your conviction that progress in securing equal rights can be made through the legislative process. The Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, a coalition of 112 national civil rights, labor, religious, and civic organizations, urges you to bring to the Senate floor immediately the bill already approved by the Judiciary Committee for federal protection of persons exercising their civil rights.

The civil rights protection bill died in the Senate last year in spite of majority support for it. Unless you act at once, the Senate will permit another year to pass without providing safeguards against terrible injustices. Tuesday's elections supported our contention that full equality can be won peaceably through electoral and legislative processes. Failure to enact this minimum legialative program will have an opposite effect. It will seriously weaken the case of those of us who urge reliance on law to redress wrongs.

Congress can and in the interest of domestic tranquility must pass this civil rights legislation this year.

HELP GET A GOOD ANTI-POVERTY BILL OUT OF CONFERENCE

The fact that the anti-poverty bill passed the House in reasonably good shape last week is due in part to the efforts of everyone who sent a telegram or letter supporting the measure. House members say their mail in support of the bill ran heavy and some even compared it to the outpouring of public concern that helped pass the Civil Rights Acts of 1964 and 1965.

But we must maintain the same level of support for a strong bill now that S.2388 has been sent to Conference. Conferees are attempting to work out the differences between the House and Senate versions and they will still be working on the bill next week.

We, therefore, urge all of our participating organizations to surmount the holiday interruption and send wires to all House and Senate Conferees urging them to fight for four things:

1. A minimum budget of $2 billion a year. (The Senate authorized $2.26 billion. The House cut the money figure back to $1.6 billion.)

2. A two-year authorization for the poverty program. (The Senate authorized two years, the House only one.)

3. Deletion of "the Green amendment." (The House adopted an amendment by Rep. Edith Green (D-Ore.) that turns control of independent community action programs over to city hall, greatly minimizing the role of the poor in these programs.)

4. Deletion of the 10 percent cash requirement for localities. (Till now the formula for sharing the cost of community action programs permitted localities to make their contribution "in cash or kind" -- equipment, facilities, etc. The strict 10 percent cash requirement in the House bill will make it harder for communities that most need action programs to take part in them.)

Help make this a brighter Thanksgiving for millions of American poor by sending your wires at once.

A CHANCE FOR A GOOD SOCIAL SECURITY BILL

Conferees are scheduled to start meeting today to work out the differences between the House and Senate versions of the Social Security Bill. On the whole, the Senate bill is better. Strong public support for Senate changes, particularly in the public welfare provisions, can help persuade the conference committee to report out a bill free of some of the insulting and punitive provisions included in the House bill.

Better for Mothers and Children

Unquestionably, mothers and children would fare better under the Senate provisions. In three areas of particular concern to the Leadership Conference (see MEMO: No. 21-67) -- compulsory work and training programs, the proposed freeze on aid to children, and the benefits -- the Senate bill is clearly preferably.

1. Compulsory Work and Training Programs

One of the great vices of the House bill is that mothers with children and young people over the age of 16 would be compelled to participate in state work and training programs, no matter how unsuitable such programs were or disruptive of family life. Failure to participate would result in loss of benefits.

The Senate version is better in several respects. It defines more carefully than the House bill does the kinds of programs welfare recipients would be assigned to. It exempts from work and training those mothers getting help under the Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC) program, who care for pre-school children or for youngsters under 16 when they are not in school. It also exempts persons under 16 or in school; those too ill or old to participate; those caring for ill or incapacitated members of their family; and those whose participation the state determines is not in their own best interest nor in the best interest of the program.

2. Limits on Aid to Children

Completely eliminated from the Senate bill is the House provision that would put a freeze on help to children. The House bill would limit assistance under the AFDC program to that percentage of children in broken homes, as related to all children under 21 in each state, that was receiving help on January 1, 1967. For instance, if three percent of the minor children in a state were in broken homes and on AFDC in January, the state could not get Federal funds for more than three percent in subsequent years, no matter how large an increase there might be in the number of poor, fatherless youngsters living in it.

3. Benefits

The Senate level of benefits is significantly higher. Monthly minimum benefits would be increased to $70 for an individual and to $105 for a couple. The House bill would increase the minimum benefits to only $50 for an individual and $75 for a couple.

The general increase in cash benefits would come to 15 percent under the Senate bill and only 12.5 percent in the House version. The Senate is also more liberal in the assistance it would give to older persons not eligible for regular benefits and to disabled widows.

What You Can Do

On a separate page, we list the Senate and House conferees. Please wire all of them as soon as possible, urging them to support the best features of the Senate bill, particularly those that (1) provide help for mothers with dependent children, (2) are designed to aid children from broken homes and (3) set the levels of benefits.

Your messages and those of your members can help bring out of a rather undistinguished session of Congress a bill that could change the 32-year old Social Security statute in ways that could provide something close to adequate benefits for the nation's old and poor.

December 7, 1967

TO: Participating Organizations

FROM: Arnold Aronson, Secretary

A NEW THREAT TO SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

With their customary tenacity, Southern Senators are undertaking a new campaign to undermine Federal efforts to compel school districts to desegregate.

The new attack takes the form of amendments being proposed to the Elementary and Secondary Education Act (ESEA), presently being debated on the Senate floor.

Unless public opposition to these amendments is expressed soon, this threat to enforcement of Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 -- the section that authorizes the Department of Health, Education and Welfare to cut off funds to school districts that discriminate -- could become a grim reality.

Senator Russell's Monkey-Wrench

The worst of the amendments we are aware of, as this MEMO is written, is one being proposed by Senator Richard Russell (D-Ga.). It would prevent HEW from cutting off funds to a district during a school year, even after HEW had found the district to be out of compliance with Title VI. Nothing could be better calculated to block HEW's desegregation efforts.

The Department, at present, does not cut off funds to a school district until it has pursued a lengthy procedure in which it tries, first, to negotiate a settlement, and when that fails, goes on to cite a district, hold protracted hearings and issue formal findings. By the time the funds are cut off, many months have passed and the school district has had ample warning of HEW's intentions. The Russell amendment would permit a school district to continue to receive funds for months more after HEW had found evidence of discrimination and was ready to cut off the money.

Some Other Crippling Amendments

Russell's amendment is not the only one that threatens adequate enforcement. An attempt will probably be made to restore to the bill the "Fountain Amendment," which the House adopted but which the Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee rejected during its consideration of the ESEA. The amendment, sponsored by Rep. L. H. Fountain (D-N. C.) would prevent HEW from deferring new funds to a school district it has reason to believe is violating the law, until it completes hearings and issues an order, again a matter of many months.

Senator Strom Thurmond (R-S. C.) is planning to introduce as an amendment, a section of the House bill the Senate committee would not accept. This would place complete control of Title III programs -- projects designed to bring new ideas and techniques into the public schools -- in the hands of state school boards, some of which can be expected to shortchange the big cities and the children of their minority groups.

What We Must Do

The Senate is already voting on amendments to the bill. So far the worst ones offered have been beaten, notably one by Senator Everett Dirksen (R-Ill.) that would have barred use of Federal funds to pay for busing students in order to correct racial imbalance in the schools. Leadership Conference representatives worked vigorously against this proposal on the Hill and had the satisfaction of seeing Senator Dirksen withdraw it for lack of votes.

We, therefore, call upon our organizations to phone or wire their Senators (there is not much time for letters since the votes may come within the next few days) and urge them to vote against all amendments aimed at wrecking Title VI and making enforcement difficult. Your messages can help strengthen Senators in their resolve to oppose these amendments. HEW, an agency already hamstrung enough, must have some manueverability in order to carry out responsibilities Congress placed upon it to desegregate the nation's public schools.

FLASH: HELP PASS THE ANTI-POVERTY BILL!

The House is scheduled to take up on Monday the conference report on the anti-poverty bill. (The Senate will probably have acted on it by the time this MEMO reaches you.)

The bill as reported out by the House-Senate Conferees comes reasonably close to meeting the points the Leadership Conference has agreed upon. We, therefore, urge all groups and individuals to get in touch with their Congressmen and say:

1. Be present Monday
2. Vote for the Conference report
3. Support the highest possible authorization and appropriation for the war on poverty.

Monday, Dec. 4, 1967 THE WASHINGTON POST

Wrecking Device

Senator Richard Russell has come up with a new gimmick for gutting the provisions of the 1964 Civil Rights Act designed to promote desegregation of the public schools. The Act flatly forbade dispensing Federal funds to any public facilities operating on a racially discriminatory basis. The Department of Health, Education and Welfare, responsible for the allocation of grants under the Elementary and Secondary Education Act, drew an extremely moderate and reasonable set of guidelines to determine compliance with the Civil Rights Act requirements. The more obdurate Southern states screamed about these guidelines as though they amounted to a shroud and at once set about evading them.

Under existing procedures fixed by HEW, it takes about ten months—consumed by citation, hearings and formal findings—to determine that a school district is in violation of the guidelines and to cut off Federal funds it is already receiving. New funds can be denied, however, without this long delay. In the House of Representatives, Southerners have succeeded in passing an obstruction called the Fountain amendment which would require the same delay for the denial of new funds to a state already found to be in violation of the guidelines. The Russell amendment would carry frustration one step farther. It would prohibit HEW from cutting off Federal funds to a school district in the midst of a school year. This would mean that the period between the original Federal citation for violating the Civil Rights Act and any enforcement could be stretched out for as long as 22 months.

The Russell amendment is expected to come up in the Senate today. Its plain purpose is to nullify the Civil Rights Act. It is a wrecking device, impure and simple. It ought to be resolutely rejected if the Senate really wants to foster equality of opportunity in public education.

December 12, 1967

TO: Participating Organizations

FROM: Arnold Aronson, Secretary

THE SOCIAL SECURITY CONFERENCE REPORT MUST BE REJECTED

The social security bill that the House and Senate conferees have just reported out is a disgraceful measure. It abandons virtually all of the improvements the Senate approved and adopts some of the worst features of the House bill: the compulsion on mothers with dependent children to go into training programs or lose their benefits; the freeze on the ratio of children from fatherless homes who would qualify for welfare (See MEMO: 21-67). It would also cut back the general increase in benefits from the 15 per cent voted by the Senate to an inadequate 13 per cent. This bill, on the part of Senate conferees, is not compromise but capitulation.

After polling the Leadership Conference executive committee, Roy Wilkins sent the following telegram to Senate members:

"The Executive Committee of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights urges you to vote against the conference report on the social security bill. What started out as a social security measure has become an instrument of social insecurity. It generates forces to break up families. Under this bill fathers would be under pressure to abandon their families and mothers to leave their children and go to work. The war on poverty is becoming a war on the victims of poverty. Cities now wracked by terrible crisis would be faced with the intolerable choice of leaving poor people destitute or trying to provide for them out of funds they do not have. This is a shocking and regressive bill. We urge you to send it back to conference and instruct the conferees to insist on the Senate provisions."

The conference report on the bill comes up in the House for a vote Wednesday and in the Senate, probably no later than Thursday. We urge our organizations to wire Senators at once urging them to reject the conference bill and to insist on the Senate provisions.

Only a flood of messages in the next 48 hours, similar to the Wilkins' telegram, can block this shameful bill.

FLASH! HELP BLOCK "THE FOUNTAIN AMENDMENT"

The Elementary and Secondary Education Act has gone to a House-Senate Conference for immediate action. The worst hurdle we face is "the Fountain Amendment" which was included in the House bill but not in the Senate version. This would make it extremely difficult for HEW to cut off funds to school districts that discriminate and deprive it of one of its surest weapons for compelling school desegregation. PLEASE WIRE MEMBERS OF THE CONFERENCE COMMITTEE AND URGE THEM ALL TO VOTE AGAINST "THE FOUNTAIN AMENDMENT."

December 27, 1967

TO: Participating Organizations

FROM: Arnold Aronson

RE: A Last Word on the First Session

A LOOK AT WHAT HAPPENED IN THE CLOSING DAYS

The rush of urgent MEMOs during the past few weeks was part of our attempt to enlist your help with some of the critical matters that engaged the 90th Congress during the last hectic days of the first session. Now that the House and Senate have adjourned to January 15, we attempt in this MEMO to assess what effects our efforts had on the bills to which we alerted the Conference membership, bills dealing with such areas of direct concern to us as education, poverty, social security and civil rights.

SOCIAL SECURITY: A BIG DENT IN THE PROGRAM

One of the worst setbacks this past session was the passage of a social security bill that contains provisions punishing to the poor.

The 13 percent increase in the general level of benefits will be welcomed by millions of the old and disabled, widows and orphans -- even though it is still short of what is needed to keep up with rising costs. But it was a gain bought at a high price -- public assistance provisions that will fall heavily upon the poor, particularly mothers and children.

Despite the efforts of many of our groups, the bill that came from the House-Senate conference committee contained two provisions we had sought to have deleted: one compels mothers with dependent children to take part in state work-training programs or lose their benefits -- it is a compulsion they would have to accept even though insufficient day care is provided for their children and they may be forced to accept ill-paying, dead-end jobs; the other freezes the number of children in fatherless homes who can receive help under the Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC) program.

Opponents Were Tricked

A group of Senate liberals attacked the cruel and regressive features of the conference bill and indicated their readiness to filibuster it in order to prevent a vote until next year. Delaying consideration to January, they said, would hurt no one since the increased benefit checks would not be mailed out until March and the delay might afford an opportunity to mobilize the public pressure necessary to moderate the welfare provisions. The Leadership Conference shared this view.

But on Thursday, December 14, a day before the Senate adjourned, the majority whip, Sen. Russell Long (D-La.), outmanuevered the liberals. During the early morning, when few Senators were on the floor and the Senator the liberals posted to keep watch was momentarily distracted, Long brought up the conference report and rushed it through on a voice vote.

A protest from Majority Leader Mike Mansfield (D-Mont.), who was absent while this was going on, led to an agreement to reconsider the bill so long as a specified time was fixed for voting on the conference version before adjournment. Unfortunately, fixing a time cut off all further debate and the conference bill passed 62 to 14.

Speaking on behalf of the Leadership Conference, Roy Wilkins issued a statement in which he declared:

"The haste with which the House and Senate approved the conference version of the social security bill is cause for bitter disillusionment among those of us who look to Congress to help solve the grave social problems of this nation.

"Congress, in this instance, has failed us. It is a failure that will return to plague its members. The Leadership Conference intends to press for a reconsideration of the welfare provisions in this bill and for a revision of the entire antiquated welfare structure. We will not let the war on poverty become war on the poor."

WAR ON POVERTY: HOLDING THE LINE

If the anti-poverty bill is hailed as a victory, it is because the worst things Congress was generally expected to do to the poverty program were somehow avoided. The Office of Economic Opportunity (OEO) was not dismembered. The authorization for the program was kept to two years and not cut back to one. The level of funding suffered no serious cut: the funds authorized were kept at $1,980,000,000 for the first year and $2.1 billion for the second and the funds finally appropriated for fiscal 1969 were $1.773 billion.

While this was some $5 million less than OEO Director Sargent Shriver said he needed to keep the program going without reduction, it was still considerably more than Congress was expected to approve.

A compromise was reached on another feature of the House anti-poverty bill to which we had objected. This was the requirement that state and local governments contribute 20 percent toward the cost of community action programs and that 10 percent of that be in cash. It was a requirement that could well have killed off such programs in poorer communities. The House-Senate conferees, however, finally agreed that the 20 percent could be in either cash or kind -- equipment, facilities, etc.

A bad amendment that was not beaten was one sponsored by Rep. Edith Green (D-Ore.). It gives local public officials control over the community action programs.

On the whole, however, the anti-poverty bill came through surprisingly intact. We drew a heavy response to our MEMOs on this bill. Unquestionably, the strong public support for an adequate poverty program, as evidenced in visits and messages to members of Congress, helped contribute greatly to this success.

EDUCATION: A PSYCHOLOGICAL VICTORY FOR THE SOUTH

The two-year extension of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act is another occasion for mixed feelings. Considering the readiness of this Congress to cut back on domestic spending, particularly spending meant to help poor people, it is again remarkable that so much of the program survived.

During Senate consideration of the bill, the most heated fights centered on civil rights issues. Minority Leader Everett M. Dirksen (R-Ill.) attempted to write into the bill a provision prohibiting any use of the funds in the $9.1 billion measure for the busing of children to correct racial imbalance. Leadership Conference groups vigorously opposed this amendment. We had the satisfaction of seeing Senator Dirksen withdraw it when it became evident he did not have the votes for its adoption.

Southern Manuevering Again

Senator Richard Russell (D-Ga.) led a new floor attack on enforcement of Title VI - the vital section of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 that authorizes the Department of Health, Education and Welfare (HEW) to cut off funds to school districts that discriminate. The Senator was prepared to offer an amendment that would have prohibited HEW from cutting off any funds during a school year. In short, if HEW found a district out of compliance and issued an order terminating funds, the district would continue to get the money for months more, even though it was guilty.

The Southerners threatened to filibuster the Education Act if they did not get the Russell amendment. Our head counts indicated that the votes to beat the Russell amendment were probably available. But the vote looked close and the Senate leadership wanted to get the bill passed before adjournment. Accordingly, a compromise was worked out in which Senator Wayne Morse (D-Ore.), floor leader for the bill, read a letter from HEW Secretary John W. Gardner into the Record giving southern school districts assurance they would receive sufficient advance notice of a possible termination of funds.

How the Gardner Compromise Works

Under the terms of the letter, HEW will notify recalcitrant school districts by March 1 that its information indicates "probable noncompliance" with the requirements of Title VI and that they face a cut-off of funds if they do not take "adequate corrective action." HEW will then negotiate with the districts until September 1, of the new school year. If negotiations fail, it will then cite the non-complying districts for hearing, and issue a terminating order against them even if it results in a cut off of funds during a school year.

In this way, HEW preserves control over the timing of the cut-off. HEW officials have assured the Leadership Conference that the terms of the Gardner letter will not seriously affect enforcement. This may be so. But the newspapers heralded the development as a concession to the Southerners and psychologically, it was their victory.

Thurmond Amendment Beaten

Another Southern amendment civil rights forces succeeded in defeating was one proposed by Senator Strom Thurmond (R-S.C.). It would have written into the bill the House provision that gives the states complete control over the $1.7 billion authorized by Title III of the bill to set up supplementary centers for innovative educational projects. The amendment failed narrowly, 35 to 38. That left in effect, temporarily, the Senate compromise that would have turned Title III funds over to the states in stages -- one-third in fiscal 1969, half in fiscal 1970 and two-thirds in fiscal 1971.

Despite our opposition here, however, the House-Senate conference on the education bill adopted virtually intact the House proposal -- advocated by Mrs. Green -- that will eventually give the states control over the Title III funds.

Fountain Defeated

There was one clear-cut victory for civil rights in the House-Senate conference, though. The "Fountain amendment" was finally rejected. This was the provision adopted by the House two years running that would prevent HEW from deferring new funds to any school district it has reason to believe is discriminating until it completes a lengthy hearing on the matter. We indicated in several MEMOs that we would press to have the amendment struck in conference and were glad to see this come to pass.

CIVIL RIGHTS: SOME FINAL ACTIONS OF THE 90TH

The only section of omnibus civil rights act of 1967 that was enacted into law was Title VI, which extends the life of the U. S. Civil Rights Commission for five years to January 31, 1973. Unfortunately, Congress retained a Senate provision that keeps the agency's annual budget at its present level, $2,650,000.

Another section of the omnibus bill, the civil rights protection act (Title V) was passed by the House and just before adjournment, Senator Mansfield announced that the bill (H. R. 2516) will be the pending business when the Senate comes back in January. Many Senators will be home during the three weeks of adjournment. Alert your members to visit the Senators during the current recess and urge them to be ready to VOTE TO BREAK A FILIBUSTER ON THE BILL and to work for its passage and the passage of other civil rights bills now before Congress.

There can be no better way to start the New Year.

January 15, 1968

TO: Participating Organizations

FROM: Arnold Aronson, Secretary

THE FIGHT FOR THE CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1968 BEGINS TODAY

The immediate business before the Senate as its second session starts today is the civil rights protection act, H.R. 2516.

The immediate business before the Leadership Conference is to see that at least two other crucial civil rights measures are added to H.R. 2516 as amendments -- the bill to establish a national fair housing law (S.1358), and the bill to strengthen the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission by giving it power to issue cease-and-desist orders (S.1308).

Back to the Original Strategy

In a sense, all that is involved here is reminding the Senate of what was intended last year, when the six titles of the President's Civil Rights Act of 1967 were introduced as separate bills. That was done in the hope that the sections would move faster separately than as parts of an omnibus measure. It was agreed by civil rights proponents that once one of the titles reached the floor, an effort would be made to add the other titles to it, in short to reassemble the President's bill.

The civil rights protection act, which the House passed last year, is Title V of the omnibus bill. The fair housing section is Title IV and the bill to strengthen EEOC, Title III.* Taken together, they would constitute a bill that would assure a meaningful civil rights advance this year. Senate hearings on both the fair housing and EEOC sections have been completed. Both have had ample consideration.

* The other titles of the 1967 omnibus bill don't figure here. Title I, to end discrimination in the selection of Federal juries breezed through the Senate last year and must now be acted on by the House. Title VI, to extend the life of the U.S. Civil Rights Commission five years is already signed into law. Title II, to end discrimination in state jury selection, is still in committee and no action is expected.

Why One Bill

It is generally anticipated that the Senate debate on the civil rights protection section will be turned into a filibuster by Dixiecrats and conservative Republicans. But any one of the three bills would be met with a filibuster. And in a year when the Senate will be trying to finish its work before the national conventions start in August, it will not be possible to consider more than one civil rights measure. By combining the three titles into one, the Senate need wage only a single civil rights battle this year. It could scarcely consider waging three.

The Conference Urges All-Out Fight

Washington representatives to the Leadership Conference, at their last meeting, adopted a statement calling on Congress and the Administration to combine the three bills and to fight for them until they are passed. The text of that statement is attached to this MEMO.

The statement recalls that the Civil Rights Act of 1964 was faced with hostility when it reached the Senate. But the public pressure for a law became an irresistable force and the bill was passed after a debate that lasted 90 days.

A similar situation confronts the Senate this year. It will move as far as it is urged to by the public. The obligation then rests with us. What we need is a barrage of mail to remind Congress that work begun in 1964 is far from done.

We open this year's campaign with a new ally. The Urban Coalition, which has brought businessmen and city officials into the fight for a society free from poverty and discrimination, has issued a statement of its own in which it calls for open housing.

All of our organizations and supporters can begin now. Please alert your members to start writing to members of the Senate today, urging them to support a single civil rights measure that will put an end to discrimination in housing and jobs and protect persons in the exercise of their civil rights. And urge them to fight for the President's program no matter how long it takes.

A CALL FOR ACTION ON CIVIL RIGHTS LEGISLATION IN 1968

Adopted by the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights
January 11, 1968

With the resumption of Congress tomorrow the nation will be given another opportunity to reverse the growing sense of frustration and despair among minority groups. The passage of the Civil Rights Acts of 1964 and 1965 symbolized a national commitment to achieve social justice for all citizens, thus raising the expectations of millions of Americans who were victims of discrimination and disadvantage. That national commitment has become tarnished in the last two years by the failure of Congress to act on its unfinished civil rights agenda.

In the context of a society wracked by racial tension and the prospects of further violence, failure to close civil rights gaps this year cannot help but be interpreted as an act of retrogression -- with tragic consequences for the nation.

Three crucial civil rights bills are before this session: H.R. 2516, the bill to provide greater protection to Negroes and civil rights workers in the exercise of constitutional rights; a bill to establish a national fair housing law; and a bill to strengthen the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission by giving it the power most regulatory agencies have, to issue cease-and-desist orders.

The separate bills are all part of the President's Civil Rights Act of 1967. We call upon members of Congress and the President to see that the three bills are combined and passed as a single piece of legislation.

We know this bill can be passed. The Civil Rights Act of 1964, when it was before the Senate, was also met with hostility. There was particular opposition then to two proposals: to eliminate discrimination in places of public accommodation and to establish the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. In spite of that, determination finally won enactment of the 1964 law. Congress, backed by the Administration, made it unmistakably clear that nothing else would be considered until action on the Civil Rights Act was completed. The 1964 filibuster lasted 90 days and in that time the legislation was finally shaped and passed.

Determination on the part of Congress and the Administration can make the difference this year. That determination faltered in 1966. That year the House acted favorably on all of the pending measures. A majority of the Senate showed itself in favor of them too. It was only because Senate leadership yielded too soon that the Civil Rights Act of 1966 suffered defeat.

On behalf of the 112 national civil rights, labor, religious, and civic organizations in the Leadership Conference, we urge Congress and the Administration to follow the example of 1964, not 1966. We call upon the President to make clear that he favors combining the three civil rights bills into one, similar to the bill he presented to Congress on February 15, 1967, and that he expects the Senate to keep at the task of enacting civil rights legislation until the job is done, no matter how long it takes. We call upon Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield to hold the Senate to the task. We call upon the Senate to override obstructionists even if it takes all summer. No other business must be transacted until these essential laws are passed.

This is a more perilous year than 1964. The many Americans who are denied homes and jobs because of their race or who are afraid for their lives if they try to exercise rights guaranteed by the Constitution have faith in legislation as the way to have their wrongs redressed. We must vindicate that faith, and reaffirm the efficacy of the democratic process.

February 8, 1968

TO: Participating Organizations

FROM: Arnold Aronson, Secretary

THE BOARD MEETS IN THE MIDST OF THE CIVIL RIGHTS FIGHT

The annual dinner meeting of the Leadership Conference national board on January 30 became the occasion for giving the representatives of our organizations an opportunity to learn at first hand how the fight for civil rights laws in 1968 is going and what they must do to help win passage.

It also became, we hope, an occasion for communicating to members of the U. S. Congress and to Administration officials the urgent need for the bills now under consideration.

20 Senators and the Vice President

The dinner was preceded by a reception on Capitol Hill in a room near the Senate floor. About 20 Senators took time off from their duties and the prolonged debate on the civil rights protection act (H.R. 2516) to come in and meet national leaders of Conference organizations and to talk informally and candidly about the bill.

It gave us an opportunity to urge them to stay with the legislation until a filibuster is broken and to improve the bill by adding two others to it -- the fair housing bill (S. 1358) and the bill to strengthen the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (S. 1308).

The climax of the reception came when Vice-President Hubert Humphrey appeared, to greet Conference leaders and members and to pledge his support in behalf of a strengthened bill.

Dinner: Tributes and Plans

The proceedings of the dinner meeting at the Hotel America that night began on a somber note. Roy Wilkins, as chairman for the evening, led the board members and their guests, about 130 people altogether, in a tribute to Roy Reuther, whose death only a week earlier had saddened the civil rights movement.

The next tribute was a much happier one. The Conference awarded a citation to John M. Doar for his work as head of the Civil Rights Division of the Justice Department. Mr. Doar, who has now become Executive Director of a project to develop the Bedford-Stuyvesant section of Brooklyn, was given a parchment saluting him as one whose "personal commitment and perseverance in the fight for civil rights for all Americans has been total and uncompromising" and recalling his courage at many trouble spots in the South and his "brilliant advocacy" in the series of Federal cases that led to the landmark Fifth Circuit decision on school desegregation and successful prosecutions in the murders of Viola Liuzzo, James Chaney, Andrew Goodman and Michael Schwerner.

The present U. S. Attorney General Ramsey Clark and two previous ones, Senator Robert Kennedy and Nicholas DeB. Katzenbach came and gave their own words of praise for Mr. Doar. Mr. Clark and Mr. Katzenbach stayed for much of a lengthy program of reports and business.

Two other colleagues of Mr. Doar's were Conference guests that night, Warren Christopher, Deputy Attorney General, and Stephen Pollak, Mr. Doar's successor as head of the Civil Rights Division.

Words From The Battle-Front

Two Senators who are leading the floor fight for the civil rights protection act were at the dinner to report on the legislative situation. Senators Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.) and Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y.) presented frank appraisals of the bills they are fighting for and called on the Leadership Conference for support.

Senator Hart, floor manager for the pending civil rights bill, gave this estimate: "Realism suggests that the odds are long with respect to housing; the odds are good with respect to civil rights protection; and someplace in between" for the bill to give the EEOC cease and desist powers. The three bills are titles in the President's omnibus civil rights measure and the Senator said, "I renew the commitment of every man who co-sponsored each of these titles -- we want them -- and we will be bound to vote for them." He urged Leadership Conference to work for the legislation, observing that "if we achieve success, some Senators may think we did it bare-handed; the more realistic will realize that it was only because of your willingness to keep the fuel added to the fire and direct public debate in a constructive way -- just as you did in '65 and '64."

Senator Javits, leader of the liberal Republican forces, noted that "the difficulty we have is that civil rights legislation has gotten out of fashion because it has merged with the urban crisis."

He said, "only a fight will win -- a big, hard and strong fight. Your cooperation is absolutely indispensable." He put the obligation for work in support of the bills squarely upon the Leadership Conference. "Don't you get tired," he said. "There is no other way to do it than through the tireless persistence, the enormous range of coverage of which the Leadership Conference is capable. I pledge to you that you will find no dearth of energy, will and persistence on our part."

Reports for the Year

Arnold Aronson, as Secretary of the Leadership Conference, then presented the Annual Report. He called it a report "on the state of our union," and reviewed the various campaigns undertaken in 1967 by the 112 national organizations that participate in the Conference.

He reminded those present that their organizations constitute "a substantial majority of the American people," and that progress was made in 1963, 1964 and 1965 "because, working together, we succeeded in so mobilizing our constituencies as to make the seemingly impossible yield to what was necessary. Working together we can do so again. And the time to begin is tonight."

James Hamilton, as Chairman of the Committee on Compliance and Enforcement, reviewed the work his committee has been doing to improve the civil rights enforcement work of such agencies of government as the Departments of Health, Education and Welfare, Justice, Treasury, Defense, Labor, Commerce, Post Office, as well as the Civil Rights Commission and the Civil Service Commission.

Dr. David French, Chairman of the Medical Subcommittee of the Committee on Compliance and Enforcement, gave a separate report detailing HEW's failure to obtain compliance with the Civil Rights Act of 1964 from hospitals and other health facilities in various parts of the country. An attempt to correct this situation is expected to be one of the full Committee's major programs in 1968.

Support for Truth-in-Lending

The Board meeting came just the night before the House voted on the Truth-in-Lending bill, legislation to inform consumers of how much interest they pay on credit purchases. Evelyn Dubrow, legislative representative for the International Ladies Garment Workers Union, presented the legislative picture on the bill and urged support. The next day, the House passed a strengthened version of the bill which incorporated three things Miss Dubrow urged: coverage of "revolving credit" transactions; coverage of purchases where the interest charges are $10 or less; and some protection against the evils of wage garnishment.

The bill now goes to conference where an attempt will be made to hold on to the House improvements in the measure.

From 112 to 115

Three new organizations were unanimously admitted to membership in the Leadership Conference: the Division of Social Christian Concern of the American Baptist Convention; the Oil, Chemical and Atomic Workers International Union; and the Scholarship, Education and Defense Fund for Racial Equality. That brings the total of national organizations participating in the Conference to 115.

We State the Priorities

The meeting ended with the unanimous adoption of a statement that committed the Conference to support a broad legislative program in civil rights, employment, education and housing. We enclose a copy of the statement.

NOTE: Because of their length, we are unable to send copies of the Annual Report for 1967 and the Reports of the Committee on Compliance and Enforcement to our entire mailing list. However, we will send copies to those who personally request them.

FLASH! FAIR HOUSING IS NOW BEFORE THE SENATE

Just as this MEMO was being readied for mailing, Senator Walter Mondale (D-Minn.) joined by a seven-man majority of his fellow members on the Banking Committee, moved to add the fair housing bill to H.R. 2516, the civil rights protection act now pending before the Senate. His motion came immediately after a victory for those Senate liberals who have been standing firm against any attempt to water down H.R. 2516. By a bi-partisan vote of 54 to 29, they succeeded in tabling the weak bill Senator Ervin (D-N.C.) sought to substitute for the pending measure.

That victory was won without much mail from the public. Fair housing will not be won without a flood of mail from all of us. We, therefore, urge everyone to write or wire their Senators urging them to back the fair housing bill and to fight any attempt to cut off debate on it too early. The Senate will go into Lincoln Day recess from February 9 to February 13, and many Senators will be home. Try to see them. Visits, letters and telegrams are what we must have if we are to make 1968 a meaningful year for civil rights law!

STATEMENT ADOPTED BY THE ANNUAL BOARD MEETING OF THE LEADERSHIP CONFERENCE ON CIVIL RIGHTS
January 30, 1968

At this time of racial and social crisis, the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, on the occasion of its annual board meeting, reaffirms its conviction that solutions to our nation's domestic problems can and must be achieved through peaceful, democratic means and within the American political system.

It is a reaffirmation made with a sense of burning urgency. For unless this Congress and this Administration act quickly, our reaffirmation may become empty rhetoric.

The bill the Senate is now debating, the civil rights protection act, would do much to protect citizens from violence in the exercise of such elementary rights as serving on juries, going to school, getting a job, using public transportation, visiting a restaurant or movie or enjoying the parks or other facilities paid for with their taxes. It would protect those working to help people achieve and exercise the rights to which they are constitutionally entitled.

But this bill alone will not advance us very far toward full equality. It does not address itself to two glaring injustices -- the denial of equal access to housing and jobs. If the Fair Housing Act and the bill to strengthen the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission now before the Congress are added to the civil rights protection bill, we would then have legislation that would at least offer hope that Congress means to continue the work it began in 1964 and 1965 of correcting injustices through law.

We therefore call upon the Senate to combine the three bills into a single measure and to keep the Civil Rights Act of 1968 the pending business of the Senate until the filibuster is broken and this broader bill is passed. We call upon the President to exert the utmost influence in support of this course of action.

We deplore current efforts that tend to compromise the civil rights protection bill rather than strengthen it. The debilitating compromises being circulated are unnecessary and unacceptable retreats from the Fourteenth Amendment. We urge the shelving of these proposed compromises and the return to the civil rights offensive through the passage of the fair housing and equal employment amendments.

Because we believe that civil rights require not only the establishment and enforcement of rights in law, but also the realization of social and economic conditions in which alone the fulfillment of these rights is possible, we reaffirm our support of a legislative program that will guarantee decent jobs to all who are able to work, adequate housing, full education and a living income to all citizens mired in poverty.

We support the President in his call to private industry to help find 500,000 jobs for the hard-core unemployed. But it is a task that cannot be left to private industry alone. We urge enactment of legislation already before this Congress that would oblige the government to act as employer of last resort by channeling workers into needed public service jobs.

We also support the President's call for "a 10-year campaign to build six million new decent housing units for low and middle-income families."

The announced cuts in anti-poverty programs underscore the need for this Congress to provide adequate funds for the welfare and education programs it has already authorized. We know too well the disillusionment created when a program of promise is held out to desperate people and then withdrawn. We call on this session to vote sufficient funds to enable threatened programs to continue.

The first session of the 90th Congress committed a crime against the poor when it adopted welfare provisions that force mothers to take jobs, often wretched ones, or lose their benefits, and that put severe limits on aid to children in fatherless homes.

We therefore call upon this session to repeal these provisions and upon the President and the Department of Health, Education and Welfare to see that defenseless people do not suffer.

The goals we set forth tonight are modest, minimal and necessary. We shall do all in our power to fulfill them in 1968. We cannot and must not falter in our drive toward full equality.

MEMO: No. 3-68
February 12, 1968

TO: Participating Organizations

FROM: Arnold Aronson, Secretary

THE TIME FOR AN OPEN HOUSING LAW IS NOW

The Senate is face to face with an opportunity to pass a national fair housing law.

It is an opportunity for all of us who have worked for such a law. If we can demonstrate within the next week or so that there is solid national sentiment to end the shame of housing discrimination, the bill can pass.

How the Bill Stands Now

On Friday, February 9, the Senate left for a Lincoln Day recess. Still before it is the civil rights protection act (H.R. 2516), the House-passed bill it has been debating since January 15. As we reported hastily in the last MEMO (No. 2-68), civil rights proponents won a victory last week when they rejected, 54 to 29, a weak substitute for the pending bill. Immediately after that, Senator Walter Mondale (D-Minn.) offered the fair housing act as an amendment to H.R. 2516. Sponsors of the proposal included a majority of the Senate Banking Committee, which held hearings on the bill this past summer: Senators Brooke (R-Mass.), Case (R-N.J.), Proxmire (D-Wisc.), Muskie (D-Me.), Williams (D-N.J.), Long (D-Mo.), McGee (D-Wyo.), Nelson (D-Wisc.), and Percy (R-Ill.). Other sponsors are still being added.

What we must do during the Lincoln Day recess, which ends February 13, is to try and organize delegations to visit Senators while they are home. When they return on the 14th, we plan to bring delegations in to see them here in Washington.

The Bill and the Issues

The bill would eventually end discrimination in the sale and rental of most housing. Immediately upon passage, it would apply to the Federally-financed housing already covered by the President's Executive Housing Order; after December 31, 1968, to most new housing projects, and to apartment houses or multiple unit dwellings meant for five families or more; and after December 31, 1969, to the sale or rental of all housing, with the exceptions of housing under the control of religious organizations and "Mrs. Murphy's boarding house" (owner-occupied dwellings such as rooming houses or duplexes and "fourplexes" where the owner lives in one of the apartments -- perhaps three percent of the housing supply).

We enclose with this MEMO a summary of the bill and some Questions and Answers on it that Senator Mondale included in the Record when he introduced his amendment.

The issues in the Senate fight are set forth with great clarity in an editorial from the New York Times. We include that, too, with this MEMO. As the Times observes, we are faced once more with a situation in which Minority Leader Everett M. Dirksen is using his considerable influence to block a civil rights bill with the threat of a filibuster and where Majority Leader Mike Mansfield could endanger passage by moving too soon to cut off debate.

What We Can Do

Under these circumstances the Conference proposes this course of action. During the Lincoln Day recess, we plan to have delegations visit Senators who are home and urge them to:

1. Support the fair housing amendment and to become a co-sponsor if they have not already done so;

2. Stay near the Senate floor;

3. Oppose any motion to table it or to cut off debate too quickly;

4. Vote for cloture if a filibuster attempt looks as if it will bar a vote on open housing.

We also want delegations to come to Washington after the recess to urge Senate support for fair housing and civil rights protection. If you can come to the Capital starting February 19, let us know. We will help arrange your visit.

For those who cannot join delegations, there is still the post office and Western Union. We need floods of letters and wires if we are to seize this chance to end housing discrimination.

Mr. Dirksen vs. the Senate

The Senate again faces a time of testing on the issue of racial equality, and again Mr. Dirksen, the minority leader, occupies the pivotal position. The nearly two-to-one vote the other day against a weak Southern substitute showed that a strong majority in both parties favors a meaningful civil-rights law.

The heart of the issue is open housing. Equal access to housing in the market place is essential if slum pressures are to be relieved and cities freed from the strangling noose of segregated white suburbs.

The other elements required for a genuinely effective civil-rights law include adequate enforcement powers for the Federal commission to prohibit racial discrimination in employment and protection for Negroes and civil rights workers in exercising their constitutional rights. A bill embodying the latter provision passed the House last year. What is needed, however, is a plugging of all three weak points in the present statutory safeguards against bias.

In 1966 the House passed a satisfactory omnibus bill, but Senator Dirksen and the more conservative Senate Republicans joined with the intransigent Southern bloc in a prolonged delaying action at the end of the session. As a result the bill never reached a final vote. The same alliance is projected this year.

Senator Morton of Kentucky and other middle-of-the-road Republicans, however, have made it plain that they do not want to tie their party to the dying cause of racism, particularly in a national election year. Moreover, the open-housing issue comes up now at the beginning rather than the end of a session. Time is not on Mr. Dirksen's side.

Senator Mansfield, the Democratic floor leader, has talked of seeking an early vote on a closure position. Such a vote would be a sham. Everyone recognizes that a two-thirds majority is unobtainable without Mr. Dirksen's cooperation. Under the Senate's pro-filibuster rule, Senator Dirksen and a dozen or so Republicans can obstruct action by voting with the Southern diehards.

There is no cause for hasty action. Let the Senate debate the bill until Mr. Dirksen decides he is willing to reach an accommodation with a majority of his colleagues. If the majority perseveres, he cannot frustrate it indefinitely.

THE PROPOSED FAIR HOUSING ACT OF 1967: SUMMARY

The Act would gradually prohibit discrimination on account of race, color, religion or national origin in the sale or rental of housing. Housing already subject to the President's Order on Equal Opportunity in Housing would be covered immediately. Housing held for sale or rent by someone other than its occupant and housing for five or more families would be covered from and after Dec. 31, 1968. All housing other than exempted housing of religious institutions would be covered from and after Dec. 31 1969, with the exception of the "Mrs. Murphy" provision.

The Act would also prohibit "blockbusting," discrimination in the financing of housing, discrimination in the provision of services or admission to membership by real estate organizations, and interference with or threats against persons enjoying or attempting to enjoy any of the rights which the Act grants or protects.

Responsibility for administration and enforcement would rest with the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development. He would use the time during which the enforcement provisions gradually went into effect to consult with housing industry leaders and state and local officials and otherwise carry on educational and consultation activities.

The Secretary would be required to seek a voluntary solution in every case. If his attempt was unsuccessful, he would be authorized to issue a complaint, hold hearings and, if the evidence disclosed that discriminatory acts had occurred, issue orders granting appropriate relief. All orders of the Secretary would be subject to judicial review.

A person who believed that he had been injured by a discriminatory housing practice could file a charge with the Secretary. The Secretary would not be required to conciliate or to issue a complaint on the basis of every charge so filed, but if he did not, the person filing the charge could commence an action himself in any court of competent jurisdiction.

The Attorney General would be empowered to initiate suits in United States district courts to eliminate patterns or practices of housing discrimination. The Secretary could cede his jurisdiction to state or local fair housing agencies in appropriate cases or cooperate with them without ceding his jurisdiction.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS ON THE PROPOSED FAIR HOUSING ACT OF 1967

1. Who will be covered?

The Act will cover brokers, property owners, managers and anyone else who participates in the sale, rental or financing of housing.

2. What are the stages of coverage?

The first stage is federally assisted housing—essentially, housing with FHA or VA-guaranteed mortgages or public housing. This is the same housing which is already covered by the President's Order on Equal Opportunity in Housing of November 20, 1962 (Exec. Ord. 11063). (The implementation of that Order by federal agencies, however, has not been quite as broad as the Order itself. In particular, because they lacked sufficient enforcement personnel, the agencies exempted owner-occupied one- and two-family homes.)

The second stage, from and after January 1, 1968, is housing held for sale or rent by someone other than its occupant and housing for five or more families, whether or not one of its occupants is its owner.

The third stage, from and after January 1, 1969, is all housing. (But religious institutions could continue to give preference in housing to persons of their own religion.)

The Act's prohibitions against discrimination in the financing of housing, and in membership in, or obtaining the services of, real estate organizations will not become effective in stages. They go completely into effect on and after January 1, 1968. To have put them into effect in stages would not have made sense. For example, how can a real estate organization not discriminate as to membership only with respect to five-family homes?

The Act's provision against threats or coercion of persons who exercise the rights it grants or protects becomes effective immediately. Thus, as the previous rights become effective, in stages or from and after January 1, 1968, this provision will come into effect to protect persons in their exercise of them.

3. Why does the Act go into effect only gradually?

Responsibility for enforcement of the Act will rest with the Department of Housing and Urban Development, which already has the responsibility for enforcing the President's Order on Equal Opportunity in Housing. Thus, the Department can begin the first stage of enforcement with very little "tooling up," because the first stage of coverage is identical to the coverage of the President's Order. The next two stages of coverage are timed to coincide, roughly, with the time it will take the Department to hire and train its new personnel and establish its operational procedures.

The delay will also permit the Department of Housing and Urban Development to carry on educational and consultation activities, to acquaint the housing industry and the country generally with the provisions of the Act before it goes into effect.

4. What exemptions does the Act have?

There is an exemption to permit religious institutions or schools, etc., affiliated with them, to give preference in housing to persons of their own religion despite the Act. But religions whose membership is limited to persons of particular races, colors or national origin are not permitted to make use of this exemption.

There is a "Mrs. Murphy" exemption. And, insofar as a homeowner honestly chooses a roomer on the basis of personal friendship, or because he is a relative, for example, he would not violate the Act. The act forbids refusals only on the basis of "race, color, religion or national origin."

5. How will the Act be enforced?

Primary responsibility for enforcement is vested in the Department of Housing and Urban Development. It will establish local offices throughout the country for this purpose as needed. The Department will employ hearing examiners, who will be appointed and will serve in accordance with the Administrative Procedure Act.

Persons who believe they have been discriminated against may file a charge with the Department. If the Department decides to process the charge, it will so notify the person. If it decides not to, or fails to give notice within 30 days, the person can bring his own action in any court of competent jurisdiction.

The Department must always first try to settle a charge voluntarily, by conciliation and agreement. Only if that fails can it issue a complaint and hold hearings.

The Attorney General will also be empowered to enforce the Act, but only when a "pattern or practice" of resistance to its provisions is found to exist.

6. Will persons who disagree with the Department of Housing and Urban Development's interpretation of the Act have any recourse?

All orders of the Department will be subject to review by the Federal courts. In addition, the Department will be subject to the provisions of the Administrative Procedure Act in all its operations under the Fair Housing Act.

7. What effect will the Act have on State or local fair housing laws?

None. It will leave them in effect. In appropriate cases, the Department of Housing and Urban Development may even cede its jurisdiction to State or local agencies, or cooperate with them in joint operations.

8. What effect would the Act have on the President's Order on Equal Opportunity in Housing (Exec. Ord. 11063)?

None. It will leave it in effect. However, once the Act becomes fully effective, the Order will no longer be necessary, because the Act will cover everything which it covers, and more. The President will then presumably rescind the Order.

9. Does Congress have the constitutional power to prohibit discrimination in housing?

Yes. Supreme Court decisions clearly state that Congress has this power both under the Fourteenth Amendment and the Commerce Clause. A summary of these decisions has been prepared and is available.

10. Will the Act prohibit "blockbusting"?

Yes. Section 4(e) prohibits blockbusting.

11. Will the Act make it a crime to discriminate in housing?

No. All its enforcement provisions are civil in nature. An individual who disobeys the Act and refuses voluntarily to correct the harm he has done may be ordered by the Department of Urban Development (or, if necessary, by a court) to take appropriate action, but such orders cannot include fines, imprisonment or other criminal punishment.

12. Why does the Act cover religious as well as racial, color, and national-origin discrimination?

Although discrimination on religious grounds is not a major problem in housing, it nevertheless exists and is appropriately dealt with along with the other forms of discrimination.

13. Will not the passage of a Fair Housing Act lower property values?

No. Careful, well documented studies have shown that in the overwhelming majority of cases property values in unsegregated neighborhoods actually rise slightly faster than proprty values in all-white neighborhoods. The only general exception is when panic selling occurs, and even then the drop is temporary. The Act deals with this exception, too, by prohibiting "blockbusting"—the practice of frightening homeowners into selling at a low price by telling them that their neighborhood is, or is about to be, integrated.

State and local fair housing laws have been in existence for several years, and in no area have there been reports that property values have fallen on that account.

14. Would the Act prohibit a person from refusing to sell or rent for any reason other than race, color, religion or national origin?

No. Other reasons for refusing would continue to be as valid as they are now. For example, property owners will continue to be free to refuse to sell or rent to people who cannot meet the price, who have bad credit ratings, who fail to provide adequate character or financial references, etc.

15. Will a person against whom a complaint of discrimination is issued have to prove that he did not discriminate?

No. The burden of proof rests on the Department of Housing and Urban Development, or the complaining person, to prove that the defending person did discriminate on the basis of race, color, religion or national origin.

Surrender in the Senate

The open-housing amendment is the heart of the civil rights bill now pending in the Senate. On Tuesday sixty Senators voted or had themselves paired in favor of bringing the bill to an early vote. Yesterday approximately the same number rejected a motion to cut the housing amendment out of the bill.

Under these circumstances it would be inexcusable for Senator Mansfield, the majority leader, to abandon the fight for open housing if victory is not won by Monday. No legislative battle was ever won by such dilatory, defeatist tactics.

The vote on closure dramatized the split in the ranks of Senate Republicans on the housing issue. The 36 Republicans divided evenly. Those who followed Mr. Dirksen's leadership and joined with the Southern Democratic diehards bear the responsibility. Gov. George W. Romney, to his credit, called upon all G.O.P. Senators to support closure; Richard M. Nixon, his rival, has kept silent. He and other Republican leaders around the nation have an obligation to make themselves heard now.

Open housing is an elementary right that should scarcely have to be fought for in Congress. Since a fight is necessary, it deserves something much better than the token effort that Senator Mansfield and the Administration have made. It is far too early for a three-fifths majority of the Senate to surrender feebly to Mr. Dirksen and his Southern allies.

This states the case perfectly!

Wire your Senators before 1 P.M. Monday and urge them:

1. To vote for cluture
2. Oppose any effort to table or set the civil rights bill aside
3. And vote for open housing and civil rights protection.

MEMO: No. 5-68
February 28, 1968

TO: Participating Organizations

FROM: Arnold Aronson, Secretary

THE SENATE GETS SET TO PASS A GOOD CIVIL RIGHTS BILL

To something like general amazement, the Senate, after six weeks of filibuster, is now expected to limit debate and move on toward passage of a good civil rights protection act and a good national fair housing bill.

This Friday, the Senate will make its third cloture try in less than two weeks and this time it looks as if it will muster the necessary two-thirds of those present and voting. Final passage of the bill ought to follow within the week.

Dirksen Is The Key

Once again, as in 1964 and 1965, the pivotal Senator is Minority Leader Everett M. Dirksen (R-Ill.). Starting as he did in 1964 as a professed foe of the pending civil rights legislation, he has now accepted a strong version on both protection and housing and is working to line up votes for it.

His change of heart is probably due to the logic of the situation. The four votes on the legislation, since the debate began on January 15, have shown strong and growing support. When the pending matter before the Senate was H.R. 2516, the House-passed bill that gives the Justice Department new powers to protect Negroes and civil rights workers in the exercise of certain constitutional rights, Senator Sam Ervin (D-S.C.), leader of the Southern opposition, offered a weaker substitute. On February 6, that was defeated 54 to 29. The Leadership Conference, meanwhile, had been urging that fair housing be added to the protection bill and immediately after the defeat of the Ervin substitute, Senators Walter F. Mondale (D-Minn.), and Edward Brooke (D-Mass.) offered fair housing as an amendment. The faint-hearted predicted such an addition would kill any chance for a civil rights bill this year. Instead, by raising the stakes, it aroused a new surge of interest in the nation and in the Senate. On February 20, Majority Leader Mike Mansfield first attempted to cut off debate and got a vote of 55 to 37 in favor of cloture, seven votes short. The next day, February 21, he moved to table the fair housing amendment and his proposal was overwhelmingly rejected, 58 to 34. This past Monday, the second cloture attempt drew a vote of 56 to 36, only six short of the necessary two-thirds.

Meanwhile, messages and telegrams in support of the bill began pouring in.

Faced with these evidences of the Senate will and public opinion, and finding defections within his ranks (19 of the 36 Republicans voted for cloture Monday) Senator Dirksen announced he was ready to work out a bill.

What The Bill Provides

The new version of the bill is a very good one. The civil rights protection part is in some ways an improvement on H. R. 2516. For one thing, it adds the obtainment and accupancy of housing to the list of rights it would protect. Activities within the Federal realm -- serving on a Federal jury, using Federal facilities, enjoying the benefits of Federal programs, etc. -- would be protected without regard to race, color or creed. State activities -- such as serving on state juries, attending public schools, etc. -- would be protected under the 14th Amendment, and there race, color, religion or national origin would be considerations.

This is exactly the proposal Leadership Conference lawyers suggested last year when Senator Ervin offered his substitute in committee.

What The Fair Housing Bill Would Cover

Unlike the original Mondale-Brooke proposal, the fair housing section would not cover the sale and rental of all single family homes but it would go a long way in that direction. Immediately upon passage, it would apply only to housing already covered by the Executive Order of November 20, 1962 -- essentially homes with FHA or VA guaranteed mortgages and public housing. Later, coverage would be extended to housing held for sale or rent by someone other than its occupant -- all new project homes for instance -- and to apartments of five or more units, whether or not the owner lived in one of them. Finally, it would cover the sale or rental of single family homes where the transactions are carried on by brokers. Sales or rentals by owners would be added to the present exemptions in the bill for boarding houses ("Mrs. Murphy"), housing controlled by religious institutions and dwellings with four units or less in which the owner, himself, is living.

What Needs To Be Done

Once the bill passes, we will provide a more detailed analysis of it. Our task right now is to help get it through the Senate and, after that, through the House.

The response of our participating organizations to our last few MEMOs has been admirable. Your messages have played a significant part in creating the present bouyant mood of the Senate.

Please don't let up now. Keep the wires coming. Between now and Friday we urge you to:

1. Commend your Senators for voting for cloture (we enclose the votes on cloture and tabling) and ask them to be present Friday;
2. Urge them to stand firm against any attempt to weaken the compromise;
3. Urge them to vote for the civil rights protection bill and the fair housing measure.

Senate Rollcall Votes On Rights Filibuster

The Senate on Feb. 20 voted 55-37 to end a filibuster which has blocked action on civil rights legislation. The vote for cloture fell short of the two-thirds margin required to limit debate under Senate rules. Labor supported the position of the 37 Democrats and 18 Republicans who wanted to let the Senate vote on the legislation.

The bottom rollcall shows the 58-34 vote on Feb. 21 against tabling an open housing amendment to the civil rights bill. Labor supported the position of the 39 Democrats and 19 Republicans who voted against killing the most meaningful part of the President's program.

WE MUST NOT LET UP NOW!

The Senate Votes Cloture

A civil rights bill that would establish a national fair housing law and provide greater protection from violence for Negroes and civil rights workers may pass the Senate within the week. This happy prospect appeared when the Senate, Monday, voted 65 to 32 to end seven weeks of filibuster.

The Legislative Situation

We are not out of the woods yet. The vote on cloture does not end debate -- it merely limits it. Each Senator has one hour to talk -- theoretically, the debate could continue for 100 hours more if each member uses his full time. The debate is on the "Dirksen substitute" -- the new version of the protection and fair housing bill worked out with Republican Minority Leader Everett M. Dirksen in an effort to pick up the votes necessary for cloture -- and all amendments to it. At the time of the cloture vote, there were 83 amendments pending.

Amendments The Threat

The threats to a reasonably good bill lie in those amendments. Most of them would weaken the bill. They must be defeated.

What We Must Do

Wire your Senators today:

1. Thank those who voted for cloture (we include the last two votes with this MEMO);
2. Urge them to stay in Washington and stay on the Senate floor (a few votes for cloture were lost by Senators arriving late);
3. Urge them to vote down all weakening amendments.

1968 may yet be another Civil Rights Year!

MEMO: No. 8-68
March 19, 1968

TO: Cooperating Organizations

FROM: Arnold Aronson, Secretary

WE CAN WIN THE CIVIL RIGHTS BILL THIS MONTH!

The timetable on the bill to establish a federal open housing law and guarantee greater protection for civil rights is now fairly clear. We have about one week from today in which to develop the kind of support needed to get the House to approve the bill in the form in which it passed the Senate on Monday, March 11.

The Legislative Situation Now

On Thursday, March 14, Rep. Ray Madden (D-Ind.) set in motion the procedure by which it is hoped the bill can win swift House approval. He introduced a resolution, H. Res. 1100, which says, essentially, that the House agrees to the amendments the Senate added to the House-passed civil rights measure H.R. 2516. Open housing and all the other provisions the Senate added are included in these amendments. Adoption of the Madden resolution would be the quickest way to complete action on the civil rights act.

The resolution has been referred to the House Rules Committee of which Mr. Madden is a member. That committee is expected to hold several days of hearings on the bill this week.

It is hoped that on Tuesday, March 26, the Rules Committee will report out H. Res. 1100 with a rule that would prohibit any further changes in the bill. Actual consideration of the resolution would then occur on Wednesday, March 27. The key vote will come on a matter of parliamentary procedure. At some point in the proceedings, one of the floor leaders in the fight for civil rights will say, "Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution." That would bring the House to a vote without further debate. We want everyone to support this move. If it fails, if the previous question is not adopted, a motion will be made to send the bill to conference and that can be harmful.

Obstacle to Passage

A major obstacle to swift passage is the announcement by the House Republican Leader Gerald Ford (R-Mich.) that he wants a conference on the bill between House and Senate members. Such a conference, as we pointed out in the last MEMO (No. 7-68) could result in a serious weakening of the bill or in a stalemate. We enclose with this MEMO a recent New York Times editorial that makes the point very well.

It is our hope that Mr. Ford's opposition to the resolution route is personal and that he will not attempt to make it a matter of Republican policy. If he does that, a number of Republicans who are now ready to approve the resolution and dispose of the bill quickly, may be restrained from doing so by party loyalty.

What We Can Do

We urge the heads of all cooperating organizations to notify their members at once urging them to:

1. Get in touch with members of the Rules Committee and ask them to be in constant attendance until the Madden resolution is reported out.

2. Write, or better yet, phone or wire their Congressmen urging them to stay in Washington this coming week and to vote for H. Res. 1100 when it comes to the floor.

The important thing is to get messages in right away. The real estate brokers are already writing. Their letters opposing fair housing are pouring into the House right now. In an article on the civil rights bill, the New York Times said ominously, "A heavy protest, either verbally or by mail, from constitutents could cause . . . Democrats and Republicans to abandon outright approval of the Senate bill in favor of a detour of the issue in a House-Senate conference, with major surgery."

We can help Congress avoid that detour -- and the surgery -- by flooding House members with letters and wires urging them to concur in the Senate bill.

Mr. Ford's Move

The House Democratic leadership has intelligently decided to send the Senate version of the Civil Rights bill directly to the floor for final approval.

Enemies of the bill have been pushing for a House-Senate conference, the chief purpose of which would be to consider weakening amendments to the bill's open-housing section. An effort would certainly be made in conference to add an amendment permitting a property owner to instruct his broker to discriminate racially in the sale or rental of his house. Such an amendment would tear a gaping hole in the bill. There is no basis in law or conscience for giving property owners the power to authorize discrimination.

Representative Gerald Ford, the Republican leader, is the key man in next week's vote as his counterpart, Everett Dirksen, was in the Senate. Because of Southern defections, the majority Democrats cannot put through the Senate version without the cooperation of Mr. Ford and his fellow-Republicans. It is not ideal legislating for either chamber to accept major amendments that its own committees have not considered, but in the give-and-take of the legislative process this procedure is sometimes unavoidable. In this instance, every member of the House is conversant with the open-housing provisions as voted by the Senate, and knows how he stands. Further committee consideration and debate are scarcely necessary.

A vote to go to conference is a vote to delay and weaken the bill. A vote to accept the Senate substitute would speed the bill to the President's desk and bring fresh confidence to all who believe in racial equality. At a time when racial tensions in this country are acute, Representative Ford and his Republican colleagues will be assuming a grim responsibility if they refuse to open the doors of the ghetto as wide as possible.

A CALL FOR EASTER VISITS TO CARRY OUT DR. KING'S DREAM

In the excitement of the tragic days that began with the death of Martin Luther King, Jr., we were delayed in sending you the statement of legislative goals for this session of Congress issued by the Executive Committee of the Leadership Conference.

The statement, adopted before Dr. King's death outlines the kind of program he was preparing to urge upon Congress. We are sending it to you now in the hope it will stimulate your organization to undertake visits to House and Senate members while they are home for the Easter recess, from April 11 through April 17.

Because we believe Congress will have enacted the civil rights bill (H.R. 2516) with its open housing provision by the time you get this, we urge you to concentrate on some of the other legislative goals: at least a million jobs for the hardcore unemployed; decent low cost housing for all; repeal of punitive welfare restrictions and legislation to help farm workers organize by extending to them the protections of the National Labor Relations Board.

WHAT YOU CAN DO: 1. Tell your members to visit their Senators and Congressmen during Easter and express the concern we all feel by urging them to pass the legislation outlined in the statement as a minimum program for dealing with our present domestic crisis. Get them to join with other groups - the coalition that helped win the legislative victories of the past 10 years.

2. Write to the President and have your members write, urging him to adopt as his own priorities the kind set forth in the statement. President Johnson has postponed the speech on domestic issues he was prepared to make to a joint session of Congress. Your letters can help shape whatever speech he finally gives.

PLEASE ACT NOW. Make Easter and our common tragedy meaningful by pressing for enactment of a program Dr. King would want.

Please let us know what Easter activities you are undertaking and what we can do to help.

STATEMENT BY THE LEADERSHIP CONFERENCE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE ON THE KERNER COMMISSION REPORT

April 2, 1968

When the Kerner Commission declares "It is time now to end the destruction and violence, not only in the streets of the ghetto but in the lives of people," it presents a challenge to the entire nation. It is a challenge that we in the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights willingly accept.

The alternatives before the country, as the Report presents them, have never been so stark.

Either we adopt and implement a national policy that fosters racial and economic integration at every level of American life, or we shall suffer the awful consequences foreshadowed in the Report's basic conclusion that "our nation is moving toward two societies, one black, one white -- separate and unequal."

Either we find a way to create viable communities in our cities or we shall have no cities.

Either we employ, educate and house our 33 million poor so that they may live decent, dignified lives or we face the prospect of years of domestic disorder and even the destruction of our democratic system.

The choice is ours but the time to act upon that choice is fast running out. As yet, neither the executive nor the legislative branches of government has responded with the sense of urgency that the Report conveys and that the problems so clearly demand.

We share with the Commission the conviction that action must be taken now to "produce quick and visible progress." To this end, we call upon the President and members of Congress in both parties to join together and assure passage in this session of at least the following priority measures:

1. First and foremost is the enactment of the Civil Rights Act of 1968, H.R. 2516 before the Easter recess. It is a sad commentary that we still need legislation to protect Americans in the exercise of their constitutional rights and in their right to rent or purchase a home. But failure to pass this measure will be interpreted by millions of Americans, and properly so, as a refusal to accept them as full and equal citizens. The Senate has already passed this bill by an overwhelming vote of Democratic and Republican members. The House, as it did in passing the civil rights laws of 1960 and 1964, should concur in the Senate amendments and so advance us toward full equality.

2. Congress must approve the Urgent Supplemental Appropriations for 1968 as soon as possible in order to bring funds up to authorized levels and make $75 million available for summer jobs programs and $25 million for Head Start.

3. "Pervasive unemployment and underemployment," the Kerner Report observes, "are the most persistent and serious grievances in minority areas. They are inextricably linked to the problem of civil disorder." The Commission calls for "immediate action to create two million new jobs over the next three years -- one million in the public sector and one million in the private sector -- to absorb the hard-core unemployed and materially reduce the level of underemployment for all workers, black and white." We urge Congress in this session to enact legislation implementing this recommendation.

The Report also stresses the need to make good the promises of America for the rural as well as the urban poor and for all ethnic groups. One particular way of fulfilling these promises for the rural poor is to help agricultural workers organize by enacting the pending bill to bring them under the protection of the National Labor Relations Act.

4. Congress must repeal the unconscionable provisions that limit Federal participation in the Aid to Families with Dependent Children program and threaten to deny assistance to about 475,000 welfare recipients; force mothers of pre-school children to take part in work-training programs; deny unemployment compensation to fathers with no significant history of employment; and cut back medical care to welfare recipients.

5. Governmental programs have thus far produced only 680,000 low-income housing units for the six million families that desperately need them. We, therefore, urge enactment of the Housing and Urban Development Act of 1968 to provide for necessary expansion in the construction of public housing and to make available adequate funds for the rent supplement and model cities programs. In construction of housing, preference must be given to projects that destroy ghetto patterns and make possible the creation of a single, integrated society.

We recognize that action on these programs is costly. But inaction will be far more costly both in terms of wasted lives and in the threat to our democratic fabric. We agree with former Secretary of HEW John W. Gardner when he declared "History is not going to deal kindly with a rich nation that refuses to tax itself to cure its miseries."

The Leadership Conference has long been committed to an integrated democratic, plural society, even as we are committed to the belief that this goal can and must be achieved through peaceful, democratic means and within the American political system. We reaffirm that commitment in the light of the Kerner Report, with a heightened sense of urgency.

Accordingly, we call upon the 115 national organizations in the Conference to make the consideration and implementation of the Report their highest priority. The Congressional Easter recess is almost here. It offers us an opportunity for an immediate step. We call upon each organization to urge its local units to use the recess as the occasion of their own recommitment to the goals of the Conference and to hold special meetings, visit and phone their Senators and Congressmen and urge them to recognize our desperate situation and enact this minimum program in civil rights, employment, housing and welfare.

April 18, 1968

TO: Participating Organizations

FROM: Arnold Aronson, Secretary

SUMMING UP THE CIVIL RIGHTS VICTORY

The signing of the Civil Rights Act of 1968 on Thursday, April 11, was an affirmation of Adlai Stevenson's memorable remark that progress is made when "the impossible gives way to the necessary." We need not rehearse for members of the Leadership Conference how many times the press and even members of Congress gave up the bill for dead and predicted the impossibility of passing any Federal open housing legislation. The final victory is shared by all of us who worked for the passage of the bill against seemingly insurmountable odds.

Praise For Clarence Mitchell

In this connection, we are glad to include with this MEMO a copy of a Washington Post editorial commending our Legislative Chairman, Clarence Mitchell, for the decisive role he played in obtaining passage of the bill. Those who worked with him know that when even the firmest of us doubted, he did not doubt. The Post's tribute fittingly singles out a man who never gave up and whose devoted, unceasing work for civil rights too often goes unsung.

Clarence Mitchell, of course, would be the first to insist upon sharing any tribute with the others, in Washington and throughout the country, too many to list here, who also worked to get the bill passed.

Thanks To House Members

Considering the enormous pressures to which they were subjected by opponents of the law, the House members who voted to keep the bill from a conference in which it could have been hacked to pieces deserve our special thanks. We enclose that decisive vote with this MEMO. We hope our many organizations will send notes of appreciation to these Congressmen.

Where The Civil Rights Bill Stands

Enactment of H. R. 2516 virtually completes Congressional action on President Johnson's civil rights package for the 90th Congress.

Our organizations will recall that since it was felt last year that the omnibus bill could not be passed as a single piece of legislation, its six titles were introduced as separate bills.

Congress enacted months ago Title I, the section to reform the Federal jury system and Title VI, which extends the life of the U. S. Civil Rights Commission five years to January 31, 1973.

Passage of H. R. 2516 writes into law Title IV, the fair housing section, and Title V, the section meant to protect Negroes and civil rights workers in the exercise of key constitutional rights. (Because this has become the major civil rights law of this session, we enclose a summary of its principal provisions.)

The two remaining titles, on which final action has not yet been taken are Title II, the state jury reform section, and Title III, to strengthen the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, mainly by giving it authority to issue cease and desist orders.

Title II is bottled up in the Senate Judiciary Committee and has little chance of getting out. But the bill to strengthen EEOC, one of the Kerner Riot Commission's recommendations, incidentally, could be reported out readily by the Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee -- if only that committee could manage to meet. So far, because of the political activities of some of its members, the Labor Committee has been unable to obtain a quorum. The committee is scheduled to meet on the bill (S. 1308) this coming Wednesday, April 24. We urge our organizations to wire or write the members of the committee urging them to help complete the civil rights agenda for this year by attending the committee meeting and reporting out the bill. Here are the members:

Democrats: Hill, Chairman (Ala.), Morse (Ore.), Yarborough (Texas), Clark (Pa.), Randolph (W. Va.), Williams, Jr. (N. J.), Pell (R. I.), Kennedy (Mass.), Nelson (Wis.), Kennedy (N. Y.).

Republicans: Javits (N. Y.), Prouty (Vt.), Dominick (Colo.), Murphy (Calif.), Fannin (Ariz.), Griffin (Mich.).

We Can Still Get Emergency Funds For Jobs And Head Start

Overshadowed by the passage of the civil rights act was another hopeful Congressional action. The Senate, by a vote of 54 to 24, last week rejected a conference report on the Urgent Supplemental Appropriations for 1968, because the conferees would not accept Senate amendments to provide $25 million in emergency funds for Head Start and $75 million for the summer job program. New Senate conferees have been named. You can help them by wiring them -- Senators Holland (Fla.), Ellender (La.), Magnuson (Wash.), Bible (Nev.), McGee (Wyo.), Yarborough (Texas), Mundt (S. D.), and Javits (N. Y.) -- urging them to recognize the importance of these funds in any program to deal with our domestic crisis. Senator Javits deserves a special word of commendation. He led the fight to keep the money in the bill.

A LAW TO ASSURE FAIR HOUSING AND TO PROTECT RIGHTS AGAINST INTERFERENCE

(A brief summary of H. R. 2516)

TITLE I
PROHIBITS INTERFERENCE WITH FEDERALLY PROTECTED RIGHTS

Title I makes it a Federal criminal offense for anyone to interfere with certain enumerated civil rights by force or threats of force.

The rights protected against any interference include the right: to vote, to run for office, to serve as a poll watcher or election official in any election, Federal, state or local; to participate in or to enjoy the benefits of any Federal service, privilege, program, facility or activity; to apply for or enjoy Federal employment; to serve as a Federal juror; to participate in or enjoy the services of any program or activity that is assisted with Federal funds.

Other rights are protected against interference based on race, creed, color or national origin. These include the right: to enroll in or attend any public school or college; to participate in or enjoy any state benefit, service, privilege, program or facility; to apply for or enjoy employment by a state or subdivision or by a private employer; to join or use the services of any union, hiring hall or employment agency; to serve as a state juror; to travel in interstate commerce; to use the facilities of places of public accommodation.

Also protected are citizens who assist others to enjoy these rights or who advocate their enjoyment (civil rights workers) and those who extend these rights to those seeking them (such as members of a school board who desegregate schools or a restaurant owner who serves colored patrons).

Businessmen would be protected from force or threats of force during a riot.

Law enforcement officers and members of the Armed Forces or National Guard engaged in suppressing a riot would be exempted from coverage of this title. They would, however, continue to be covered by existing civil rights laws (18 U.S.C. 241 and 242).

Penalties range from one year and $1,000 fine to life imprisonment, depending on the severity of the offense. Existing civil rights laws are amended to increase penalties.

Title I also includes an anti-riot bill. It prohibits travel in interstate commerce or the use of facilities of interstate commerce with intent to incite, organize, promote, encourage or participate in a riot or to commit any act of violence in furtherance of a riot. Penalties would be up to $10,000 fine and five years' imprisonment.

TITLE II to VII
RIGHTS OF INDIANS

These titles provide a "bill of rights" for Indians. They would extend certain constitutional rights to all Indians and would reform tribal courts and Indian law.

TITLE VIII FAIR HOUSING

This is the open housing bill. It prohibits discrimination based on race, creed, color or national origin in the sale, rental and financing of housing. It would go into effect in three phases:

1. Upon enactment, it would apply to most housing now covered by the 1962 Executive Housing Order (government-owned or assisted housing).

2. On January 1, 1969, it would cover all other housing except single-family houses sold or rented by a private owner who owns no more than three houses; and rooms or units in dwellings of four or fewer units where the owner occupies one of the units. This is the "Mrs. Murphy's boarding house" exemption. In this phase, large apartment houses with more than four units and new single family houses in new developments would be covered.

3. On January 1, 1970, coverage would extend to all housing sold or rented through a broker or other agent (except rooms or units in a "Mrs. Murphy's" dwelling).

Religious organizations and private clubs that provide housing to members are exempted from coverage.

There are these methods of enforcement:

1) By complaints to the Secretary of HUD, who would investigate and attempt conciliation. He would first refer the complaint to a state agency if it offered comparable rights and remedies.

2) By individual suits for relief and damages, including punitive damages up to $1,000 in Federal courts (or in state courts if the state has a comparable law).

3) By "pattern or practice" suits brought by the Attorney General.

Civil actions may also be brought in Federal court to enjoin interference with rights protected by this title.

Discrimination by commercial lenders and by real estate boards or multiple listing organizations is also prohibited.

TITLE IX
PREVENTS INTIMIDATION IN FAIR HOUSING CASES

Provides penalties similar to those of Title I to protect the right to housing against intimidation or interference because of race, creed, color or national origin.

TITLE X
CIVIL DISORDERS

Makes it a Federal criminal offense to teach or demonstrate the use of a firearm or explosive for use in a civil disorder, to transport or manufacture a firearm or explosive for such purpose, to obstruct, impede or interfere with a law officer or fireman in a civil disorder.

Prime Mover

The real heroes of legislative battles are often unseen and unsung. Too often the kudos and hurrahs go to those who are most visible, while the prime movers go unpraised. A special salute is in order, we think, to Clarence Mitchell for the part he played in bringing the latest civil rights bill to enactment—and for the part he has played in the adoption of every civil rights measure for more than a decade past. Clarence Mitchell is the director of the Washington bureau of the NAACP and the chief lobbyist for the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights. It was he who persisted, when others faltered, in conviction that a full-scale civil rights bill with a bona fide open housing provision could be enacted in this session of Congress. It was he whose faith in Congress and the American people steadfastly thwarted and denied failure. All Americans are in debt to him.

NEW THREATS TO CIVIL RIGHTS IN "SAFE STREETS" BILL

That measure with the very appealing name, "The Safe Streets and Crime Control Bill," could end up making the country very unsafe for civil rights and civil liberties. Because of the many dangers evident in the legislation, the Executive Committee of the Leadership Conference, at a special meeting on April 30, unanimously agreed it was unacceptable in its present form.

The bill, S. 917, is now being debated on the Senate floor. We must urge our Senators to vote against provisions that could encourage police brutality and denial of constitutional rights and authorize wiretapping on so broad and uncontrolled a basis that it could be used against civil rights and labor groups.

A Bill Distorted From Its Purpose

As originally proposed, the bill was meant to provide federal funds to state and local governments to help them reduce crime by increasing the effectiveness of their law enforcement efforts. It would still authorize $400,111,000 for the start of a five-year program of law enforcement. It would also provide a semblance of gun control. But the Senate Judiciary Committee has so rewritten the four titles of the bill that its defects far outweigh any merits.

Title I: A Boost to Segregation

Title I authorizes funds for the first two years of the program to both state and local law enforcement agencies. However, a provision bars the Federal government from requiring any correction of racial imbalance in local police forces before making the money available.

The provision on racial imbalance replaced a more extreme proposal which would have explicitly prohibited application of Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 to any allocation of funds. This is the provision that authorizes a cut-off of Federal funds to state programs administered in a racially discriminatory manner. The new provision would frustrate Federal efforts to compel desegregation of local police.

There will be an attempt to substitute a "bloc grant" system for allocating funds. This would give exclusive control to state agencies -- which are generally insensitive to the law enforcement needs of the cities. This move must be resisted.

Title II: An Invitation to Police Brutality

Title II of the bill has been correctly characterized by the Washington Post and the Justice Department as "an abomination." It would overturn several key Supreme Court decisions on confessions and eye witness testimony. It would prevent the Supreme Court and other Federal courts from reviewing the voluntariness of confessions even if they were extracted by force. Nor could a confession be ruled out solely because of delay between the arrest and arraignment of a defendant even though months intervened. The history of justice for the poor and for members of minority groups is notorious for its extraction of "voluntary" confessions and for confessions obtained after persons have been held incommunicado for unconscionable periods of time.

The title would also, unbelievably, bar Federal courts from hearing habeas corpus petitions of individuals in state prisons. This section is practically an open invitation to police in some parts of this country to return to the third degree and lawless enforcement of the law.

Title III: A Sanction For Eavesdropping

Title III would authorize wiretapping and bugging by states in a range of crimes so broad, and under such loose control, it may well prove an irresistable inducement to local police to "listen in" on anyone. They could, for instance, in an undefined "emergency situation", wiretap for 48 hours without a court order to do so.

It seems reasonable that police will engage in exploratory taps as a matter of practice.

Court orders to tap the phones of civil rights organizations or labor unions could be obtained by the police on the mere say so that planned demonstrations might lead to civil disorder.

Title IV: Limited Gun Control

Title IV would establish Federal control over the sale and licensing of handguns -- pistols and revolvers. It would not regulate traffic in rifles and shotguns. In short, it does nothing to deny guns to the likes of Lee Harvey Oswald or the murderer of Martin Luther King.

What Organizations Can Do

Leadership Conference Organizations can help stop the abuses of law the Safe Streets and Crime Control bill could stimulate by wiring their Senators today urging them to: oppose Title I provisions that bar correcting racial imbalance in local police agencies and resist "bloc grant" proposals; delete the anti-Supreme Court provisions of Title II; and strike Title III on wiretapping and bugging; and to extend the controls of Title IV to shotguns and rifles. We must act quickly, though. Debate may be ended shortly and voting may start next week. We need to do what we can to block a law so fraught with danger to fundamental rights and so contrary to democratic principle.

HOUSE TO VOTE ON MODEL CITIES FUNDS

This Wednesday, May 8, the House is scheduled to vote on funds for model cities, rent supplements and other vital housing programs. It will be considering the fiscal 1969 appropriations for the Department of Housing and Urban Development. Attempts may be made to trim funds for individual programs but the most dangerous threat to HUD's activities, given a budget-conscious Congress, will be a move to adopt an "across-the-board" cut in the entire appropriation.

Organizations can help save these HUD programs by wiring House members urging them to resist all attempts to cut back on funding levels approved by the House Appropriations Committee.

BILL TO STRENGTHEN EEOC MOVES FORWARD

The Senate Judiciary Committee has approved and reported out the last of the key civil rights bills before this Congress -- S. 1308, the bill to strengthen the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission mainly by giving it authority to issue cease-and-desist orders. An attempt will be made to bring it to the floor shortly and we will report on the date when we know it.

RE: Jobs, Housing, Welfare, Education, Funds

THE UNFINISHED WORK BEFORE THE 90th CONGRESS: A LEGISLATIVE AGENDA FOR THE REST OF THIS TERM

Now that the President has signed the Civil Rights Act of 1968 into law, what are the major legislative issues before the Leadership Conference? This MEMO addresses itself to that question.

At its meeting last month, the Executive Committee of the Conference in a statement endorsing the Kerner Commission report, set forth its priorities for the remainder of this session. This MEMO updates that statement. It is hard to establish priorities among the bills listed here. All of them are important. But the creation of jobs for the hardcore unemployed surely deserves to be first on the list of what must be done to achieve our goals of full civil and economic rights. Housing, welfare, education, unfinished work in civil rights and civil liberties are other matters high on our list. And involved in everything is the issue of adequate funds for the programs outlined here. This, at a time when powerful members of Congress are calling for a $6 billion budget cut that the President has said will produce "chaos" in Federal programs, may yet become the overriding issue as Congress quickens its pace in order to adjourn in time for the national conventions in August.

JOBS

1. "Emergency Employment and Training Act of 1968" (S. 3063) - To relieve hardcore unemployment and underemployment in urban and rural areas by providing meaningful public and private employment opportunities in the community services field; and to provide incentives to private industry to undertake the hiring and training of low-income and unemployed persons. The bill would seek to assure employment in public services for at least 3,300,000 persons over a four-year period, starting on or before June 30, 1969, and continuing through the fiscal year ending June 30, 1972. It would also authorize sufficient funds to create 2,250,000 jobs in the private sector during the same four-year period. The bill was introduced by Senator Joseph Clark (D-Pa.) and 11 co-sponsors.

Situation - Hearings are presently going on before the Subcommittee on Employment, Manpower and Poverty of the Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee and are expected to continue through May.

2. Guaranteed Employment Act of 1968 (H. R. 12280) - A bill sponsored by Rep. James O'Hara (D-Mich.) and some 75 others. Similar to the Clark bill in that it would make the government "employer of last resort." It would generate one million jobs upon passage in the community services sector. It also provides for training.

Situation - Hearings continue before the Select Subcommittee on Labor of the House Education and Labor Committee.

Action - Senate and House members should be urged to support and vote for the legislation as a keystone measure in ending poverty.

3. Farm Labor (H. R. 16014 and S. 8) - A bill to bring farm workers under the protection of the National Labor Relations Act as a way of helping them organize. Under the House bill, no farm would be covered unless the employer paid more than $10,000 in labor costs during the previous calendar year and had more than 12 employees at any one time during the same period. It also permits a seven-day union shop clause and preferential hiring based on seniority or place of residence.

Situation and Action - The full House Education and Labor Committee has ordered H. R. 16014 reported out, and it now awaits a rule by the Rules Committee. In the Senate, S. 8, the companion bill, has been reported by the Senate Migratory Labor Subcommittee and awaits action by the full Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee. The House Rules Committee and the full Senate Committee need to be urged to act.

CIVIL RIGHTS AND CIVIL LIBERTIES

1. Safe Streets and Crime Control Bill (S. 917) - The Senate is presently debating a bill that would authorize some $400 million for the improvement of the law enforcement agencies -- a goal the Leadership Conference readily supports -- but also includes provisions that the Executive Committee, at a special meeting on April 30, concluded were unacceptable. These are provisions that would: bar the Federal government from raising the issue of racial imbalance in police forces at the time it makes grants; overturn key U. S. Supreme Court rulings on confessions and use of line-up identifications and have the effect of returning law enforcement back to the notorious third degree police practices of 30 years ago; greatly restrict the power of Federal courts to grant time-honored writs of habeas corpus to persons in state custody; authorize wiretapping on so broad a scale it could lead to indiscriminate eavesdropping; and regulate interstate sales of handguns but not of rifles and shotguns. (See MEMO 13-68 for more details.)

Situation and Action - Voting on amendments to the bill has already begun. What is needed is a flood of messages to Senators urging them to delete Titles II (the anti-Supreme Court provisions) and Title III (Wiretapping); delete the language on racial imbalance (Section 518 (b)); and extend gun control in Title IV to include rifles and shotguns.

2. Strengthening the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission - The bill (S. 3465) to strengthen the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission mainly by giving it authority to issue cease and desist orders, was approved by the full Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee on April 25. It has just been reported out and will need all the support we can muster when it reaches the Senate floor.

3. State Jury Reform - The bill (S. 1318) to end discrimination in the selection of state court juries -- the last of bills from the omnibus civil rights package President Johnson introduced in this Congress -- is still bottled up in the Senate Judiciary Committee and no further action is expected on it in this session.

4. Congressional Representation for the District of Columbia - Resolutions to amend the Constitution so that the nation's capital may have Congressional representation are now pending in House and Senate. In the Senate, S. J. Res. 80, to provide one representative, is still pending before the Constitutional Amendments Subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee. In the House, H. J. Res. 396, to give the District two Senators and as many representatives as its population allows, has cleared the House Judiciary Committee and it is now awaiting action by the House Rules Committee to bring it to the floor.

HOUSING

Housing and Urban Development Act of 1968 (S. 3029 and H. R. 15624)

1. Provision for homeownership contemplated in constructing about 1,175,000 units of low and moderate income housing for homeownership through fiscal 1971. Total funds authorized over five years is $300 million. Generally speaking, families with incomes from $3,000 to $7,000 would be assisted. The homeowner would pay mortgage payments of 20 percent of income. Depending on his income, the Federal government would subsidize the homeowner's interest rate and make payments to the mortgagee in an amount necessary that would make up the difference between 20 percent of the family's monthly income and the required monthly payment. The interest rate would be subsidized from between one percent and the market rate.

2. Federal assistance is also applied for rental housing for low and moderate income families, through fiscal 1971. The only difference is that the tenant has to pay 25 percent of his income for rent before the subsidy applies. Contemplated is the construction of about 1,175,000 housing units and an authorization of $300 million.

3. The rent supplement program is expanded and is funded over two years at a $240 million level through fiscal 1972. Contemplated is the subsidy of 140,000 units.

4. Various traditional programs, such as low rent public housing, urban renewal, basic water and sewer facilities, are extended and expanded.

5. Model cities program is funded for fiscal 1970 at $1 million each year. This includes the urban renewal add-on.

6. The development of new communities is aided by authorizing the Secretary of HUD to guarantee bonds, debentures, notes and other obligations to help finance up to ten new community development projects.

The issues appear to be the following:

a. Need to adopt fully proposed authorization without any cuts. Conservatives will make efforts to cut funds.

b. Acceptance of some of the new proposals, such as subsidizing interest rates down to one percent. The greater the interest rate subsidy, the more low income families will be aided.

c. Adoption of the new communities proposal.

d. Need to oppose artifical income limits to exclude moderate income families and thereby promote low-income ghettoes.

Situation - In the Senate, floor action is expected after consideration of the Safe Streets and Crime Control Bill. Hearings on the House bill should be completed this month by the House Banking and Currency Committee, and efforts will be made to increase funding.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

Welfare Payments - One of the worst actions of the first session of the 90th Congress was to add to the social security laws several punitive restrictions on welfare payments. The Senate partially redressed these wrongs by writing into the excise tax bill, which the House had already passed, (H. R. 15414) provisions repealing two of the restrictions: (1) the "freeze" on aid to families with dependent children and (2) the requirement that unemployed fathers must have had a record of previous employment in order to receive aid.

Situation - The bill went to a House-Senate Conference. There in the course of working out a compromise -- which incidentally endorses President Johnson's ten percent surcharge on income taxes in exchange for a $6 billion cut in Federal spending -- the conferees undid much of the Senate's good work. They simply delayed the "freeze" on aid one year to July 1, 1969. And they knocked out the Senate repealer on welfare payments to unemployed fathers.

The conferees, however, did leave in a Senate amendment giving states two more years in which to opt for the voluntary part of Medicare for welfare recipients.

There has been no Congressional action in regard to last year's provision requiring mothers of pre-school children to take part in work-training programs or face the prospect of having their welfare cut off. However, the repeal of this cruel provision is embodied in several bills introduced in the House and Senate and still pending.

APPROPRIATIONS

That familiar tactic of Congressional opponents of civil rights and social welfare legislation -- to starve programs they don't like by denying them the funds they need -- was never more in evidence than now. Since the Leadership Conference has long worked for adequate funding for model cities and rent supplement programs, it was greatly heartening when the House, on May 8, resisted attempts to cut back on both these programs and approved $25 million for rent supplements and $500 million for model cities in fiscal year 1969.

But that victory may be shortlived in light of the action by House-Senate conferees who, the very next day, called for a $6 billion cut in Federal spending as the price for approving the ten percent income tax surcharge needed to curb inflation. Here Congress seems to give with one hand and take away with the other. For at least $2 billion of that $6 billion would probably have to come from the less than $40 billion budgeted for domestic programs designed to meet the nation's needs in education, employment, health, housing and anti-poverty. Model cities and rent supplements may yet be cut back.

Labor-HEW - Endangered by threatened budget cut are many of the key programs whose funding is presently under consideration by the House Appropriations Committee. The fiscal 1969 appropriations for the Departments of Labor, Health, Education and Welfare and independent offices include $2,180,000,000 for the anti-poverty program; $1,562,000,000 for the Elementary and Secondary Education Act; more than $2 billion for other programs; plus funds for Head Start, summer jobs and bi-lingual education.

The full committee is considering the Labor-HEW appropriation and is expected to report it out by May 24. All of these appropriations are essential and the task of the Leadership Conference groups should be to see that at least the budgeted amounts are approved by the full committee. Two programs deserve special attention:

1. Head Start and Summer Jobs - The $75 million for summer jobs and the $25 million for Head Start, funds included in the Urgent Supplemental Appropriations bill for 1968 (H. R. 15399) appear to be hopelessly tied up in a House-Senate conference. An attempt can and must be made to include these funds in the regular supplemental appropriations bill now being considered by House Appropriations along with the money for Labor-HEW.

Recommended Action - Telegrams urging inclusion of the $100 million for summer jobs and Head Start should be sent at once to: George H. Mahon (D-Tex.), chairman of the full House Appropriations Committee and to Daniel J. Flood (D-Pa.), chairman of the Labor-HEW Subcommittee and these other subcommittee members: Neal Smith (D-Iowa), W. R. Hull, Jr., (D-Mo.), Bob Casey (D-Tex.), Melvin R. Laird (R-Wisc.), Robert H. Michel (R-Ill.), Garner E. Shriver (R-Kans.); also a wire to Speaker of the House John W. McCormack (D-Mass.)

2. Bi-Lingual Education - Having approved a program to provide education mainly to Spanish-speaking children, the Administration is now starving the program. Although $30 million was authorized when the program was approved, the Administration is seeking only $5 million for fiscal 1969. Of the three million children who need help under the bi-lingual education program, only about 142,000 are getting it. Even the full $30 million will help only 215,000 more. This much should be approved.

CONSUMER LEGISLATION

1. "Truth-in-Lending" bill - S. 5 - Both House and Senate have passed different versions of the bill. Both bills let the buyer know how much he must pay for credit in simple annual interest rates; however, the House bill is the better one and provides for full disclosure. The Senate bill exempts revolving credit, and small purchases with finance service charges of less than $10 (purchases up to $100). It is silent on advertising. The House bill has no exemptions. It covers revolving credit, all credit purchases and advertising. It also establishes a Federal standard regulating garnishment: at a minimum the first $30 of wages are free of garnishment, just 10 percent of wages may be garnished above that, and an employee may not be dismissed on the first garnishment. Labor considers the garnishment provision the critical item in conference.

Situation - The bill is still in conference as this is written.

WE MUST BLOCK THE NEW ATTACKS ON THE WAR ON POVERTY

The following telegram has been sent to the heads of our participating organizations:

> THE PROPOSED $6 BILLION BUDGET CUT COULD WRECK THE WAR ON POVERTY WHEN IT NEEDS TO BE EXPANDED. OUR MAJOR HEALTH, EDUCATION, WELFARE AND ANTI-POVERTY PROGRAMS WILL ALL SUFFER. REP. JAMES BURKE (D-MASS.) WILL TRY THIS WEDNESDAY, MAY 29, TO AT LEAST SAVE THE PRESENT PROGRAMS. HE WILL OFFER A RESOLUTION INSTRUCTING HOUSE CONFEREES TO NEGOTIATE A $4 BILLION CUT IN THE HOUSE-SENATE CONFERENCE. WE ASK YOU TO ACT IN YOUR OWN NAME AND MOBILIZE YOUR CONSTITUTENTS AND FLOOD HOUSE MEMBERS WITH WIRES URGING THEM TO VOTE FOR THE BURKE RESOLUTION INSTRUCTING HOUSE CONFEREES TO INSIST ON THE SMALLER CUT. PLEASE ACT AT ONCE. THE VOTE COMES WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON. PLEASE ADVISE US OF ANY ACTION YOU TAKE.

In President Johnson's own words, the $6 billion budget cut proposed by the House-Senate conferees would bring "chaos" to those domestic programs meant to deal with poverty and the urban crisis. A $4 billion cut would at least keep these programs operating at present levels.

Your own telegrams urging House members to support the Burke resolution can help save the funds so desperately needed to keep the nation from falling backward in the war on poverty. Please act today!

June 5, 1968

TO: Participating Organizations

FROM: Arnold Aronson, Secretary

GAINS AND SETBACKS AS CONGRESS GETS BACK TO WORK

Legislative developments have come so thick and fast these last two weeks, it has been hard to do a MEMO that would still be up to date after it was issued. The Memorial Day recess, however, has slowed things up long enough to allow an examination of what has happened to legislation of vital concern to the Leadership Conference and what still needs to be done now that Congress is back and ready to begin to push for adjournment before the August conventions.

Two Victories: "Truth-in-Lending" and Housing

At least two Congressional actions before the recess were strongly positive ones. Both House and Senate approved and sent to the White House the "truth-in-lending" bill, requiring retailers and others who sell on time to provide their customers with full and honest information on how much credit costs. The final version, which President Johnson has already signed into law, has other provisions that will be helpful to all consumers, rich and poor.

Perhaps the most important of these provisions is the one that establishes the first federal limit on the amount of money a creditor can garnish from a worker's paycheck. The garnishment formula will tend to help the poorest consumers and give them some badly needed protection against predatory creditors. Almost for this reason, any compilation of what this Congress has done for the poor should include this new law.

Other provisions require disclosure of the true annual interest rate on revolving credit accounts; help protect homeowners from fraud in home improvement plans, especially in regard to deceptions involving second mortgages; and make "loan-sharking" a federal crime.

Housing received a big boost when the Senate overwhelmingly approved a $5 billion housing bill establishing a pace that, if maintained, would provide six million new and rehabilitated housing units for families with low and moderate incomes over the next ten years. The measure now awaits House action. The House Banking Committee is expected to act shortly on a $6 billion program similar to the one the Senate approved. The bill is expected to reach the House floor by June 25 or 26. It is expected to have much rougher going than it did in the Senate and our organizations ought to begin getting ready now to fight for the bill.

Dark Side: "Safe Streets and Crime Control"

Infected by the current hysteria over rising crime, the Senate approved, 72 to 4, a Safe Streets and Crime Control bill (now numbered H. R. 5037) that still contains many provisions the Leadership Conference Executive Committee has pronounced unacceptable.

Although some of the provisions limiting the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court were knocked out, others were adopted that would overturn U. S. Supreme Court decisions meant to protect suspects from being railroaded into jail through the use of extorted confessions or loaded police line-ups. It also includes, according to an American Civil Liberties Union analysis, virtually uncontrolled authorization for wiretapping and a rider barring from federal employment for five years any person convicted of a riot-related felony.

Still in the bill is that terrible provision /518(b)/ that would bar the federal government from requiring local law enforcement agencies to do something about racial imbalance in their ranks before making funds available to them.

The bill now goes to conference. It passed the House without the anti-Supreme Court and wiretapping features and Rep. Emanual Celler (D-N.Y.), who, as chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, will lead the House conferees, has already announced he means to block the provisions that would upset the Court rulings.

Course of Action: Under the circumstances, House members should be urged by letters, wires and phone calls to insist on their version and to fight to eliminate the Senate's additions.

EEOC's Problems

1. Appropriations - The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission which has been shortchanged on funds and personnel since it first began operating in 1965 suffered another blow. Instead of granting the $13,093,000 budget it requested for fiscal 1969, the House Appropriations Committee cut its funds almost in half, to $6.9 million. An attempt to restore some of the cut and provide a budget of $11.8 million failed on the House floor by a narrow vote of 121 to 113.

EEOC, which already has a mounting backlog of cases, faces the new fiscal year in serious difficulty. On July 1, when the year begins, its jurisdiction automatically reaches fullest coverage. It is then required to police discrimination in businesses and unions with 25 or more employees. The number of businesses alone that it must watch will be increased by 250 percent. The agency, already understaffed, is certain to be swamped. It is under Congressional mandate to complete each case in two months. Without sufficient funds, EEOC estimates cases will take two years.

Recommended Action - The Senate Appropriations Committee will now consider the agency's request. Efforts must be made first to persuade the members of that committee and then the entire Senate to give EEOC enough funds to carry out the obligations Congress has placed upon it.

Senate Appropriations Committee:

Democrats: Carl Hayden (Ariz.), Chairman, Richard B. Russell (Ga.), Allen J. Ellender (La.), Lister Hill (Ala.), John L. McClellan (Ark.), Warren G. Magnuson (Wash.), Spessard L. Holland (Fla.), John Stennis, (Miss), John O. Pastore (R.I.), A. S. Mike Monroney (Okla.), Alan Bible (Nev.), Robert C. Byrd (W.Va.), Gale W. McGee (Wyo.), Mike Mansfield (Mont.), E. L. Bartlett (Alaska), William Proxmire (Wisc.), Ralph W. Yarborough (Texas).

Republicans: Milton R. Young (N.D.), Karl E. Mundt (S.D.), Margaret Chase Smith (Maine), Thomas H. Kuchel (Calif.), Roman L. Hruska (Neb.), Gordon Allott (Colo.), Norris Cotton (N.H.), Clifford P. Case (N.J.), Jacob K. Javits (N.Y.).

2. EEOC's Enforcement Power - Still awaiting floor action in the Senate is S. 3465, a bill to strengthen the EEOC by giving it the authority most regulatory agencies have to issue judicially enforceable cease and desist orders. The bill was supposed to be considered by the Senate after it finished with the Housing measure. Now it is unclear when it will be brought up.

The Budget Cut

In spite of strong Administration efforts and a most encouraging response from Leadership Conference groups to our urgent MEMO (No. 15-68), the attempt to reduce the budget cut from $6 billion to $4 billion failed last week. The resolution by Rep. James Burke (D-Mass.) to instruct House conferees to attempt to negotiate the smaller cut was beaten 137 to 259. The cut is the price House-Senate conferees are exacting in return for giving the President the 10 percent surtax increase he claims he needs to halt inflation.

The President announced after the action in the House failed that he will accept the $6 billion cut in order to get the increase even though earlier he had said it would hurt domestic programs.

Rep. Wilbur Mills (D-Ark.), head of the House conferees, is expected to file the conference report shortly and the issue should reach the House floor by June 12.

Farm Workers Bill Needs Help

The campaign in support of a bill (H.R. 16014 in the House, S.8 in the Senate) to extend the protection of the National Labor Relations Act to farm workers in order to help them organize, can use our fullest support.

In the House, the bill is waiting to be cleared for floor action by the House Rules Committee. In the Senate, it is expected to be reported out by the Senate Labor Committee.

Action - Both House and Senate members need to hear from everyone urging them to support the bills and act on them quickly.

QUICK GLIMPSES AT SOME SLOW-MOVING BILLS

Still in about the same stage when we last reported on them (see MEMO: No. 14-68) are : the guaranteed job bills (S. 3063 in the Senate, H.R. 12280 in the House), both still in the hearing stage; the provisions to repeal restrictions on welfare aid; funds for bilingual education ($30 million needed, only $5 million being considered); and funds for emergency summer jobs ($75 million) and Head Start ($25 million). Efforts are underway to add the funds for Head Start and summer jobs to the 1968 supplemental appropriations and to increase the funds for bilingual education as part of the Labor-HEW appropriations for fiscal 1969. This appropriation was expected to be reported out May 24. Action has now been postponed to sometime in June.

A POSSIBLE VICTORY FOR THE HUNGRY

On the same day that the House rejected the Burke move to reduce the budget cut, Senator Jacob Javits (R-N.Y.) succeeded in getting the Senate to adopt an amendment that may mean more funds to feed starving Americans. During the debate on the Agriculture Appropriations Bill, the Senator succeeded in getting knocked out of the appropriations act a section (Section 32) that Secretary of Agriculture Orville Freeman says so restricts his use of funds that he is forced to return $227 million to the Treasury this year instead of using it for food programs.

The Javits amendment was adopted by a single vote, 30 to 31. The Appropriations bill now goes to conference and the fight we face is the difficult one of persuading conferees to accept the Senate's action.

RE: Crime Control, EEOC, Funds

LCCR EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE CALLS FOR VETO OF CRIME CONTROL BILL

Aroused by Senator Robert Kennedy's tragic death and the impulse to do something about crime and violence, the House, on June 6, by an overwhelming vote (368 to 17) agreed to the Senate version of the "Omnibus Safe Streets and Crime Control" bill and sent it on to the White House.

It is still a terrible bill. There is terrible irony in the fact that Senator Kennedy's memory was constantly invoked in support of legislation he would have been the first to fight. It is, as one member termed it, "a cruel hoax" offering the illusion of a law that would control crime and traffic in guns when the awful reality is it will strip citizens of constitutional protections, countenance broad invasions of privacy, and block Congressional action on meaningful gun controls.

The Executive Committee of the Leadership Conference was promptly polled by wire and agreed unanimously that we should urge the President to veto the bill. Our statement to the President setting forth the reasons why he should reject the measure and an editorial from the New York Times urging the same course upon him are included with this MEMO.

What You Can Do

We urge our participating organizations to send their own messages and wires to the President urging him to veto the bill. The President has until June 19 to decide whether or not to sign the bill. You can help persuade him not to sign by sending your own wires at once.

FUNDS FOR JOBS, HEAD START, ANTI-BIAS WORK STILL IN THE BALANCE

There is still time to urge Congress to act on several bills immediately before it, that would provide funds for such vital activities as policing job discrimination, summer employment, and Head Start. Here's a quick glance at these bills.

1. EEOC's Budget - The budget for the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission for the fiscal year starting July 1, is still before the Senate Appropriations Committee. As we reported last time (MEMO No. 16-68), the House rejected the Administration's request for a budget of $13,093,000 and cut it in half to $6.9 million. This at a time when the Commission's jurisdiction is being expanded by law and its workload will increase by some 250 percent. If you have not done so, please write all members of the Senate Appropriations Committee and urge them to restore full funds to an agency with too little money to do what Congress has required of it.

Senate Appropriations Committee:

Democrats: Carl Hayden (Ariz.), Chairman, Richard B. Russell (Ga.), Allen J. Ellender (La.), Lister Hill (Ala.), John L. McClellan (Ark.), Warren G. Magnuson (Wash.), Spessard L. Holland (Fla.), John Stennis (Miss.), John O. Pastore (R.I.), A. S. Mike Monroney (Okla.), Alan Bible (Nev.), Robert C. Byrd (W. Va.), Gale W. McGee (Wyo.), Mike Mansfield (Mont.), E. L. Republicans: Milton R. Young (N. D.), Karl E. Mundt (S. D.), Margaret Chase Smith (Maine), Thomas H. Kuchel (Calif.), Roman L. Hruska (Neb.), Gordon Allott (Colo.), Norris Cotton (N.H.), Clifford P. Case (N.J.), Jacob K. Javits (N. Y.).

2. Summer Jobs and Head Start - Supplemental Bill (H.R. 17734) - Another bill before the Senate Appropriations Committee provides an opportunity for getting Congress to allocate $75 million for emergency summer jobs and $25 million for Head Start. This is the second supplemental appropriations bill for 1968 (H. R. 17734). The House already made one improvement when it passed the bill on June 11 by adding $90 million for impacted school areas. The Senate, which added the $100 million for jobs and Head Start to another appropriations measure, only to see it get stalled in conference, can be expected to add the funds again. Letters to members of the Appropriations Committee should ask them to add the funds in committee. But failing that, the whole Senate needs to be urged to see that these vital funds are restored.

Statement of the Executive Committee of the LEADERSHIP CONFERENCE ON CIVIL RIGHTS
Calling for the Veto of the Omnibus Crime Control Bill
June 13, 1968

Although we recognize the urgent need for legislation to help this country combat crime, the "Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets" bill is legislation of so ill-conceived and destructive a nature, we have no recourse except to urge you to veto it.

The very name of this bill could become a cause for cynicism. Under the guise of protecting us against criminal attacks, the bill, by upsetting key Supreme Court rulings, strips citizens of their constitutional rights.

Suspects would run the terrible risks of coerced confessions, rigged police lineups, and unconscionable delays between arrests and arraignments.

Under the guise of combatting organized crime and protecting the privacy of citizens against electronic surveillance, the bill offers police an invitation to invade privacy on an unprecedented scale. Because of the wide-ranging nature of this bill, thousands of innocent citizens would face the prospect of having an ear on the line every time they make a phone call and an ear against the wall every-time they speak.

We are particularly sensitive to the fact that the bill still contains a provision prohibiting the Federal government from raising questions about racial imbalance in local police forces as a condition for making authorized funds available. We feel this section is a deliberate attempt to undermine Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

Even one of the few features of the bill with any redeeming merits, the gun control section, is as you yourself acknowledge, totally inadequate -- a "watered-down" version of the law we need, a "half-way measure" that does little to close "the brutal loophole in our nation's laws." Its vice is in its inadequacy. Enactment of this section would obstruct any attempt to get meaningful gun control by giving Congress an excuse for refusing to consider stronger legislation.

At this terrible moment in our nation's history, we understand how much courage it takes to speak out above the babble of malicious rumor and the cries of fear. We fully recognize the difficult decision that confronts you in this bill. Nevertheless, we believe it will help restore some balance of sanity in this country if you veto H. R. 5037 and call upon Congress to enact legislation that will control crime and violence and not restrict our rights.

NEW YORK TIMES June 7, 1968

'Cruel Hoax': Veto Called For

A spectator listening to the debate in the House of Representatives on the so-called "crime-control" bill during the last two days prior to its final passage would have reason to doubt whether the Bill of Rights could get fifty votes if it were up for consideration. The tone and quality of the debate would have dismayed Thomas Jefferson and James Madison if they had had the misfortune to hear it.

Members of the House were more intent on demagoging against crime and putting themselves on record in favor of law and order than they were in analyzing the grave defects of this bill. One of the worst failures in the bill is it feeble provision on gun control. Rifles were used to shoot down President Kennedy and Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. But this bill permits the murderous mail-order traffic in rifles and shotguns to continue. The bill does ban mail-order sale of pistols and revolvers, but it does not even require registration of the ownership of these dangerous weapons with the police.

Registration of weapons is no more of an inconvenience than registering an automobile or obtaining a prescription for a drug. In arguing against registration, the gun lobby constantly points to the Constitution's protection of the right to bear arms. But the Constitution also assures the right to vote; yet to exercise that right every citizen must register. Why should owning a gun be more sacrosanct than the right to vote?

Title II of this bill is an attempt to overrule recent Supreme Court decisions on the admissibility of confessions in Federal courts, methods of arraignment of suspects, and police procedures in the questioning of suspects. Many members of Congress talk as if suspects are presumed to be guilty. Most of Title II is undoubtedly unconstitutional because two of the major decisions Congress attempts to overturn were founded upon provisions of the Bill of Rights and cannot be reversed by a mere statute. In short, this Congressional vaporing will promote confusion and help no one.

Title III would permit the sweeping use of wiretapping and electronic devices for comparatively minor suspected crimes and with inadequate court supervision. Only legislators who have forgotten the history of the long struggle for human liberty could sanction this reckless invasion by the Government of the privacy of the individual.

Except for the financial assistance for local police forces, virtually nothing in this measure is going to assist in combating crime on the streets. Representative Celler of New York has accurately described it as "an illusory bill which was a cruel hoax on people whose fear of crime is a fact of life."

After the House approved it yesterday, President Johnson sent a letter renewing his request for tighter gun controls. We trust the letter is not an indication that the President intends to become a party to this hoax on the crime issue. We urge him to return this monstrous bill to Congress with the veto it deserves.

June 21, 1968

TO: Participating Organizations

FROM: Arnold Aronson, Secretary

RE: Gun Control, Housing, Food & Welfare

WE MUST SUPPORT THE STRONGEST POSSIBLE GUN CONTROL BILL

The public outcry over Senator Kennedy's death has brought Congress to the point of action it should have taken years ago. It appears ready to approve gun control legislation stronger than the weak curbs it wrote into the phony Safe Streets and Crime Control Bill* earlier this session. The Administration's gun control bill ought to be stronger than it is, and those of us appalled by the murder of both the Senator and Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., should certainly join in urging that the bill be improved by the addition of gun registration and licensing provisions.

The Administration measure (S. 3633) being cleared for Senate floor consideration as this MEMO is written, would meet some of the Leadership Conference objections to the gun control title of the Safe Streets bill. It would go beyond the bill's prohibitions on the interstate mail order sales of handguns to cover mail order sales of "long guns" -- rifles and shotguns. It would ban over-the-counter sales of such guns to out-of-state residents and prohibit sales of long guns to persons under 18. It places similar restrictions on the sale of ammunition and prohibits the sale of such "destructive devices" as bazookas, hand grenades, machine guns and sawed-off shotguns.

How The Bill Progresses Now

Once the bill is cleared by Senate Judiciary, it must go to the Senate Commerce Committee. That committee will probably report it out before the end of June. It may be ready for Senate floor action by the week of July 8.

---

*We note with great regret that the Safe Streets and Crime Control Bill, whose veto we urged in our last MEMO (No. 17-68), has been signed into law, even though the President called provisions in it "unwise" as he affixed his signature.

There Should Be Gun Registration

Meanwhile, the Senate Judiciary Subcommittee on Juvenile Delinquency has scheduled three days of hearings on registration and licensing bills, for June 26, 27, 28. The principal measure, Senator Joseph Tydings' bill (S. 3634) would require the Federal registration of all firearms and the obtainment of a license from the Secretary of the Treasury or a designated official to possess any firearms or ammunition.

It is expected that licensing and registration provisions will be offered as amendments to the Administration bill once it reaches the floor.

What We Can Do

The organizations in the Leadership Conference can help make this legislation the proper monument to the memories of Dr. King and the Kennedys by urging Congress to enact the strongest possible bill, one that not only controls sales of guns and ammunition but requires, too, their registration and licensing. For awhile the mail in support of control legislation was pouring into Congress. Its flow has begun to slacken and now, spurred on by the National Rifle Association, mail against controls is beginning to come in. We must redress the balance. Letters, wires, convention resolutions, all calling for the strongest possible controls are needed as soon as you can get them in.

THE HOUSING BILLS NEARS THE FLOOR

The Omnibus Housing Bill, a $5.5 billion measure that could provide a possible six million new and rehabilitated housing units for low and moderate income families over the next ten years, is moving closer to final action.

Already approved overwhelmingly by the Senate, 67 to 4 on May 28, the bill (H. R. 17989) has just been approved by the House Banking and Currency Committee. Unfortunately, the provisions for the development of ten new towns has been dropped. But, fortunately, the attempt to wreck the provision for subsidized monthly mortgage payments to help poor families buy homes, by having the government pay interest above one percent, failed by one vote.

New attacks on this provision and on other features of the bill can be expected when it reaches the House floor -- probably during the week of July 8.

What We Can Do

Leadership Conference organizations can help win passage of an effective Housing bill by writing House members urging them to be present, to support the Banking Committee bill and to oppose all further cuts in the legislation.

A QUICK LOOK AT OTHER ITEMS ON THE LEADERSHIP CONFERENCE AGENDA

1. Food

A House attempt is underway to shake loose some of the money the Department of Agriculture has been turning back to the Treasury and use it to feed the poor. The House Education and Labor Committee approved a bill (H. R. 17873) that would allocate $100 million a year for three years to be used to provide free school lunches to some four million hungry youngsters. The funds would come from money Agriculture Secretary Orville Freeman said he was restricted by law from using for food programs. He planned to turn back about $224 million unused in fiscal 1968.

The bill now goes to House Rules and, if cleared there, to the House floor.

2. Welfare

The cruel restrictions on welfare payments that the first session of this Congress added to the social security law last year are still far from being eliminated.

The ten percent surcharge and $6 billion budget cut that the House approved today included a sop -- a delay of one year, to July 1, 1969, of the "freeze" on aid to families with dependent children. The freeze should be lifted completely. And Congress should repeal at least two other restrictions: the requirement that unemployed fathers must have a record of previous employment in order to receive aid; and the provision requiring that mothers of pre-school children take part in work-training programs or face having their welfare payments cut off. The repeal of these provisions will be attempted by amendments to pending tax bills.

3. Jobs

In the Senate, hearings on the Emergency Employment and Training Act (S. 3063), a bill to create 2.4 million jobs for the hardcore unemployed, half in the public and half in the private sectors, have been completed by the Employment, Manpower and Poverty Subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. Subcommittee markup should come soon.

In the House, subcommittee hearings have been completed on a similar bill, the Guaranteed Employment Act (H. R. 12280), which would create one million community service jobs. This, too, should be moving on to the full committee shortly.

4. Farm Labor

Bills to bring farm workers under the protection of the National Labor Relations Act (H. R. 16014 in the House, S. 8 in the Senate) are still hung up. In the House, the bill is still awaiting a rule by the House Rules Committee, which has said it will clear no more legislation for the House floor after July 9. In the Senate, the bill awaits action by the full Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee. Both House Rules and Senate Labor should be urged to act on these bills at once.

5. EEOC

The fight to give the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission more money and more power is still going on in the Senate. The agency's budget for fiscal 1969, the year in which its workload is expected to increase by 250 percent as its obligations increase, was cut in half by the House, from $13 million to $6.9 million. Attempts will be made in the Senate Appropriations Committee to give the agency the full $13 million, so that it can carry out its responsibilities to end discrimination in employment. The bill (S. 8469) to give EEOC the authority other regulatory agencies have, to issue cease-and-desist orders against employers and unions it finds guilty of discrimination, is cleared and ready for Senate floor action. The job is to persuade Senate leadership to take up the bill.

July 18, 1968

TO: Participating Organizations

FROM: Arnold Aronson, Secretary

TWO CRUCIAL WEEKS TO PRESS OUR GOALS

By August 3, Congress will either adjourn for the Presidential conventions or recess and come back perhaps after Labor Day. In either case, that leaves us only the next two weeks in which to press for the immediate legislative programs so essential to any realization of the goals of full equality.

The past week was marked by a significant House victory -- passage of the Housing and Urban Development Act of 1968 in a form that still preserves the main features of a $5.2 billion program to provide six million units for low and moderate income families over the next ten years. The bill is now in a House-Senate conference.

Still before us, though, are the bills meant to do something about employment, education and hunger in America and the control of guns.

We recognize how many things this puts before participating organizations all at once. But every day in the next two weeks can present us with fresh crises. Congress will be meeting long and late and even on Saturdays in an attempt to finish up. Even if it doesn't finish, anything it may put over for a post-convention session delays by a full month programs we ought to have today. And these hectic weeks are usually the time when attempts are made to rush bad bills through.

Here are the major items we anticipate will be coming up and need your support and vigilant attention.

Food Stamps in the House

An important fight against hunger in America will be waged in the House within the next two weeks.* The food stamp bill (H.R. 18249) will be brought upon the floor. As it comes from the Agriculture Committee, it has several bad features. It would raise the limit of authorization from $225 million to only $245 million for the next fiscal year and would deny stamps to workers on strike and to students in institutions of higher learning.

Rep. Leonor K. Sullivan (D-Mo.) will attempt to correct these grave weaknesses by offering a substitute bill that would contain an open end authorization -- no limits on the amount of authorization for the next four years and without restrictions on aid to workers and students.

What You Can Do

Please ask your members to write or wire their Congressmen urging them to be there and to vote for the Sullivan substitute when it comes up.

Labor-HEW and Anti-Civil Rights

The Senate Appropriations Committee, or at least a subcommittee of it, may already be starting to mark up the money bill (H.R. 18037) providing funds for the Departments of Labor-HEW for fiscal 1969.

As we have urged in previous MEMOs, members of that committee and all Senators should be urged to restore the cuts in funds for programs to provide better education for disadvantaged children (Title I, Elementary and Secondary Education Act), for bi-lingual education, the Teacher Corps and the anti-poverty program.

Most important -- urge them to vote to strike the Whitten anti-civil rights riders, the amendments to the appropriations bill that would circumvent the Supreme Court ruling on freedom of choice plans and hamper HEW in its efforts to carry out the obligations Congress has placed upon it to achieve school desegregation.

EEOC's Funds

Another subcommittee of Senate Appropriations will be meeting shortly to begin mark up of funds for the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (H.R. 17522). Members of the State-Justice Subcommittee should be

*NOTE: In another attempt to force reforms in the food stamp program, about 80 Washington representatives to the Leadership Conference, led by Joseph L. Rauh, Jr., counsel, met on Friday, July 12, with Secretary of Agriculture Orville Freeman to press the demands of the Poor People's Campaign for 1) free stamps and for scaled-down price on stamps; and 2) to add to the list of food distributed directly items that would create a more balanced diet. While discussing these matters freely, the Secretary did not appear prepared to make concessions. However, he agreed to let Agriculture attorneys meet with Leadership Conference attorneys to discuss how these matters can be handled legislatively.

urged to give EEOC the money it badly needs to carry out its responsibilities -- $13 million the administration originally asked for instead of the $6.9 million the House approved.

Guaranteed Jobs

Both in the Senate and House, the Emergency Employment bills (S. 3063 in the Senate and H.R. 12280 in the House) are still tied up in labor committees. Other ways of bringing this legislation to the floor are being explored. In any case, House and Senate members should continue to be urged, in all letters to them and in all visits, to support these essential bills.

Other Issues Still Before This Session

Organizations should still continue to press for repeal of the restrictions on welfare written into social security laws last year; extension of the protections of the National Labor Relations Act to include farm workers; and for adequate gun control legislation, that will not only restrict the interstate mail order sale of guns but require Federal registration of all firearms and licenses for all owners of guns.

Attendance Still A Problem

In all letters and approaches to members of Congress, be sure to urge them to be on the floor for votes during these next two crucial weeks. Attendance has been a very serious problem.

During the House consideration of the Labor-HEW appropriations, for instance, the attempt to restore $5 million for bi-lingual education, the program that would mean so much to Spanish-speaking youngsters, lost by a single vote -- 95 to 96. Other amendments we favored lost by small margins, too. Be sure to tell your Congressmen nothing is more important than being present when their names are called when the crucial votes are cast.

Atlanta 3, Georgia

LEGISLATIVE LETTER
January 3, 1949

To: League Members

From: Frances Blackmon, Director

Subject: Pre-view of 1949 Legislature

Election Laws

Our election machinery is enmeshed in a confusion of laws which do, however, protect many fundamental rights. Therefore, we should urge our representatives to take every care--examine and re-examine--any measures introduced which concern our election machinery. It is entirely possible that the Georgia citizen might awake some 1949 (or 1950) morning to find himself deprived, through new technicalities, of some fundamental right or rights.

The greatest safeguards of democracy are two in number. One, a large number of citizens of voting age registered and voting. Two, a secret ballot so these citizens may vote their convictions without fear of reprisal--economic or otherwise.

Indications are that legislation will be introduced which, if passed, will wipe more than a million voters from the voting lists. And this legislation will make it difficult for large numbers of them to get back on the voting list. A "registration fee" and biennial registration will be required of Georgia voters by these measures, it is feared.

When your December GEORGIA VOTER--which urged that the voters' lists be protected--went to press, the League thought the issues of the registration fee and biennial registration (opposed by the League in the 1947 session and killed in the House) would not come up again. But it now seems they will. A registration fee and/or biennial registration would result in a smaller and therefore more easily controlled voters' list.

An attempt will probably be made, as in 1947, to change the Georgia Constitution so registrars can test citizens trying to qualify to vote (if the attempt to wipe out the voters' lists is successful, this would be everybody who wished to vote) on their understanding of "the duties and obligations of citizenship under a republican form of government". In addition citizens would be required to be of good moral character and able to read or write any paragraph of the United States or Georgia constitutions in order to vote.

The League does not know now whether a citizen who wanted to challenge the registrars' decision as to whether he "understood the duties and obligations of citizenship under a republican form of government" would have recourse to the courts.

Neither is it known whether the registrars in one place would have a different interpretation of what these "obligations of citizenship" are from the registrars in another.

Representative Charles Smith of Haralson County has stated he will introduce a bill including a plank on the League's emphasis program--primaries paid for from public funds and candidates' fees set by law. Too, he plans to provide that the democratic executive committees be elected by the people. In the past the people have, by party rule, elected members of these committees but the party rules adopted in July, 1948, failed to include this provision.

It is entirely in the hands of political party leaders as to whether or not these committeemen who handle the primary elections are elected by the people.

Another important feature of the Smith bill will be the abolition of the rotation system for election of state senators. Under this rotation system voters (in all counties except Fulton, Effingham, and Chatham) have no choice in the selection of the person who represents them in the Senate four years out of six.

Home Rule

Representative Charles Gowen of Glynn County is preparing legislation to repair the damage done his 1947 Municipal Home Bill through amendments by its opponents. Care will be taken it is believed to protect the seven municipalities which have voted home rule under the 1947 law.

As far as we know, no one is preparing a measure to secure county home rule--i. e., local county affairs handled by county rather than the state legislature.

The League is preparing a pamphlet on Home Rule which should be available in the near future.

Penal System

The Board of Corrections is asking for additional funds for 1) a building program which would include an institute for incorrigibles, an institute for juveniles, and a prison for women; and 2) an adequate industrial program for prisoners.

The League is heartily in favor of a state-wide probation system. We understand Representative Pierre Howard of DeKalb County is working on a bill in this connection. However, the League does not indorse or support a bill until after it has studied the measure and we have not as yet seen a copy of this bill.

For your convenience, items on the League's emphasis program which receive priority on our efforts are listed:

1) An election system made modern, integrated and enforceable and including:

   (a) Secret ballot (voting machines where population warrants);

   (b) Protection of citizens' access to the ballot;

   (c) Expense of primaries paid from public funds and candidates' fees fixed by law;

   (d) Protection of the permanent registration law.

2) Home rule extended to all cities and counties.

3) A penal system built with emphasis on rehabilitation and including an adequate probation and juvenile court system.

Jury Service for Women

The Association of Women Lawyers is sponsoring a measure for jury service to women. It is our understanding that the bill this time is mandatory--that is, a woman is required to serve on a jury as a man is required to serve except for a good reason. The League endorses the principle of such legislation. Jury Service for Women is an item on the League's platform but emphasis-program items have priority.

Appropriation Bill

The State Auditor is pleading that the legislature pass an appropriation bill in 1949. Under the law, if no appropriations bill is passed, the State continues to operate under the appropriation bill last passed. Georgia is now operating under the 1943 appropriations bill (plus appropriation of some extra revenue in 1946.)

Education

The Georgia Education Association is spearheading a movement for legislation for the "Minimum Foundation Program". The League did not take a stand on this but asked those candidates in the 1948 primary who favored the "Program" how they proposed to finance the additional 30 to 40 million dollars which would be required of state funds. According to newspaper reports, Roy Harris has been retained as counsel for the Minimum Foundation Program. Mr. Harris is a former speaker of the House of Representatives of Georgia.

If all its energy is not taken for the Minimum Foundation Program we understand the G.E.A. is interested in the following: a constitutional board for the Teacher Retirement Fund; a law to permit the executive secretary of the Georgia High School Association to come under the provisions of the Teacher Retirement System; some legislation in connection with tenure and hospitalization.

In addition to the above, measures are expected to be introduced by administration leaders which will enable Georgia to participate in the plan for regional schools at the college and graduate levels.

Health

Under the Hill-Burton bill passed by Congress, the Federal government will participate in the cost of constructing hospitals in Georgia up to the sum of 3 million dollars annually. While all except federal aid could be financed locally, it is expected that the appropriation bill will provide that 3 million dollars be made available from state funds, so that only one-third of the cost will need to be financed locally.

A bill to provide for pre-marital examinations of all applicants for marriage licenses, and to require every resident of Georgia who marries outside the State and returns to Georgia to conform to the provisions of the bill, will be introduced. The Junior Chamber of Commerce is sponsoring this bill, we understand.

An enabling act to empower the state departments under a merit system--now Health, Welfare, and Labor--to provide a retirement system will be introduced. We understand this bill will require no special appropriation but each department within its own budget will set it up as it can.

The 1947 legislature repealed part of the vital statistics law providing for the recording of marriages and divorces--nobody seems to know why. An effort will be made to get this part of the law reinstated.

Highways

It is believed that a bill setting up a constitutional highway board will be one of the administration bills. There will probably be some difference of opinion as to whether the legislature or the governor does the appointing of board members if such a board is set up. Representative Knox Gholston may also introduce a bill in this connection.

Judiciary

(See "Jury Service for Women") We understand Holcombe H. Perry of Albany is chairman of a committee of the Georgia Bar Association which is preparing the legislation the Bar Association plans to sponsor in connection with the selection of judges. We have not seen a resume of this but were told it is a combination of the Brunswick plan and the Missouri plan. Charles Bloch of Macon heads a committee working to further perfect the new supreme court rules.

Labor

It is generally believed that Labor will seek to get some modification of the anti-labor laws passed by the 1947 legislature. Today's papers carry an account of Supreme Court decision on anti-closed shop legislation. (One of the 1947 laws was against the closed shop).

Safety

It is believed that the bill passed to prevent a repetition of the Winecoff tragedy by the 1947 legislature will be changed.

Taxes

Up to this date, there has been an undercurrent of talk about the sales tax. The Farm Bureau group has openly advocated this tax. The Governor is committed by campaign promises to refer any tax measure to the people "by direct referendum".

The League had long advocated the setting up of a tax revision committee to get expert knowledge for a revision of Georgia's tax laws. Such a committee was set up in 1947. All of the tax laws of the state were compiled into one volume by this committee and several pieces of research done. The Act setting up the committee provided that the committee

> "...study and suggest a program for the revision of the tax structure of the State government and...propose to the General Assembly amendments to the tax laws which would strengthen, equalize, clarify, simplify, and promote efficiency in the operation of the laws by which the State of Georgia can realize the tax income necessary to render the services that the people desire" and "...submit its report in the form of bills, amending, abolishing, or establishing tax laws and their method of operation."

This committee held its first meeting with the new Governor in early December at which time it voted to continue to do research until after the General Assembly could meet and submit a referendum to the people. It seems, therefore, that the people will be asked to vote on tax measures (or at least a type of tax) without any advice or guidance from the committee. The reason given for this was that at the time the committee was set up, there was no talk or knowledge of the additional money which the Minimum Foundation Program and other expanded services would require.

Welfare

The Welfare director stated that that department might have a legislative program later but did not have one at the present time. Indications are, however, that more funds will be asked for the Milledgeville Hospital.

Veterans

Other than the statements published that the Governor would try to get legislation for free lifetime drivers' licenses for all honorably discharged veterans of World Wars I and II, we do not know of any specific measures at this time which will be introduced for veterans.

Masked Parades

We understand that legislation will be proposed to prohibit public parades by masked groups.

URGENT MESSAGE!

We assume you are as concerned as we over the dangers latent in the registration bill now before the Georgia legislature. For within the next few days our entire election system may be re-cast for years to come. An analysis of the bill is attached.

As you probably know, the bill is being rushed through the House. It will reach the Senate most any day now. A public hearing before the Senate committee to which it will be referred has been requested. Watch the papers for it. Better still ask your Senator to keep you posted.

We trust you will leave no stone unturned in getting people to attend the hearing and speak out in defense of their ballot.

LEAGUE OF WOMEN VOTERS OF GEORGIA

Johnnie Hilbun

21 January 1949

(Miss Johnnie Hilbun)
President

"Too much blood has been shed in the upward struggle for the franchise to regard lightly the right to vote."

35- Suffrage, Georgia

STATEMENT OF THE LEAGUE OF WOMEN VOTERS OF GEORGIA BEFORE SENATE COMMITTEE ON STATE OF THE REPUBLIC, FEBRUARY 2, 1949, ISSUED BY ITS BOARD OF DIRECTORS AND PRESENTED BY ITS PRESIDENT, MISS JOHNNIE HILBUN OF AUGUSTA.

For more than a quarter of a century, now, we have been among those working to perfect the machinery through which Georgia citizens exercise the democratic right of self-government. During these years we have seen many such safeguards enacted into law.

Still, the state today is confronted with glaring need for further improvement in its voting procedures. And in recognition of this the League of Women Voters has placed the election system in top position on its program of work. The organization advocates that the system be "made modern, integrated and enforceable" and that it include: 1) the secret ballot and the use of voting machines where the population warrants; 2) protection of the citizens' access to the ballot; 3) expenses of primaries paid from public funds and candidates' fees fixed by law; and 4) protection of the state's permanent registration law.

While we realize the need for improving the state's election machinery, we are deeply concerned, Gentlemen, over certain legislation now before the Georgia General Assembly which we contend would in effect wipe out many of the gains Georgia has made in this direction. We refer particularly to the bill under consideration this afternoon, House Bill 2.

We are glad to see, however, that the House struck out the provision for a $1 registration fee, and removed certain other features of the bill before sending it over to you.

One of the announced purposes of this legislation is to keep the voters' lists up to date by a system of re-registration. But let us call to your attention, Gentlemen, that there are laws already on our statute books for automatically and effectively purging these lists with a minimum of work.

Let us review these provisions. The tax collector in each county is charged by law to suspend, between January 1 and March 1 of each year, any voter who has not voted in two years and to mail him a notice of this suspension. If by April 1 the voter has not asked to be continued on the voters' list, the tax collector is required to remove that voter's name from the list. Hence present law demands that the voters' lists be thus revised every year. This statute was enacted in 1945 and became effective in 1947.

Then there is the further provision for keeping these lists up to date which has been carried over into the bill before you. Under it the tax collector, the ordinary, and the superior court clerk, all elected officials, are required by law to search the records of the county before April 20 of each "general election year" (which means every year since the law now provides a general election in August of odd-numbered years and in November of even-numbered years) and to furnish the county registrars with a list of persons who have died and those apparently disqualified under the State Constitution for reason of idiocy, insanity, or crime. The registrars are then charged by law to leave such names off the final lists given to election managers (unless legal proof is furnished that any such person is not disqualified).

So we maintain, Gentlemen, that with these provisions, already on the statute books, we are adequately prepared for keeping the voters' lists up to date and do not need the enactment of periodic re-registration for that purpose. We have watched this system of automatic purging in several Georgia counties, of various size, and know it operates efficiently, economically, and with a minimum of effort. What we need is ENFORCEMENT.

In addition, we trust you will look well into the enormous cost entailed in a complete re-registration of the voters of this state. And we refer not alone to the public funds involved. We refer as well to the cost in time and money to the individual citizen and also to business firms as a result of the interruption of the work of their employees.

The bill before you provides that this enormous re-registration operation shall be undertaken every four years. True, quadrennial re-registration is more convenient to the voter and less expensive to all concerned than biennial re-registration, as the bill provided before it was amended in the House. But, if we are to adopt such a system for keeping our voters' lists up to date, is not four years too long to leave these lists unrevised?

Gentlemen, we urge your serious consideration of the wisdom and value in retaining the permanent registration and automatic purging provisions of our present law. Why go to the expense and trouble of continuous re-registration for purging these lists when we have adequate and automatic provisions for doing this now?

We realize that the registration forms and other procedures set out in House Bill 2 are designed to give a degree of uniformity throughout the state to our voter qualification tests and thereby endeavor to meet the uniform principle laid down by the recent decision of a U. S. District Court on Alabama's Boswell Amendment. However, we raise the question whether one can actually expect to meet the principles set forth in this decision with tests, as prescribed in House Bill 2, which leave such wide room for personal judgment as is afforded in whether something is done "intelligibly" or "unintelligibly", "legibly" or "illegibly", and "satisfactorily" or unsatisfactorily.

Regarding the bill's procedure for qualifying voters, we note that the time set for a hearing before a Board of Registrars shall not be less than one day nor more than ten days from the date of the notice of that hearing. We further note that failure to appear shall constitute cause for dismissing an applicant's application and that he shall not be permitted to apply anew during the four-year period set up in the bill unless he can prove the notice was not received.

We call this to your attention for we believe you, too, will consider one day insufficient time between the date of a notice and the holding of a hearing, particularly since such notices may be mailed.

Further, we would like to see a time limit set for Registrars to complete their tests of applicants who have registered in time to qualify for a coming election, so as to afford a rejected applicant time to test the denial in the courts before that election; and requirement made that any such appeal to the courts which has been filed by a given time be passed on judicially prior to the election. An exception should of course allow continuous purging of persons who have died or have become disqualified for other causes specified in the State Constitution.

Finally, let us speak to the provision in House Bill 2 that would annul the registration of all those now qualified as electors.

To vote is undeniably the most elemental right of a citizen in a democracy and the most elemental responsibility as well. The state has reason for pride in the fact that today Georgians are showing greater interest and participating more in their government than ever before. Witness the election just past, when this administration, and you, Gentlemen, were elected by one of the largest popular votes ever cast in this state.

The bill before you would withdraw the right to vote from the more than a million Georgians who are now so qualified and require each to re-apply before he could be re-enfranchised. You know what the result will be. It has been predicted by responsible authorities that the voters' lists will be cut at least in half.

You will agree, we believe, that a large vote is democracy's greatest safeguard; that the smaller the number of voters the easier it is for a controlled minority to hold the balance of power. Accordingly, the duties of citizenship should not be made difficult.

We earnestly urge that the present voters' lists be left intact, that the state's permanent registration law be not destroyed. In other words, we urge that the qualification tests proposed in House Bill 2 not be made in effect retroactive.

In summary, Gentlemen, 1) we ask you to preserve our present voters' lists and not require each would-be elector to go through the ramifications of presenting himself again for re-registration. 2) We ask that if the procedure for qualifying voters as proposed in the bill is adopted, it be made to apply to future applicants only. 3) We call your attention to the scant notice of hearing before Boards of Registrars permitted under the bill and to the fact that a rejected applicant is not assured time for appealing to the courts before an election denied him is held. And 4) we call your attention to the laws now on our statute books that provide an accurate and efficient method for automatically purging the voters' lists with a minimum of cost and effort to both state and public. And we ask you to consider well before destroying this method of keeping the voters' lists up to date and replacing it with a system of periodic re-registration that would be costly and would place a heavy and unnecessary burden upon the citizens of this state who take seriously their duties of citizenship.

But above all, Gentlemen, it is our earnest hope that you will see fit to report House Bill 2 with the recommendation that it do not pass.

Gentlemen:

We are seeking a professional person to fill a vacancy on our national executive staff. The person must be willing to live in the Washington Metropolitan Area.

The position which we are seeking to fill is titled national program specialist. As one of the 15-member professional staff for the League of Women Voters of the United States, this particular program specialist would be primarily responsible for all phases of the Washington headquarters work of the League's program item -- the "development of human resources," i.e., the political and governmental issues in the area of "equality of opportunity in education and employment." This item roughly covers the broad area of human resources development, including national poverty programs, manpower programs, education, civil rights in education and employment, and regional economic development. The specific duties include analyzing in depth national legislation and policies which the League expects to support or oppose; briefing the national Board of Directors of the League on such legislation and policies; following closely the status of bills in Congress; working with representatives of other nongovernmental organizations interested in legislative goals similar to the League's; helping to draft and edit letters and statements of members of the national Board of Directors about the League's position; writing detailed background information (pamphlets and articles) designed for the general League membership and the outside public.

The job also calls for keeping abreast of the general subject matter relating to the areas of human resources as well as what the local Leagues are doing and what their opinions are in the field of human resources and briefing the national Board of Directors on these matters.

A great deal of the staff person's time is devoted to research and writing -- pamphlets, leaders' guides, articles for periodicals, etc. It is therefore essential that the person be proficient in background research and writing for a lay public and have a knowledge in depth of the broad program areas.

EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR
Miss Dixie Drake

The position also requires the ability to work with volunteers (i.e. members of the national Board of Directors as well as state and local leaders and the general member) and to execute plans that have been made by the Board of Directors and the program committee made up of Board members with particular proficiency or interest in the field. The staff person must be disciplined enough to plan and execute a great deal of her own work without detailed guidance. We believe at least five years of professional experience is a must.

The starting salary for this position would be from $9,000.00 to $11,000.00, depending on the ability and experience of the person involved.

Should you know of anyone who might be interested, we would be pleased to have her name or if you wish you might ask the person to get in touch with me.

Your cooperation in this matter will be appreciated.

Sincerely,

Dixie Drake

CIVIL RIGHTS BILLS, 1958

Jan. 24, 1958 - E. Celler introduced civil rights bill embodying Part III, stricken from Civil Rights Act of 1957.

Feb. 10, 1958 - S3257 (to effectuate and enforce constitutional right to equal protection of the laws, and for other purposes, introduced by Douglas with Humphry, Ives, Hennings, Case, Morse, Allott, Newberger, Dirksen, McNamara, Javits, Clark, Pastore, Beall, Carroll, Proxmire) See Congressional Record blip for complete bill and discussion.

Aug. 26 - Javits and Case try new amneuver to force civil rights legislation onto Senate floor; they filed a discharge motion to try to pry the bill out of the Judiciary Committee.

This maneuver continued during recess with Celler reportedly having half of 219 signatures needed by Dec. 21, 1959. The House bill now does not contain Part III, registrars and anti-lynching provisions.

Nov. 18 - Atty-Gen Rogers said the administration may ask Congress for federal anti-lynching law.

CIVIL RIGHTS LEGISLATION - 1960

Jan. 6 - In an almost unprecedented action, Speaker Sam Rayburn invited House members to step up and sign a "discharge" petition as the quickest way to get a civil rights bill before the House. This action would by-pass the House Rules Committee, which has blocked such legislation. A petition to discharge the stalled bill has been on the House desk since last Summer; it hav 106 signatures, 219 are needed.

Jan.11 - Sen. Javits introduced 5 new civil rights bills:

1. recommendation for appointment of federal registrars to insure Negro voting rights.
2. permit Atty-Gen. to represent in lawsuits individuals who charge civil rights violations (Modification of Part III)
3. federal anti-lynching bill
4. require preservation of voting records and availability for federal inspection, require state voter registrars to fulfil their duties

Janl 14
(Eisenhower reaction to federal voting registrars at news conference: I don't even know whether it is constitutional. He prefers the c. r. bill he suggested last year.

Jan. 24 - Senate Rules Committee resumed hearings on voting rights legislation; set Feb. 5 as closing date.

Jan. 25 - N. Y. Times published list of 146 Democrats and 30 Republicans signing discharge petition; total 176.

House Republicans explained they were against discharge petitions "in principle" because they do not believe in circumventing House rules.

Jan. 26 - Atty-Gen Rogers proposed (news conference and draft Bill), for Administration, federal court "referees" instead of "registrars". Two advantages:
1. buttress right to vote in state as well as national elections
2. not only register voters where courts find pattern of discrimination, but also, at request of court, follow up cases to make certain that referee-registered voters are allowed to vote and have votes properly counted.

Jan. 38 - Sen. L. Johnson said toady changing the Constitution was the "proper" way to abolish the poll tax. Urged Senate to approve pending amendment "by overwhelming vote"

Jan. 29. House Rules Committee called to meeting for Monday, Feb. 1, by chairman to discuss civil rights bill lodged there since last August.
Hearings opened Feb. 4.

Jan. 31 - Administrations proposal for court appointed referees endorsed by Javits. discharge petition now has 190 of necessary 219 sigs.

Feb. 2 - Senate approved, 70-18, omnibus amendment that would affect five states, by outlawing poll tax (72-16, Holland of Fla.)

2. grant suffrage to District of Columbia to vote for President, Vice president, and delegates to House, as many as it would have as state, and to have such power as Congress conferred on them. (Keating)

3. permit Governors to appoint members of House of Representatives if majority of House killed in a nuclear attack. (Kefauver)

This poll tax amendment was approved after the Senate rejected Javits proposal to substitute a statute for the Amendment (50-37)

Feb. 11 - CCR staff director Tiffany said today the Commission is not opposing Justice Department's plan for Federal court appointed referees.

Feb. 16 - Senate majority leader Lyndon Johnson laid before Senate a minor bill affecting an Army post in Missouri and said it would be the vehicle on which civil rights amendments would be considered.

Sen. Russell moved to postpone consideration and debate until Feb. 23. Defeated 61-28. Senate filibuster begins.

Civil rights Amendment proposed as "riders" to House bill in Senate (Dirksen Amendments).

CIVIL RIGHTS LEGISLATION: 1961

Jan. 1 - Two battles to change procedures of the House and Senate began Jan. 2 as the 87th Congress met; the Kennedy administration's legislative program is vitally involved.

Democratic liberals have been meeting in caucus. The attitude of Speaker Sam Rayburn is likely to be decisive; so far no commitment.

Both Republican and Democratic platforms in the 1960 election pledged revision of Senate rules. A compromise proposal (Sen. Keating) would permit majority closure, but would grant each side on a pending issue a further 50 hours of speaking time.

Question to be debated is whether Senate is a "continuing body" with rules that carry over.

Proposals given out to press are: 1) enlarging rules committee by two or three; 2) revising 21-day rule; 3) election (rather than appointment) of two powerful committees: the policy and steering committees.

Jan. 2 - Rayburn announced he favors purge of Colmer and perhaps Winstead (Miss.) and Whitten (Miss.) or even all five southern Democrats who openly opposed the Democratic ticket (Williams (Miss.) Passman (La.).

Jan. 3 - 87th Congress convened.
Mansfield elected majority leader; Humphrey asst. leader, Senate Democrats
Dirksen, leader, Kuchel, whip, Republicans

House: McCormack, leader for Democrats; Halleck leader for Republicans

Nixon opinion (not ruling) after three-hour bombardment: Senate has right to adopt or change its rules at the opening of each session if the majority wishes.

SENATE: Anderson (& T. Morton) submitted resolution for reducing 2/3 requirement for cloture to 60%, or 3/5.

Humphrey & Kuchell offered motion to reduce required votes to 51, a constitutional majority, after 15 days. Their proposal insured 100 hours of debate before a filibuster could be forcibly stopped. (Precedent for majority closure: used in Senate before 1808.)

Bill introduced embodying Kennedy's proposals for aiding economically depressed areas.

Jan. 9 - Hearing on President-elect's cabinet appointees scheduled.
Senate filibuster continued through 5th day.

Jan. 10 - Mansfield & Dirksen moved question of rules changes be sent to Rules Committee. No agreement to vote obtained, and Senate adjourned without voting. Motion necessary, leaders said, so Senate could proceed with important business and take up rules change later in session.

Jan. 11 - Assignments to Senate committees ratified.

Vote 50 - 46 to send two proposals to Rules Committee. For D - 32; R - 18; Against D - 31, R - 18.

Rayburn announced plan to enlarge House Rules Committee rather than purge Colmer. Three members to be addes to 12 member committee: 2 Ds and 1 R.
Delay assures that Lyndon Johnson will be presiding when issue comes before Senate again.

Russell preferred tabling and killing motion, but feared he did not have necessary 3/5 vote.

Jan. 17 - Javits & Keating introduced 7 bills to

1) S-481, authorize atty-gen to initiate civil rights suits
2) S-484, provide technical & financial assistance to state and local school districts seeking to desegregate
3) S479, establish a statutory commission on equal job opportunity under government contracts
4) S-483, extend life of CCR indefinitely
5) S-480, establish 6th grade education as proof of literacy for voting purposes
6) S-482, make unlawful deprivations of rights under 14th amendment
7) S478, eliminate poll tax

Cooper: a bill authorizing U. S. atty-gen to intervene in school desegregation cases instituted by individuals.

Moss: three bills to
1) extend life of CCR
2) provide that 6th grade edu satisfy literacy requirements for voting
3) abolish poll tax

Jan. 18 - Rayburn in bat tle with Smith won formal endoresment at caucus of House Democrats for enlargement of Rules Committee. Rules Committee instructed to bring legislature to floor; Smith of Va. to introduce it.

Jan. 23 - Republican House minority in joint D-R conference voted against liberalizing Rules Committee

Jan. 24 - Resolution to increase Rules Committee membership reported to floor Committee vote 6 - 2, Smith and Colmer against.

Jan. 28 - Rayburn rejected compromise, fight continues. Smith had proposed guarantee Rules Committee, if retained in present form, would clear for House consideration the five items on Kennedy's priority list of domestic legislation:

1) development of depressed areas
2) expansion of housing programs
3) higher minimum wage with broader coverage
4) health insurance for aged
5) federal aid for public schools

Rayburn wanted guarantee ALL administration bills would be cleared at his request.

Jan. 30 - White House pressure added to battle. Criticism from N.C. re "blackmail" from Interior Dept. re proposed federal saline water conversion plant at Wrightsville, Beach.

Jan. 31 - House Rules Committee enlarged from 12 to 15 members; vote 217 - 212 For: D - 175, R - 22; Against D - 64, R - 148.

Feb. 1 - Southern Democrats who voted against Rules Committee change charged "reprisals" in committee appointments. Committee on Committees denied charge.

Feb. 2 - Sources close to House leadership privately acknowledged charge true; Rayburn denied.

Feb. 4 - Pilcher (Ga.) said fight against enlarging rules committee was sponsored by U. S. Chamber of Commerce, Am. Farm Bureau, and special interests to block Pres. Kennedy's program. Cited other expanded committees in past and said civil rights not issue.

Feb. 6 - Republicans choose 3 conservative members for rules committee. Now 4 conservative southerners and 8 moderate to liberal democrats.

May 9 - Clark-Celler six point proposal to speed school desegregation. (Pres. Kennedy appointed last year to put Democratic platform promises in form of legislation.)

1) require every school board operating segregated public schools to adopt desegregation plan within six months and file with Sec. of Welfare. Provision for court enforcement. Plans to provide compliance no later than start of 1963-64 school year.
2) make CCR permanent agency
3) provide judicial and administrative remedies against discrimination by business or labor unions in hiring, firing, or promotion
4) empower atty-gen to bring civil injunction suits in federal courts to prevent denial of civil rights because of color, race, or creed; authority now to file only to prevent denial of voting rights
5) eliminate poll tax as requirement for voting in federal elections
6) eliminate literacy tests as requirement for voting

May 10 - Salinger said, "The President has made it clear that he does not think it is necessary at this time to enact civil rights legislation." He added the administration was working on what it could accomplish under existing law.

Aug. 29 - Extension of CCR arguments; no vote in absence of quorum

Aug. 22 - attempts to attach civil rights rider to CCR extension bill made. Javits and Keating proposed amendments to 1) eliminate poll tax restriction on voting, and 2) authorize atty-gen to initiate civil rights suits, including school desegregation. Tabled and killed (Mansfield)

Senator Clark, to prove Senate rules archaic, forced 45 minute delay for 1) reading of preceding day's proceedings, 2) quorum call, 3) other delays within his rights. Hopes for change during next session.

Sept. 13 - House and Senate voted a twoyear extension of CCR by approving appropriations bill 300 - 106. Bill gave CCR $888,000 to finance during current fiscal year, same amount as last year.

Bill sent to President for signature

Sept. 18 - Senate defeated by 43 - 37 cloture petition aimed at changing rules and curbing filibusters. Against D - 28, R - 15; For D - 26, R - 11.

Then voted 47 - 35 to table Mansfield resolution on rules changes.

CIVIL RIGHTS LEGISLATION: 1962

Jan. 22 - Congressman Ryan spoke to his bill, H.R. 7143, giving CCR authority to issue court enforceable cease and disist order against person or orgnization guilty of civil rights discrimination in fields of employment, insurance, labor relations, housing, and public accommodations.

Jan. 25 - Sen. Mansfield introduced Administaation civil rights legislation (bill drafted by Justice Dept.) to declare completion of 6th grade education is sufficient test of literacy for purpose of voting. One section of the bill states that Spanish-speaking citizens have ample Spanish-language news sources and are well qualified to vote even if they do not speak English. The 6th grade qualification would apply to Puerto Ricans who are now required to pass liberacy test in English.

(Est. 200,000 Puerto Ricans in N. Y. unable to vote last fall because of language requirement)

Jan. 31 - By vote of 61 - 25, literacy test bill sent to Senate Judiciary Committee. VP Johnson's ruling had been challenged by Sen. Javits, who appealed the ruling requesting the bill be sent to Rules Committee. Vote to table Javits' appeal sent bill to Judiciary. (For tabling: D 44, R 17; Against D - 13; R 12)

March 24 - Debate on literacy bill begun in House.
March 14 - Senate opened civil rights debate when Mansfield ~~moved for action on poll tax~~ amendment by attaching it to Hamilton resolution.
March 26 - After 10-day southern filibuster, (6 hours per day), Senate shut off debate 62 - 15 rollcall vote by calling for consideration of minor bill, a resolution to make the New York City home of Alexander Hamilton a national shrine. S.J. Res. 29. Voting against: 14 southern Democrats and Hickey of Wyoming.

Holland, joined by Mansfield and Dirksen, offered as a substitute his proposal for a Constitutional Amendment that would prohibit the imposition of poll taxes as a qualification for voting in federal elections.

A move to outlaw poll tax by simple legislation is also pending. Javits plans to offer similar bill.

March 29 - Vote approving poll tax amendment 77 - 16 after 11-day filibuster.

Sent to House Judiciary Committee.

Five states retain poll tax as requirement for voting: Arkansas, Alabama, Mississippi, Texas and Virginia. Arkansas recently supported poll tax in a referendum, as a revenue-producing measure for public schools.

Literacy test was principle administration c. r. bill; Atty-Gen. Robt. Kennedy called literacy tests the principal device for discrimination in voting. The bill was uannimously supported by CCR and endorese by 1960 Republican platform.

April 12 - Completing two weeks of hearings on literacy test bill in Senate Constitutional Rights Subcommittee, the bill was endorsed as "inadequate but small and significant step" by: Roy Wilkins, NAACP; Lawrence Speiser, ACLU; Joseph L. Rauh, jr. ADA.

Now 18,500,000 Negro Americans, about half are living in South - 10% of total population. Under voting rights laws passed in 1957 and 1960, Justice Dept. has brought 23 actions in the South, 14 under Atty-Gen. Kennedy, all instituted in Mississippi, Louisiana, and Alabama.

? Dept. of Urban Affairs bill killed?

April 24 - Mansfield introduced pending bill (private relief refunding $2,001.43 to Texas farmer: Norman) as vehicle for latest civil rights move. The bill had recently been made the Senate's unfinished business. He then planned to offer the literacy bill as an amendment because the original bill is still tied up in the Senate Judiciary Committee. Russell called for quorum and it could not be obtained, so Mansfield adjourned Senate.

April 25 - Mansfield introduced literacy test bill and filibuster began.

19 states require literacy tests (6 are Southern)

Alabama	Georgia	Mississippi	Oregon
Arizona	Louisiana	New Hampshire	Rhode Island
California	Maine	New York	South Carolina
Conn.	Mass.	North Carolina	Washington and Wyoming
Delaware		Oklahoma

Other essential bills, including appropriations bills which should clear before July 1, are blocked.

"filibuster" is the Spanish equivalent of the Dutch word which literally meant "free booter" and referred to buccaneers who used to raid the Latin American coasts. It has come to mean "talking to death."

April 26 - Dept. of Justice only filed 25 civil rights voting cases to prosecute; Commission on Civil Rights, out of total of 613 complaints only 390 fall in "sworn" category.

April 27 - Sen. Holland offered amendment to narrow scope of literacy bill by making it apply only to literacy requirements. (Bill as written would apply to tests for "literacy or otherwise").

Sen. Dirksen blocked two Senate subcommittees from holding sessions during "debate".

Douglad-Javits proposal tabled

Senate passed Holland amendment

The AFL-CIO in April joined other organizations in urging Congress to defeat the Holland proposal for a Constitutional Amendment to abolish the poll tax and urged substitution of the Douglas-Javits federal statute.

May 7 - ACLU backed literacy test right-to-vote bill.

May 9 - By vote of 53 - 43 (For: D 30, R 13; Against: D 30, R 23) Senate refused to invoke cloture against two-week-long southern filibuster on literacy bill.

Vote to table bill defeated 63 - 33 (Against tabling: D 38, R 26; For: D 23, R 10)

Majority leader asked unanimous consent to limit debate on bill; Russell objected, and this opened filibuster again. Mansfield filed second cloture petition.

May 10 - Sen. Case offered two amendments

1. direct amendment to HR 1361, Norman bill (constitutional amendment to 15th amendment)
   a. 6th grade education qualification to vote
   b. Congress shall have power to enforce

2. Amendment in substitute for Mansfield-Dirksen substitute for that bill same

May 14 - Spokesman for Justice Dept. estimated that 750,000 Negroes are barred from voting or even registering to vote by unfair literacy tests; the Dept. has 26 court cases pending on this issue.

May 14 - Second attempt to limit debate (cloture) on literacy test bill; rejected by Senate 52 - 42 (D 30, R 22; D 31, R 11). Same margin of loss as last week.

May 15 - On Motion introduced by Mansfield, a vote to formally set aside the literacy bill after three weeks of debate carried 49 - 34 (D 30, R 19; D 22, R 12)

May 16 - Senate resumed consideration of bill HR 1361 for relief of Norman

May 20 - CCR reported last fall that in 129 southern counties where Negroes are a substantial part of population, less than 10% are registered to vote. In 23 counties in five states no Negroes are registered.

May 22 - Amendment to abolish poll tax, in federal elections only, reported out of committee.

May 27 - Under consideration in Congress: two measures approved by House Education & Labor Committee.

1. would deny Federal aid to segregated landgrant colleges (set up under Morrill Act of 1862) $1,600,000 fed funds go to land grant colleges in 16 southern and border states that still maintain segregation.
2. would cut funds to segregated elementary and high schools in impacted areas 17 southern and border states have received $357,393,069 in last 11 years for school construction; more than half has gone to segregated schools.

May 25 - Sen. Humphrey revealed response to enquire of Director of Census requesting population statistics relating to Senate vote on cloture.

46 Senators for (incl pairs)	Pop.	111,121,000
54 Senators against "		67,439,000

(totals to nearest thousandeth)

June 19 - House passed by voice vote and sent to Senate a bill to designate next Jan. 1 as "Emancipation Proclamation Day."

June 21 - House Democrats defeated two Republican attempts to write a civil rights amendment into the Administration's farm bill. Vote 142 - 106. Along party lines; three Negro Democrates voted against the bill too.
(Farm bill would provide federal loans to help farmers create recreation areas to supplement their incomes.)

Similar amendment, presented a few minutes later, defeated by voice vote.

July 27 - Sen. Dodd introduced bill (S 3576) to protect right of citizens to vote in federal election and to facilitate prompt judicial review of alledged denials of such rights, by requiring that literacy tests begiven in writing and meet certain other requirements. Referred to Judiciary Committee.

Other bills in this area: S 430, S 2750, S 2979)

Aug. 14 - Vote for cloture passed 63 - 27. to curtail debate on Kennedy's communnications's satellite bill. (Cloture approved only 4 previous times out of 27 attempts, the last occasion in 1927 on a matter concerning prohibition.) Only 15 of 25 southern senators voted to resist cloture; 5 were absent.

Aug. 17 - Vot of 54 - 37 to table Morse-Clark antidiscrimination bill to prevent racial discrimination in employment practices of private corporation created by satellite bill. (Am. tel and tel, part owners with 4 subsidiaries now subject to 18 to 20 complaints to equal job opportunities committee.) (For tabling D - 3, R 24; Against D 28, R 9(

Jan. 9 - 88th Congress opened.

In return for keeping the membership of the ~~Senate~~ Rules Committee at 15, the liberal bloc capitulated on the return of the 21-day rule for release of bills favorably reported by House Committees and a seven-day rule for bills returned from House-Senate conference.

Vote on membership of House Rules Committee 235 - 136 (50 of 98 Dixicrats in House voted with majority for retaining 15 members).

A Republican amendment to increase Republican membership from five to six was defeated 249 - 183.

Senate postponed action on antifilibuster moves until after Jan. 14.

Jan. 14 - Sen. Anderson offered middle-of-road (S Res. 9) resolution that would allow three-fifths of senators voting to put time limit on debates.

Sen. Humphrey offered substitute motion to let Senate impose debate limitation by vote of majority (51 of 100 members).

Sen. Miller introduced identical amendments to both proposals to require that cloture could not be invoked unless the approving vote included a majority of members of each party.

Russell objected, which postponed bills for one day.

Jan. 15 - Southern senators began filibuster; Senate in session less than 6 hours.

Jan. 30 - Sen. Mansfield submitted a preposed agreement for a vote on Jan. 31 on a motion to table the liberal bloc's pending constitutional claim that they have a right to alter rules by a straight majority. (Humphrey's substitute motion). (Mansfield's original porposal, modified because of southern opposition, would have permitted a straight vote on constitutional question itself.)

Jan. 31 - Senate voted to table Humphrey motion 53 - 42. Senate adjourned until 2/4.

Sen. Anderson's proposal now comes up for discussion (three-fifths); technically the filiguster continues

Feb. 5 - Humphrey sent to Senate desk a round-robin petition signed by 51 Senators favoring some strengthening change in rules (Rule 22). The petition avoided commitment to any specific antifilibuster rule. (signers listed, attached)

Feb. 6 - By vote of 92 - 5 motion to table antifilibuster proposals was defeated by unlikely combination of northern liberals and southerners.

Feb. 7 - On petition to invoke cloture (debate on Anderson proposal) Vote of 54 - 42 against, after 4 weeks of filibuster (18 days last session) Senate adjourned until Feb. 11. Liberals forced roll call on adjournment, losing 64 - 33. 18 Democrats and 1 Republican were able to kill rules change, and thus civil rights legislature.

Feb. 28 - President Kennedy's Civil Rights message to Congress. He urged Congress to pass legislation

1 - Voting: to ~~xxxxx~~ expedite voting suits in Federal courts and to let temporary referees register Negroes while suits pending, and (to apply to federal elections only) to prohibit use of different tests or procedures in registering voters, such as discrimination in administering tests or qualifying examinations or disqualifying for minor errors; specify that a 6th grade education constitutes "presumption of literacy".

2. Schools: to provide Federal financial and technical aid to school districts that are desegregating; delete "separate but equal" phrase from law governing land grant colleges.

3 -CCR: to extend life of CCR for "at least 4 more years and to expand its role by statute so it could serve as "a national civil rights clearing house providing information, advice, and technical assistance to any requesting agency, private or public.

He promised strong executive action in all civil rights fields: antidiscrimination provisions in government contracts, civil service employment; full equality in use of national parks and recreational areas. Noted that 13 states have ratified anti-poll tax constitutional amendment and urged other states "to take prompt action on this matter."

Aftermath of filibuster bitterness:

charges that V.P. Johnson responsible for failure of liberals to win rules change; Southern Democrats in cahoots with western Democrats in a deal to block civil rights bills in exchange for protection of 27½ per cent oal depletion allowance; ~~Be~~ Democratic leadership may have used committee assignments to punish Democrats who fought change of rules.

March 28 - Republicans Javits (plus Keating, Case, Fong, Scott, Kuchel, Beall -- and Saltonstall on CR Commission portion only) introduced civil rights bills:

1. make CCR permanent
2. to prohibit public accommodations discrimination by hotels, motels, or other public places engaged in lodging and interstate commerce
3. authorization for damage suits and for Atty-Gen to initiate injunction suits
Javitts 4. eliminate "separate but equal" from Hill-Burton hospital construction act.
Kuchel 5. school desegregation bill to require all public schools adopt within 180 days a desegregation plan and put at least first step into effect in next school year.
Case 6. Three bills aimed at eliminating discrimination in employment Keating 7. voting rights bill
Scott 8. Two housing bills
(Javits principal sponsor of the above bills on justice)
~~Muller~~

Rept. Muller proposed two bills in House:
HR 543--to prevent discrimination in public places and public transportation against members of Armed Fordes; HR 548--to protect right to vote in federal elections.

(See Joan Grant article and quotes from Dist. Court Judge J. Skelly Wright, attached)

May 14 - Sen. Javits abandoned effort to tack on to pending feed grains bill a rider to give Atty-Gen. right to sue in civil rights cases.

May 3 - Rep. Fitts proposed five House bills to: empower Civil Rights Commission or Atty-Gen. to eliminate discrimination in schools, housing, boting procedured, banking and insurance, public accommodations, employment and unions; permit Justicd Dept. to protect persons endangered or harassed because of their participation in civil rights movement; make CCR a permanent agency with power to investigate discriminatory practices and obtain court order to stop discrimination.

May 24 - Committees of House and Senate at work on variety of civil rights measures. MORE THAN 90 civil rights bills have been introduced in House. Hearing in progress before Judiciary Committee.

Celler, chm. of committee, said confident of House passage of bill to: 1) extend CCR for four years; 2) establish 6th grade education as base for literacy test in voting; 3) appointment of federal registrars in any community showing 15% of eligible Negro voters prevented from registering.

Also, considering old 1957 Section III giving Atty-Gen. authority to initiate injunctive proceedings to prevent civil rights deprivations in voting, housing, employment, and use of public accommocations--and any other areas.

SENATE: two principal bills being considered in Senate C. R. Subcommittee are: 1) sixth grade literacy test; 2) extension of CCR

May 23 - Dodd and Cooper sponsored two civil rights bills:
1) granting initiative to Atty-Gen to sue to prevent discrimination in school attendance and in use of public accommodation.

Celler said he will close current hearings on C. R. legislation on June 13.

Feb. Equal Employment Opportunity Act (H.R. 405) now before subcommittee of House Education and Labor Committee.

RACIAL DISCRIMINATION IN EMPLOYMENT:

Proposals for Corrective Action

Notre Dame Conference

February 8-11, 1963

January, 1963

Daniel H. Pollitt
Professor of Law
University of North Carolina

I.

INTRODUCTION

Item. In 1946 Jackie Robinson broke the color-bar in organized baseball and became the idol and inspiration of athletic-minded Negro youth. By 1962, eight of the top ten batters in the National League were members of the Negro race.

Item. On the centennial of the Emancipation Proclamation, Governor Terry Sanford announced the formation of the North Carolina Good Neighbor Council with a two-fold mission: (1) to encourage merit employment without regard to race, and (2) to urge youth to become better trained and qualified for employment. The Governor stated that "Reluctance to accept the Negro in employment is the greatest single block to his continued progress and to the full use of the human potential of the Nation and its States".[1]

Item. The R. J. Reynolds tobacco company recently integrated its modern $32,000,000 Winston-Salem plant. Negro forewomen supervise the work of white employees, and the only signs of segregation are the rest rooms, still kept separate under North Carolina law. Officials report that the workers at the 115-acre industrial complex "responded well to desegregation," and this comment is borne out by the remarks of white and Negro employees who work side by side on the same machine, share the cafeteria line "like salt and pepper," but generally, though not always, tend to segregate at the tables.[2]

Item. Negroes Step Up Use of Boycotts to Back Drive for Better Jobs. A & P Is Hit in Philadelphia; Campaigns Start in Detroit, Baltimore and New York. So reads the headline to an article summarizing the "selective patronage" technique originated by the Philadelphia Negro clergy nearly three years ago.[3] A & P is the twentieth company directly affected by the Philadelphia program, all of whom ultimately have met the Negro demands. Some concede that in retrospect

they are not entirely unhappy. An oil company reports that prior to the boycott there were few if any Negro job applicants because "No intelligent Negro will apply to a lily-white company because he doesn't want to get turned down. Since the boycott," continued the spokesman, "we're now getting some crackerjack Negro salesman" and sales have been stronger. One Negro minister commented in explanation that "The Negro community speaks with its dollars to show it has no resentment."

Item. Discrimination in Cook County (Chicago) can be conservatively computed to cost $70 million per year. So testified the Director of the Cook County Department of Public Aid. This is the amount spent for the Aid to Dependent Children program, one designed to take care of children whose mothers have been deserted by their fathers. Almost all the recipients of the aid program in Chicago are Negro women who came to Chicago from the South some 15 or so years earlier, and who remain on the program for an average time of between two and three years. The director of the program testified to a Congressional Committee that the principal reason for this was the unavailability of employment for Negro girls and women:

> The white woman whose husband dies or disappears usually finds work; the Negro woman in the same predicament is denied work; she has one and only one job possibility available and that is day-work -- the dismal, grinding drudgery of finding, not one, but five or six different jobs, then accommodating herself to the diverse personalities of five or six different employers, and then dragging herself home with one of the lowest wages being paid in today's market. In addition, even before she considers the bleak prospect of day-work, she must contrive to make suitable arrangements for the care of her children.[4]

Item. Mayor Stan R. Brookshire of Charlotte, North Carolina recently called upon the business community to help the Negro help himself by providing better employment opportunities. "Second-class citizens," he said, "are a liability and a drain upon the resources of the community. Because of them our per capita income is low and our governmental and welfare costs are high." The Raleigh News and Observer editorialized favorably upon this call for action with the comment that "second-class citizens mean a second-class South for everybody in it."[5]

The above random-selected items illustrate the tragic waste of Negro potential, the community burden of job discrimination, the growing unrest within the Negro community, and a determination by thoughtful political and industrial leaders to rid America of its "second-class" heritage.

Despite encouraging but isolated "break-throughs"[6] the Negro remains at the bottom of the economic pyramid. Used to the run-around, fearing rebuff, lacking incentive, denied fair union representation, closed from job and training opportunities, his is the job with the broom and shovel, with pay approximately half that of the white.[7] The johnny-come-lately in most industries, he is the first to be fired and he is the victim of every cyclical, seasonal, residual, technological, ethnic, and economic maladjustment of the economy.[8] Moreover, his prospects are worsening, not getting better. Factory "automation" has resulted in one white man with a machine doing the work done a few years back by twenty, thirty, or forty blue-jeaned Negroes.[9] Changes in working conditions have denied the Negro jobs which were once his exclusive province. The locomotive fireman that once shoveled coal was Negro; the fireman that now tends the diesel engine is usually white. Changes in social customs have also adversely hit the Negro. The Negro artisan once had a near monopoly in the Southern building trades, but more and more he is relegated to work in the "Negro" community. Census reports for ten Southern states reveal that from 1920 to 1950 Negro carpenters declined from 23% to 10% of the total; painters, from 25% to 13%; bricklayers, from 54% to 37%; and plasterers, from 66% to 57%.[10] And the decline is accentuating with the decrease in apprenticeship opportunities.

The employment problem is not confined to any one region. In North Carolina, over 90% of all Negroes (but less than 30% of all whites) employed through the State Employment Security Commission in 1959 were placed in "service" or "unskilled" jobs.[11]

In California, a Congressional Committee received undisputed testimony that Negroes were virtually excluded from all jobs as bellboys in Los Angeles and San Francisco hotels, from jobs as waiters, from the San Francisco bottling industry (except as strikebreakers), from all but the most menial jobs on the railroads, from the maritime industry (except in the "stewards department"), among the longshoremen, from the white-collar and craft jobs in the movie industry, from the printing, building and construction trades industries, from the petroleum industry (with few exceptions), from white-collar positions in the retail stores, and even from the better paying jobs in agriculture.[12]

Similar testimony was made about job discrimination in Illinois. William Karp, chairman of the Committee on Merit Employment in the Chicago Association of Commerce and Industry, testified that a study of over 100,000 job orders for white collar jobs showed that 98% of them were "restricted" as to race.[13] He further testified that top representatives of the Meat Packing Industry denied "pen" jobs to Negroes on the theory that they "laugh, sing, and dance and distrub the cattle."[14] N.A.A.C.P. representatives cited job discrimination in Illinois by chapter and verse. The following typifies the testimony of Dr. Lucien H. Holman, State President of the Illinois Conference of the N.A.A.C.P.: "In Aurora a few manufacturing plants under UAW and other union contracts hire Negroes on a generally fair basis... On the other hand, there are a number of companies that do not hire qualified Negroes. They are Richard-Wilcox Manufacturing Co., the National Brush Co., Sears, Roebuck & Co., ...and Thor Equipment Co. The Aurora Chamber of Commerce has passed the following resolution... "Resolved, that the Board of Directors...

declare it to be a policy that all members are encouraged to voluntarily maintain merit employment practices..."[15]

The situation in New York is not much better. Professor Eli Ginzberg of Columbia University testified that the big employment opportunities for Negroes since 1940 have been in the semiskilled industrial jobs, the jobs hardest hit by automation.[16] Representatives of the N.A.A.C.P. cited the specifics of job discrimination, for example: "In the city of New York, the major industry, as a matter of fact, the basic source of manufacturing in this city, is the garment industry. Negroes still work here on the lowest economic levels, unskilled jobs and the lowest paid jobs."[17] Otis E. Finley, Jr., of the National Urban League, told of a survey in a slum area of 125,000 people, mostly Negro, where a sampling of the youth population showed that roughly 70% of the boys and girls aged 16 to 21 were out of school and unemployed. "Too many of these young people are able but frustrated In other cases, the spark of ambition has been all but snuffed out."[18]

II.
PROPOSALS FOR ACTION

This mass betrayal of the American Dream, the national denial of the individual's right to be, has been condemned from many a rostrum[19] and pulpit,[20] from street-corners[21] and from national political conventions.[22] Remedial proposals have come to us from the city hall,[23] state houses,[24] and from the White House in Washington, D. C.[25] The national problem of racial job discrimination has been particularized, and the current situation in the various areas of racial discrimination are discussed below.

A. Federal Employment.

The federal government maintains the nation's largest payroll, employing approximately 2.3 million civilian employees.[26] Since 1940 the appropriate Congressional statutes have mandated merit employment without regard to race, creed, or color,[27] and Negroes, denied private employment, have flocked to the government in disproportionate number. They are found, again in disproportionate number, clustered in the lower grades of the civil service. For example, in Los Angeles approximately 14% of the total population, but over 55% of the Postal employees, are Negro. The explanation given for this is simple: "Most of the Negroes come to the Post Office because it is hard for them to get employment anywhere else."[28]

Yet only 14% of the supervisors in the Los Angeles Post Office are Negro (generally found in "Negro" sections of the city) and there are many complaints of discrimination in up-grading and promotion, viz: "There is the case of a clerk of Japanese extraction who bid on the position of general clerk, foreign records unit, airport mail facility, a level 5 position. Placed No. 2 on the list according to the specifications of the job, and seniority, Clerk Tsukahira did not receive the courtesy of an interview. The No. 4 man was selected.[29]

There is no question but that much remains to be done if the theory of "merit" employment is to become an everyday fact of governmental operation. The United States Commission on Civil Rights reported in 1961 that "patterns of Federal employment...do not differ significantly from local employment patterns," and further stated that recent improvements in the federal employment situation were paralleled by similar improvements in the private employment situation.[30]

Under the personal leadership of President Kennedy,[31] the top governmental officials have made a determined effort to stamp out discrimination in federal employment.

All agencies made a survey of their own employment patterns to (1) spot discriminatory practices, and (2) serve as a bench-mark for future surveys.[32] Each agency appointed a Deputy Employment Policy Officer with the fixed obligation to concern himself with minority employment problems.[33] A complaint procedure has been strengthened, and those complaining of job discrimination are sometimes provided with counsel from the Department's legal staff.[34] The Civil Service Commission and many of the agencies have sent high-ranking representatives to "sell" federal employment to the graduates of leading Negro colleges.[35] The agencies have barred discrimination in agency-sponsored recreational programs, and some of the agencies (Post Office and Veteran's Administration) have notified all field stations that management will not deal with employee unions maintaining segregated locals or which practice any other form of discrimination.[36] The Treasury Department appointed the first Negro professor at the Coast Guard Academy.[37] All agencies have made progress reports to the President's Committee, thereby ensuring that some action will be taken to further the President's Executive Order. The report of the Department of Justice, briefer than most, is representative of them all:

> "Shortly after taking office, the Attorney General reviewed the numbers of minority personnel employed by the Department. The statistics showed that a very small number of Negro lawyers had been employed by the Department in responsible positions.
> "Mr. Kennedy directed that a study be made to determine the causes. This disclosed that at least one major cause was a lack of applications particularly from qualified Negro lawyers.
>
> "In May 1961 the Attorney General wrote letters to the deans of approximately 50 leading law schools asking for the names of qualified Negro lawyers of their acquaintance, and of qualified Negro law students who would be interested in a career in the Department. The letter stated that the Department did not employ on the basis of race but was seeking lawyers of ability to serve in it particularly as career employees; that the Attorney General was anxious to take some steps to break down the race barrier which had apparently existed...
> "Affirmative steps were also taken with respect to the field offices of the United States Attorneys.... Two Negro United States Attorneys were appointed and a substantial number of Assistant United States Attorneys and Deputy Marshals who were Negroes.

"...In early 1962 Maceo Hubbard, a career lawyer in the Department, was appointed as Employment Policy Officer....

"A new complaints procedure was recently instituted...."[38]

The big problem lies in transmitting the spirit of Washington to the field offices. Within some areas of Government employment "racial discrimination is deeply entrenched and widely practiced."[39] Moreover, even a conscientious field director, especially one policing a statute--such as the minimum wage law or the National Labor Relations Act--unpopular with the vested community interests, might hesitate to risk the effectuation of his program by hiring Negroes to positions where they deal with the outside public.[40]

Those who would resist the desegregation of federal employment find a handy justification in the "rule of three." Appropriate statutes require that the Civil Service Commission maintain a roster of eligible employees (resulting from an open examination) and that federal agencies fill their vacancies from among the highest three persons on this roster.[41] An illustrative abuse of the "rule of three" was recently presented to a Congressional Committee:

"In California, Negroes are discriminated against in civil service employment. One Negro female, after passing the test for clerk-stenographer, in San Francisco, with scores above 90 in shorthand, typing, and general clerical aptitude, was called in by nine different agencies for interviews and each time the job was given to another one of the 'top three names' on the roster. The applicant had prior civil service experience and some 7 years of secretarial experience.

"Several of the interviewers told the applicant that she was 'over-qualified' for the job, inasmuch as she had a college degree in secretarial science. In one case the interviewers told applicant, 'I just don't feel you would be happy in this job.'"[42]

Discretion in employment, especially at high levels, is undoubtedly required when job efficiency demands an intense and intimate interchange of ideas, which interchange may be dammed by personality difficulties. It is doubtful that the "rule of three" provides this necessary discretion. In any event, the necessity for a "rule of three" is dubious when the job effectuation does not require continued intimacy of intellectual exchange. Most federal employees can and do dictate a memo to anyone sent from the secretarial "pool," regardless of a potential personality conflict. Similiarly, most federal employees can and do work in harmony, office-to-office or desk-to-desk, with persons they choose not to see after office hours.

It follows that there is much to commend in legislative action abolishing the "rule of three," the device which makes discriminatory employment practices possible. Lacking such legislative action, the Civil Service Commission could minimize its harmful potential by giving less weight to the "oral," as contrasted with the written, examination. Or, additionally, the Civil Service Commission could require a written explanation of why the agency selected the second or third person, rather than the applicant first on the list.

Recent innovations requiring only administrative determination--a periodic head count of minority group employees, the addition of Employment Policy Officers to look for trouble spots, an expedited complaint procedure, the permeation of a spirit from on high to make progress in this area--may make the Congressional mandate of "merit employment" a felt reality.

The United States Civil Rights Commission has recommended, in line with the 1960 Republican Party platform,[43] that "Congress grant statutory authority to the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity."[44]

B. Federal Contract Employment.

The United States government is the world's largest purchaser. It contracts with mines for the purchase of metals; with manufacturers for the fabrication of airplanes, missiles, ships, clothing, shoes, and other munitions of war; with farmers for the food set before the soldiers, the patients in the Veterans' Administration Hospitals, the school children who receive "hot lunches"; with universities for the supply of knowledge and skills; with utilities for the service of electric energy; and so on, almost infinitum. Lightbulbs, ink, books, automobiles, desks, new buildings, maintenance and repair services, telephones, radios, pocket knives, candy, chewing gum, and entertainment services, all are purchased in sizeable quantities by the federal government. In fiscal 1961 between $25 and $30 billions were expended for federal contracts; and ten million persons were employed by the 100 largest defense contractors and subcontractors alone.[45]

Anxious that the money it spends not be utilized to perpetuate racial job discrimination, the federal government has, since 1941, adhered to a "fair employment" policy. In that year, President Roosevelt established a Fair Employment Practices Committee, with its initial assignment being to ensure "merit" employment in the "defense" industries.[46] The FEPC came under Congressional fire, and in 1944 an amendment offered by Georgia's Senator Russell was tacked on to the annual Independent Offices Appropriation Act, providing that no appropriation could be allotted to any agency established by executive order and in existence for more than one year "if the Congress has not appropriated any money specifically for such agency...or specifically authorized the expenditure of funds by it."[47] The next day, the FEPC was granted a specific appropriation for the current fiscal year, but in the following year, 1945, it was told to liquidate its affairs. It issued its final report and went out of business on June 28, 1946.[48]

In 1951, following the outbreak of hostilities in Korea, President Truman issued a series of Executive Orders directing certain government agencies to include non-discrimination clauses in their procurement contracts. Truman also established a Committee on Government Contract Compliance, whose primary duty was to study and assess the effectiveness of the existing program. This committee began operations in April, 1952 and issued a report the following January with the change in administration. It noted that the "non-discrimination" clause was "almost forgotten, dead and buried under thousands of words of standard legal and technical language in government procurement contracts."[49]

President Eisenhower, on August 13, 1953 declared the public policy to be one of promoting "equal employment opportunity for all qualified persons employed or entitled to employment on government contracts." He established a Committee on Government Contracts under the leadership of Vice President Nixon to keep an overall eye on the program operation. The committee concerned itself primarily with education and persuasion, and not much was achieved. A survey of representative cities in 1961 by the U. S. Commission on Civil Rights disclosed that "in most industries studied, patterns of Negro employment by federal contractors conformed to local industrial employment patterns... In Atlanta, the two automobile assembly plants contacted employed no Negroes in assembly operations. Except for one driver of an inside power truck, all Negro employees observed were engaged in janitorial work -- sweeping, mopping, or carrying away trash."[50] No company was ever placed on an "ineligible" list, or denied a contract, on the basis of its employment policies, no matter how flagrant the violation of the "non-discrimination" contractual provision. At times, there was outright defiance. Some public utility companies flatly refused to furnish the government with necessary services rather than adopt a policy of non-discriminatory employment. The government backed away from this challenge by "waiving" the non-discriminatory requirement. Similarly, in some industries, such as textile, where the percentage of government contract business is not large, the management would rather forego this business than change longstanding employment practices. Thus, shortly after the announcement of the new Kennedy executive order, the Wall Street Journal reported that "textile manufacturers have practically stopped bidding on military contracts for the past few weeks."[52] It is ironic, and almost unbelievable, that public utilities, monopolies chartered by the public and regulated by the state, and the textile industry, hard hit and seeking additional tariff protection, should be able to defy an important government policy.

On March 6, 1961, President Kennedy issued Executive Order 10925 designed, like its predecessors, "to promote and ensure equal opportunity for all qualified persons, without regard to race...employed or seeking employment with the federal government and on government contracts."[53] The standard non-discrimination clause now requires all contractors to "take affirmative action to ensure that applicants are employed, and the employees are treated...without regard to their race, creed, color, or national origin." The "affirmative action" contemplates, as a minimal, that all "want ads" must specify that all qualified applicants will be considered without regard to race.[54] The President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity, under the leadership of Vice President Johnson, was established to monitor this program and given authority to enforce the program by use of these sanctions, some of which were denied its predecessors:

1. conference, conciliation, mediation, or persuasion;
2. publicizing the names of contractors or unions which have either complied, or failed to comply;
3. recommending action by the Department of Justice, including injunctions against individuals or groups interferring with compliance and criminal proceedings against those furnishing false information;

4. terminating all or part of any contract for failure of the contractor to comply; and
5. requiring that contracting agencies of the government refrain from entering into new contracts with any non-complying contractor until he complies.[55]

The Johnson Committee has entered into a "Plans For Progress" program with many of the top industrial concerns of the nation. Typically, the ten point plan for progress initiated in the case of Lockheed Aircraft Co. binds the employer to:

1. provide all management levels with an up-to-date statement of its non-discrimination policy;
2. "aggressively seek out more qualified minority group candidates" for many job categories, including engineering, technical, administrative and clerical positions, and factory operatives;
3. instruct State Employment Officers and other recruitment sources that job applicants are to be referred irrespective of race, creed, color or national origin;
4. re-analyze its available salaried jobs to be certain that all eligible minority group employees have been considered for placement and upgrading;
5. re-examine personnel records of minority group employees to determine whether those qualified and eligible can be used for filling job openings;
6. institute a program of familiarizing universities with employment needs and opportunities, to include hiring teachers who are members of minority groups for summer work and arranging plant tours for teachers and student counselors;
7. support the inclusion of minority group members in all its apprenticeship and other training programs including supervisory and pre-supervisory training classes;

8. encourage the establishment of vocational training programs and the participation of minority group employees in such programs;
9. maintaining eating facilities, rest rooms, and recreational facilities on a nonsegregated basis; and
10. institute periodic checks to insure that the policies and objectives of the plan are being carried out.

How well is the Kennedy program functioning? A study of North Carolina federal contractors, issued six months after the Kennedy program was initiated, indicates that the program got off to a very slow start indeed.[56] The survey concerned the recruitment, the employment, the promotion, the on-the-job training, and other personnel practices of 262 North Carolina firms holding government contracts. In essence, the employment patterns in these government-contract firms paralleled those in firms without government contracts. This is how the survey summarized its findings:

> There appears to be a significant under utilization of Negro manpower in North Carolina firms holding contracts with the federal government. The patterns of under utilization are reflected in the significant number of firms that hire no Negroes, in the occupational levels at which Negroes are hired, in the narrow and limited representation of Negroes in white-collar positions, in the upgrading patterns, and in the use of Negro female resources.[57]

The almost uniform refusal of North Carolina federal contractors to utilize Negro manpower, either at all or at a level above the menial job, is significant for these reasons: (1) firms hiring Negroes reported in overwhelming number (77%) that their Negro employees were as efficient or better than their white employees; (2) those companies which utilized Negroes reported in overwhelming number (90%) that they had no difficulty because of this;[58] and (3) the largest proportion of firms indicated that they have no minimum educational requirement for hiring in the lower occupational categories, so the extent to which Negroes are wholly excluded is not a reflection on the lack of qualifications on the part of Negroes. Probably the most significant disclosure for present purposes is the following:

> Twenty-one of the 22 firms without Negro employees indicated that they have never discussed the matter of employing Negroes with any federal agency. Eighty-seven of the 100 responding firms that do employ Negroes indicated that they had never discussed the problem with any federal agency.[59]

Thus it would appear that six months after the Kennedy program was launched in Washington, it still remained a dead letter in North Carolina.

It is not fair to place all the blame on management. Unions must take the onus of sharing in and even initiating racial discrimination. Numerous unions have denied Negro employees a right to union membership, and thereby deprived them a voice and a vote in the policy decisions which affect their wages, their hours, and other conditions of employment.[60] Many other unions have established separate and segregated locals for Negro employees where they have scant more voice than if totally excluded, and still others have negotiated contracts wherein Negro employees were relegated, as a class, to unskilled and unpromotable positions. These separate racial seniority lines in collective bargaining agreements are especially galling. Negroes are hired in classifications designated as "common laborer," or "yard labor," or "non-operating department," or "maintenance department," and limited to promotion within the departments. Thus, a Negro with 20 years seniority can look forward to being promoted from "toilet attendant" to "sweeper."[61]

These union practices violate the Supreme Court's requirement that unions represent all employees "without hostile discrimination, fairly, impartially, and in good faith."[62]

These union practices have been recently condemned by the AFL-CIO Executive Council: "Resolved, That racially segregated local unions be eliminated by national and international unions affiliated with the AFL-CIO";[63] and by the 1961 AFL-CIO Constitutional Convention: "We welcome the nationwide agreements entered into by the Bricklayers...the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, and other unions with respective national contractors' associations, to make non-discrimination on account of race, creed, color and national origin a standard to be observed in all apprenticeship training programs. Many of the major industrial unions have adopted "Plans for Progress to eliminate these practices."[64]

The National Labor Relations Board, which has original jurisdiction over these practices, recently indicated that it would countenance them no longer. Denying a discriminating union the normal protection against the necessity of participating in a representation election during a reasonable contractual period, the Labor Board, citing the Supreme Court school decision,[65] made this comment:

> Consistent with clear court decisions in other contexts which condemn governmental sanctioning of racially separate groupings as inherently discriminatory, the Board will not permit its contract bar rules to be utilized to shield contracts such as those here involved from challenge or otherwise appropriate election petitions. We therefore hold that, where the bargaining representative of employees in an appropriate unit executes separate contracts, or even a single contract, discriminating between Negro and white employees on racial lines, the Board will not deem such contracts as a bar to an election.
> We are not confronted in this proceeding with any attack on the validity of the Intervenor's (discriminating union's) outstanding certification in consequence of the separate contracts which it executed on the basis of race. Although the execution of such contracts is in patent derogation of the certification and would warrant revocation of the certification, we deem it unnecessary to take such action at this time in view of the impending election which we here direct.[66]

In short, union discrimination in industrial employment opportunities seems on the wane. "It is unfair and inaccurate to leave the impression that President Kennedy's Committee has not made progress," Duane Greathouse, a vice president of the United Auto Workers, testified to a Congressional Committee.

> Through the work of the Committee in these few months there are Negroes in technical skills in the oil industry in the St. Louis, Mo. area where there had been none before. There are minority group members now employed as seamstresses in a South Carolina textile plant for the first time. There are Negro tobacco workers in integrated production operations in North Carolina. Government contract facilities in Nashville, Tenn., and in Nevada, are employing integrated work forces because of the Committee's efforts. Negroes are now employed in skilled jobs on electronics in Dallas, Texas--jobs previously closed tight against them. The Committee opened government contract jobs for Negro carpenters in Miami, Fla.[67]

The President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity now has the "tools."[68] If it can get the money and the staff, all it needs is determination to get the job done.

The United States Commission on Civil Rights correctly points out that the Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity, established only by executive action, is necessarily limited in budget and legal authority. Its jurisdiction over labor unions is indirect and tenuous. Therefore, the Commission recommends:

> That Congress grant statutory authority to the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity or establish a similar agency to encourage and enforce a policy of equal employment opportunity in all federal employment and all employment created or supported by government contracts and federal grant funds."[69]

C. Federal Grant-in-Aid Employment

Grants-in-aid to state and local government, to public institutions, and to private nonprofit institutions are a method of federal subsidization of employment second in importance only to government contracts. In fiscal 1961 the federal grant-in-aid programs cost the taxpayers (white and Negro alike) some 7.5 billion dollars.[70] The largest expeditures went for the construction of hospitals ($154 million), schools ($63.3 million), public airports ($83.3 million), highways ($2.7 billion), and public housing, slum clearance, and urban redevelopment (over $300 million).[71]

Thousands upon thousands of skilled construction jobs were thereby created, and by and large they were denied to Negroes. The U. S. Commission on Civil Rights made a field study of employment created by these grants-in-aid programs in the cities of Detroit, Baltimore, and Atlanta. The results of this study showed: (1) Negro employment was greatest at the unskilled level, in every case outnumbering white employment at that level on these jobs. (2) As the skill level increased, the percentage of Negro employment decreased. (3) There was little difference in Negro employment patterns among the three cities surveyed; although in Atlanta almost all the skilled Negroes worked in the trowel trades (cement finishers, bricklayers) while in Detroit and Baltimore skilled Negroes were working as carpenters, operating engineers, and labor foremen as well.[72]

During the 1930's, the New Deal "pump-priming" make-work programs--the WPA, the PWA, the NYA, etc.--contained non-discriminatory clauses. The Unemployment Relief Act of 1933, for example, provided that "in employing citizens for the purpose of this Act no discrimination shall be made on account of race, color or creed;"[73] and the Hatch Act of 1939 contained a proviso making it unlawful to deprive any persons of employment or other benefit made possible "by any Act of Congress appropriating funds for work relief or relief purposes, on account of race, creed, color, or any political activity."[74] When Congress failed to ban discriminatory hiring practices, as in the National Industrial Recovery Act of 1933, those administering the public works program issued regulations designed to end job discrimination, and punished the violators.[75]

During the 1960's, we find no such general governmental policy in grant-in-aid employment. The Housing and Home Finance Agency and its constituent agencies which administer the Low Rent Housing and the Urban Redevelopment programs, construe grant project agreements to be government contracts within the meaning of Executive Order 10925 and accordingly require a "non-discriminatory" clause in all contracts.[76] The Urban Redevelopment Program has three steps: first, the local government, with federal financial assistance, acquires and clears slum areas; second, the local government, without federal assistance, then improves the site; and third, the cleared land is then sold to private contractors for redevelopment. The non-discriminatory clause applies only in the first process, i.e., acquiring and clearing the land.

The Federal Aviation Agency has, since April 1961, required non-discrimination in employment created by airport grant projects,[77] but due to staff limitations leaves enforcement to the local sponsors.[78]

The Bureau of Public Roads, within the Department of Commerce, which administers grants for highway construction has, since 1941, inserted a "short-form" non-discriminatory clause in all contracts. The Bureau has not adopted the more meaningful provisions of the Kennedy Executive Order "for fear that any change in the clause would call attention to it."[79] There is no machinery for its enforcement.

The Department of Health, Education and Welfare, which administers the hospital and impact-school construction programs, makes no requirement that employment on these projects be non-discriminatory.

The federal grants-in-aid are conditioned upon compliance with specified standards, and certainly for purposes of equal protection have no different standing than the ordinary government contract.[81]

In 1961, Congressman William Fitts Ryan introduced a bill, H.R. 7143, to establish the Civil Rights Commission as a permanent agency with broad powers to end employment discrimination on federal grants-in-aid programs. The Civil Rights Commission has recommended that:

> the President issue an Executive Order making clear that employment supported by federal grant funds is subject to the same non-discrimination policy and the same requirements as those set forth in Executive Order 10925 applicable to employment by government contractors and that both the "federal contract" and "federal grant-in-aid" anti-discrimination programs be given congressional sanction and approval.[82]

D. The State Employment Services.

A special grant-in-aid program, created by the Wagner-Peyser Act of 1933[83] is the Federally subsidized "national system of public employment offices." The function of these offices is (1) to assist unemployed workers in finding jobs, and (2) to assist employers in securing qualified workers. In fiscal 1961, approximately $107 million in Federal grants were spent for this purpose.[84]

The persons in these local offices man the gates: they can open the door to "merit" employment, or, alternatively, they can bar Negro access to the better paying jobs. Indications are that they do the latter.

The North Carolina Employment Security Commission operated in 1960 on a budget of $5,555,960.00, entirely paid for by the Federal government. The headquarters agency in Raleigh employed a total of 10 Negroes: one maid, two elevator operators, five janitors, and two janitor messengers. Some thirty-nine Negroes (and 681 whites) were employed in a professional capacity throughout the state to serve the Negro applicants for employment. When a job order is received, it is sent to the offices manned by whites if the order specifies white employees. If the order specifies Negro employees, it is handled by the Negro-manned divisional offices. If the order does not specify race, it is sent to either the white or Negro office according to "local knowledge of customary hiring requirements." In case of doubt, the employer is requested to indicate a preference. The result of this system is that in 1960, 95,576 whites were directed to employment, largely in professional, clerical, sales, skilled and semi-skilled jobs; and 73,473 Negroes were placed, largely in service and unskilled positions. By this system, the employer is denied both the opportunity and the responsibility to hire on the basis of merit.[85]

The experience in North Carolina is not unique. "If a known Government contractor insists on a discriminatory job order in Atlanta, it will be honored, as will a discriminatory request from a Federal agency."[86] An employee of the Michigan

Employment Security Commission explains: "I get rated by the number of people I place. If I don't place enough, I get called upstairs. Therefore, I send people to places where I think they will be employed, and this means that I send them by race."[87]

When Secretary Goldberg assumed office, the Department of Labor "determined that one objective in its relationship with state employment services, in line with the President's national policy, would be the making available of equal employment opportunities through the 1800 local employment offices. It therefore set about encouraging the states to review their staffs, giving greater understanding toward the national policy of equal employment opportunity." Additionally, the Department of Labor prohibited the processing of "discriminatory" job orders -- not only from Federal agencies and Federal contractors as was formerly the rule -- but from private employers as well.[88] But the basic cause for racial job assignment, i. e., basing promotions and allocations of funds according to the number of job placements, has not been changed.

A basic policy of the United States Employment Service is to promote employment for all applicants "on the basis of their skills, abilities and job qualifications."[89] This policy would be better effectuated if promotions and the allocation of funds were based, at least in part, according to the number of Negro job applicants placed in "non-traditional" positions. This is one of the recommendations of the United States Commission on Civil Rights:

"Recommendation. 7.--That steps be taken, either by executive or congressional action, to reaffirm and strengthen the Bureau of Employment Security policy, in rendering recruitment and placement services, of encouraging merit employment and assisting minority group members in overcoming obstacles to employment and in obtaining equal job opportunities. In this connection, consideration should be given to changing the method utilized to determine Federal appropriations to State employment offices, presently keyed primarily to the number of job placements made, to reflect other factors (such as the greater degree of difficulty and time involved in placing qualified minority group workers), so that the budgetary formula used will encourage rather than discourage referral on a nondiscriminatory basis. In addition, regulations and statements of policy with respect to the operation of State employment offices should be reexamined to insure that such regulations and statements conform to the overall USES policy of discouraging employment discrimination and encouraging merit employment.

"Recommendation 8.--That the President direct the Secretary of Labor to grant funds for the operation of State employment offices only to those offices which offer their services to all, on a nonsegregated basis, and which refuse to accept and/or process discriminatory job orders."[90]

E. Apprenticeship Programs.

A skilled trade is a must in today's job market. Technological changes and the replacement of new industries for old have been largely responsible for increased unemployment. But even in a "depressed" area like Detroit, "jobs... are going begging for lack of skilled workers to fill them."[91] The demand for skilled workers will continue to grow. It is estimated that for every 100 skilled workers the nation had in 1955, it will need 122 in 1965, and 145 in 1975: "The New York State Department of Labor indicates, in a survey of jobs in 1960 to 1970, that 46,000 additional craftsmen will be needed annually if the State's needs for skilled workers in the 1960's are to be satisfied."[92] Yet today the apprenticeship training programs are not even producing enough skilled workers to replace those who retire, and Negroes are experiencing "a major crisis in unemployment because it is almost impossible as a result of discrimination for them to make the jump from unskilled jobs being wiped out by automation to the skilled ones that the new technology creates."[93]

1. Discrimination In Building Trade Apprentice Programs.

Uncontradicted testimony bears this out. "Open access to plumbing and pipe-fitting apprenticeship controlled by the Plumbers Union is a very rare experience for young Negroes in the North as well as in the South ....

"Among the most important of the building trades craft unions is the Carpenters Union which has severely limited the opportunities of colored craftsmen by organizing segregated Negro locals (in those instances where Negroes are permitted to join) and giving them jurisdiction over areas where there was little or no construction....

"A recent study made by the Council for Civic Unity of San Francisco revealed that Negroes are not participating in the electrical, plumbing, and carpentry apprenticeship training programs in that city and that only one Negro served as an apprentice in the metal trades.

"A report made by the Michigan Fair Employment Practices Commission indicates the exclusion of Negro youth in the structural steel, sheet metal, lathers, and tile setters apprenticeship programs in Kalamazoo, Grand Rapids, and Muskegon.

"The Connecticut Commission on Civil Rights has published a study which concludes that a similar condition exists in virtually the entire State of Connecticut.

"In a study entitled 'Negro Employment Practices in the Chattanooga Area' it is found that there was an absolute ban on apprenticeship opportunities for Negroes in the building trades.....

"In Newark, N. J., where there are 3,523 apprentices currently participating, not a single Negro apprentice is to be found in electrical installation, plumbing, painting, and other building trades apprenticeship programs....

"An examination of available data makes evident that less than 1 per cent of the apprentices in the building and construction industry throughout the United States are Negro."[94]

The absence of Negroes from the construction crafts is not, as one offical of an electrical union would have it, due to the fact that "Negroes fear electricity."[95] At the end of the Civil War, 100,000 of the 1230 artisans in the South were Negroes.[96] In 1920, in 10 states of the old South, 23 per cent of the carpenters, 25 per cent of the painters, 54 per cent of the bricklayers, and 66 per cent of the plasterers were Negro.[97] Today, Negroes have a hard time getting a toehold in the apprentice programs. The reason for the total absence of Negro plumbers was explained by a Plumbers Union official, who said that the apprenticeship program -- jointly administered by the union and management -- gave priority to the sons and relatives of those in the trade:

Mr. Rhodes (Business Manager of Local No. 4 of the Plumbers Union): It is true our local union favors, gives preference to sons, employees' sons and members' sons, and the like of that, you know, kinfolks....

Congressman Pucinski: What is the reasoning ---

Mr. Rhodes. What is the reason? Well, No. 1, your membership. You have got an 800-man membership. They all have boys that want to become plumbers. And they insist that the apprenticeship committee take care of their people, their own people... After all, how could a committee tell a member that we are going to take somebody else other than his son before we take his son?

Congressman Roosevelt: Will the gentleman yield? What you are saying, though, is that a plumbers' local is the same thing as a private club or a private school ... is it right to be able to make that union into what in essence tends to become pretty much a private club?

Mr. Rhodes: That is not what we are attempting to do, or not what we are doing. We take boys other than plumbers' sons. However, we give plumbers' sons preference.

Congressman Roosevelt: But only when you don't have enough sons?

Mr. Rhodes. Well, that has happened. There were a few years back when there were not enough plumbers' sons....

Congressman Roosevelt. If a Negro did apply, and was qualified, can you tell me honestly that you think he would be given a fair chance to enter the apprenticeship training?

Mr. Rhodes. He would be processed the same as any other candidate.

Congressman Roosevelt. What is the total membership of your union?

Mr. Rhodes. 824.

Congressman Roosevelt. Is this a mixed racial union, or are they all white?

Mr. Rhodes. As far as I know, they are all white."[98]

President George Meany of the AFL-CIO testified that: "There is racial discrimination in apprenticeship and vocational training programs, and we in the AFL-CIO have opposed and do oppose it. We want it ended."[99] J. C. Haggerty, President of the AFL-CIO Building and Construction Trades Department, testified that "It would be fruitless to deny that discrimination exists in the building and construction industry."[100] Both gentlemen urged the enactment of H. R. 8219, introduced by Congressman Powell, which is designed to bar the Secretary of Labor from fostering discriminatory apprenticeship training programs. The proposed legislation has several facets.

First. The Davis-Bacon and the Walsh-Healy Act require government contractors to pay "prevailing," and the Fair Labor Standards Act requires all employers in interstate commerce to pay "minimum," wages to their employees. Each statute, however, permits the Secretary of Labor to authorize "exemptions" from the wage requirements in the case of apprentices. The proposed legislation would prohibit the Secretary of Labor from "exempting" any apprenticeship program where discrimination is practiced. This proposal would have limited impact, as only sixty-six exemptions were issued in the United States last year;[101] and in any event, former Secretary of Labor Goldberg announced that "exemptions" will not be granted to apprentice programs that discriminate.[102]

Second. The Bureau of Apprenticeship and Training, U. S. Department of Labor currently "certifies" apprenticeship programs which meet agreed-upon standards. The purpose is to upgrade the programs and assure uniformity of training. Certificates are awarded those graduating from these programs. Approximately half (160,000) the current apprentices are in a "certified" program.[103] The proposed legislation would bar the Secretary of Labor from certifying a program if it discriminates. The Secretary of Labor, by administrative action, has already taken this course.

Third. Most apprenticeship programs involve both on-the-job training and class-room work. The class-room work is supported by federal funds; and the legislative proposal is to withhold these funds from the apprenticeship programs which discriminate. There is a question as to how effective this would be in achieving its objective. Prior to 1954, when Washington, D. C. schools were segregated, most of the major craft unions utilized public schools for the class-room aspects of their apprentice programs. Subsequent to the desegregation of the schools, "many of the unions set up their own separate training facilities,"[104] and this is a trend that is nationwide, "more so where the unions have the resources to do it."[105]

A more direct approach has been taken to the problem of racial discrimination in on-the-job apprenticeship programs. The union, whose membership is closed to Negroes, is not permitted by the Courts to restrict employment opportunities to its members.[106] The Supreme Court has ruled that a union representing a majority of the employees in an appropriate craft or unit may not use its bargaining power to the detriment of minority Negro employees within the craft,[107] or to the detriment of Negro employees in a sister craft or unit. "Bargaining agents who enjoy the advantages of the Railway Labor Act's provisions must execute their trust without lawless invasion of the rights of other workers."[108] All these decisions concerned job restrictions by unions against Negroes then on the job. However, the National Labor Relations Act requires unions to give "fair representation" to "employees"; job applicants have come within the meaning of the term "employees" in other contexts; and a good case has been made for the proposition that it is an unfair labor practice for a union, controlling job access, to discriminate against job applicants on the basis of race.[109] The issue, however, has not yet been decided, although it is now pending before the National Labor Relations Board.[110] Should the Labor Board deny statutory authority to rectify the situation, federal legislation modeled on the Ohio Code (making it unlawful for any labor organization to discriminate against any person, or limit his employment opportunities, on the basis of race, color, religion, national origin, or ancestry)[111] seems appropriate.

The Civil Rights Commission does not go this far. It recommends only that "Congress amend the Labor-Management and Disclosure Act of 1959 to include in title 1 thereof a provision that no labor organization shall refuse membership to, segregate, or expel any person because of race, color, religion, or national origin."[112]

2. Discrimination in Industrial Apprenticeship Programs. Thus far, the discussion has concerned discrimination in the building craft apprenticeship programs administered (at least jointly) by the craft unions. But an equally invidious type of discrimination is found in the industrial apprenticeship programs administered by management.

"In industrial apprenticeship training programs the opportunities for Negroes appear to be no greater than in the construction crafts."[113] Thus, a study of the auto industry's apprenticeship training program reveals that "Chrysler Corp. had 350 apprentices in its Detroit area plants, not one of whom was a Negro. General Motors Corp. showed a slight improvement in that they had one Negro apprentice out of the 289 apprentices in training in its Detroit area plants. However, at the General Motors Institute in Flint which enrolls 2,400 students in a five-year work and training program, there is not a single Negro student."[114] "In the apprenticeship training program conducted jointly by the Automotive Tool & Die Manufacturers Association and the UAW, there are approximately 370 apprentices, all white. Only one Negro has ever participated in this program."[115]

Private employers who discriminate in industrial apprenticeship programs can be reached by the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity if they have Government contract employment. The typical "Plan for Progress" requires the employer to "support the inclusion of minority group members in all its apprenticeship and other training programs."[116] If the private employer does not have a government program, his discriminatory practices can be curbed only by enactment of a Fair Employment Practices Law.

F. Vocational Education.

The greatest resources of any nation are the skill and know-how of its people. This philosophy has been embedded in federal law for many years. A subsidized program of vocational education was instituted in 1914 with the Smith-Hughes Act with the stated purposes: "To conserve and develop our national resources, to permit a productive and more prosperous agriculture, to prevent waste of human labor, to provide a supplement to apprenticeship; to increase wage earning power; to meet the increasing demand for trained workmen; to offset the increased cost of living; to serve as a wise business investment; and to promote our national security and economy."[117]

The import of vocational education as it relates to the need for highly skilled and technically trained manpower for the space age, has been underscored by the enactment of title

VIII of the National Defense Education Act of 1958 which makes provisions for area vocational educational programs "to train highly skilled technicians in fields necessary for national defense." [118]

The vocational education programs operate in the following manner: states willing to match federal funds and accept federal supervision receive grants from the federal government to help pay "the salaries of teachers, supervisors, and directors of agricultural subjects, and teachers of trade, home economics, and insustrial subjects."[119]

The Office of Education within the Department of Health, Education and Welfare administers the programs. The long-time policy of the Office of Education was "to fit persons for useful employment and, hence, training would be offered only when it was evident that those trained could reasonably expect to find employment locally. Since Negroes were denied employment in certain occupations, ... there was no use to train a Negro for an occupation in which he could not find employment; i. e., to train Negroes as electricians in most States would have been a waste of money and the time of the persons so trained."[120] Since 1948, the Office of Education has adopted the policy that "in the administration of federally aided programs of vocational education there shall be no discrimination because of race, creed, or color." However, the present position of the Office of Education is that "the Commissioner does not have the power to withhold funds because schools are segregated."[121] The result of this approach is as may be expected: Negroes are excluded, segregated, and usually placed in training for "Negro" jobs.

"In Louisiana, there are twenty-seven state supported trade and technical schools -- twenty-three for whites -- four for Negroes.... Recently I visited two trade schools in New Orleans, one for Negroes and the other for whites. The Orleans Area Vocational and Technical School, which is for Negroes, offers only seven courses. The other school... offers forty-seven."[122]

In Atlanta, "the use of segregated public schools for vocational training produces a marked difference in the types of programs available to different racial groups... At Carver School, Negroes are trained for 'jobs traditionally open to them'. These are the most menial, requiring the lowest level of skills. They are precisely the ones for which the national economy has less and less need."[123]

In North Carolina, the situation is not so extreme. A survey of nine Industrial Education Centers reveals racial segregation in some: "in at least three this includes separate courses of study."[124] Instruction is available on the basis of job opportunities, and in some instances this is construed to mean job opportunities within the community. Thus, "if it was known not to be the custom for Negroes to be employed as upholsterers in the area served by the Center" then there was not job opportunity for Negroes and they were denied the training unless a "specific job" was assured.[125] Generally, however, the stated admission policy was to exclude race as a factor. The preponderance of white students (over 90 per cent) was explained by the lack of Negro interest and qualifications. One administrator stated that he had "recently shown forty-seven Negro men through the school and invited them to take courses; that only four applied, and of these only one completed the necessary examinations and he did so poorly that he was not admitted."[126]

Lack of motivation and ability, of course, is itself the product of long-suffered discrimination. The vicious circle of discrimination in employment opportunities is clear; the Negro is denied, or fails to apply for training for jobs in which employment opportunities have traditionally been denied him; when jobs do become available, there are consequently few, if any, qualified Negroes available to fill them; and often, because of lack of knowledge of such newly opened opportunities, even the few who are qualified fail to apply.

The United States Civil Rights Commission has recommended that Congress and the President take appropriate measures to meet the manpower needs of the coming years by:

(1) Providing that, as a condition of federal assiatance, all such programs be administered on a nondiscriminatory, nonsegregated basis; and

(2) Amending present regulations regarding admission to vocational classes;to provide that admission be based on present and probable future national occupational needs, rather than, as presently interpreted, on traditional and local needs and opportunities.

Additionally, of a more positive nature, the Commission recommended action:

(3) Expanding and supplementing existing programs of federal assistance to vocational education;

(4) Providing for retraining as well as training and for funds to enable jobless workers to move to areas where jobs are available and their skills in demand; and that Congress enact legislation to provide equality of training and employment opportunities for youths (aged 16 to 21), and particularly minority group youths, to assist them in obtaining employment and completing their education;

(5) Through a system of federally subsidized employment and training made available on a nondiscriminatory basis; and

(6) Through the provision of funds for special placement services in the schools in connection with part-time and cooperative vocational education programs.

Finally, the Commission recommended "That the President direct that appropriate measure be taken for the conduct, on a continuing basis, of an affirmative program of dissemination of information:

(7) To make known the availability on a non-discriminatory basis of jobs in the Federal Government and with Government contractors; and

(8) To encourage all individuals to train for and apply for such jobs, and particularly those jobs where there is currently a shortage of qualified applicants."[127]

G. Private Employment.

All the above programs and proposals have no immediate and only indirect impact on private discriminatory employment practices. A national program--prohibiting discriminatory employment practices by employer and union alike -- is needed. Federal legislation on this score has been introduced in each Congress since the 78th and supported by religious leaders of all persuasions, constitutional authorities, sociologists, economists, businessmen, and leaders of organized labor. Every report that has issued from a House or Senate Committee has recommended the enactment of fair employment legislation.

In the absence of final Congressional action, the states have moved in. New York first, under the leadership of Governor Thomas E. Dewey, next New Jersey, and today some twenty-four of the most populous states in the North, in the North Central, and in the West have enacted some type of fair employment practice legislation.[128] This, however, is not adequate to the occasion. First, there is some doubt that the Constitution permits the application of these state laws to "Interstate Commerce."[129]

Second, these state laws have no applicability in the area of the country where the need for such laws is the greatest. Finally, the problem is national in scope as populations migrate from one section of the country to another.

National legislation is a must. As one witness put it: "FEPC is a workable, sound, tested instrumentality that is good for 110 million people in twenty states; surely, gentlemen, it is good for 180 million people in fifty states."[130] Or, to quote George Meany:

> I could speak at length about the physical loss of good brains and strong bodies we suffer because of those who judge a man by other standards than his abilities. That would be tragic enough in an era when we need every ounce of our strength, and the fullest development of our resources, to secure our nation against attack.
> But the greatest loss to America is moral and spiritual. If a citizen of this country finds his way blocked, if he cannot achieve his highest degree of usefulness, only because he is a Negro or a Jew, a Catholic or an Asiatic; because he is an Italian or a Pole; because he is thirty-five or forty or forty-five, those who are responsible for blocking him are betraying the American ideal in the eyes of the world."[131]

III

Summary and Conclusion

Is this, the year of the Emancipation Proclamation, the year for an FEPC? The defeat of those who sought to amend Senate Rule 22 and thereby avert the threat of a filibuster is not a happy harbinger of civil rights legislation. But ours is a rapidly changing world. Six years ago, there was no sputnik, and the word "Astronaut" was unknown. Five years ago Governor Faubus was an obscure southern Governor, and a liberal one to boot. Martin Luther King, Jr., was a young and obscure southern minister, with no particular mark for greatness. Three years ago, the first Negro youth had yet to walk into a white lunch counter and ask for a cup of coffee. Three months ago, no governor of South Carolina had ever asked for the peaceful acceptance of an integrated state university. One month ago, no governor of North Carolina had ever asked for a Good Neighbor Council to end employment discrimination. The segregationist may think he is fighting John Kennedy, Earl Warren, and the NAACP. Actually, he is fighting Marconi, macadam, and Henry Ford -- in short, the Twentieth Century. The outcome of this unequal struggle is not for a moment in doubt. If FEPC legislation comes not this year, it comes soon. But much remains to be done, and on many fronts.

Within the federal civil service there are pockets of racism; aided and abetted by the use and abuse of the "rule of three." Energetic transmission of the Washington spirit to the field offices is necessary if federal employment and employment opportunities are to be based solely on factors of "merit." Periodic "headcounts," the addition of "minority specialists" to employment staffs, good communication, and Congressional approval and ratification of the guiding agency -- the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity -- will keep this program on sound footing.

The "fair and equal employment" clause in the standard government contract has for too long been forgotten, "dead and buried under thousands of words of standard legal and technical language." President Kennedy has unearthed this provision and appointed a Committee under Vice-President Johnson to enforce it. Sanctions are available, and the Plans for Progress, if implemented, give great hope of progress. The entire program would be strengthened by Congressional authorization, support, and appropriations.

The anti-discrimination clauses contained (and enforced) in the 1930 grant-in-aid programs are not present in today's programs. The consequence is that thousands of Negroes are denied good jobs on projects created by Federal funds. There is no valid Constitutional reason why Federally created job opportunities under grant-in-aid programs should be treated differently from Federally created job opportunities under Federal procurement contract programs. The Civil Rights Commission recommends that the grant-in-aid program be brought within the protection and requirements of the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity.

The United States Government finances the world's largest employment agency; and this agency in turn often stands as a barrier between the Negro and better job opportunities. Operating through segregated offices, the state employment services, at least until lately, processed discriminatory job requests under the federal spurt which based promotion and appropriations on the number of unemployed persons put back to work. The Civil Rights Commission has recommended that (1) consideration should be given to changing the method utilized to determine federal appropriations, presently keyed to the number of job placements made, to reflect other factors (such as the greater degree of difficulty and time involved in placing qualified minority group workers) so that the budgetary formula will encourage, rather than discourage, referral on a nondiscriminatory basis; and (2) that the President direct the Secretary of Labor to grant funds only to state employment services which offer their services on a non-segregated basis and which refuse to accept and/or process discriminatory job offers.

America suffers from a surplus of unskilled and a dearth of skilled employees. And thousands of youths, age 16 to 21, are out of school, out of work, on the streets headed for trouble, petty crimes, and ultimately to public relief. The federal government seeks to give skills, work, and hope to these citizens by training in federally sponsored apprenticeship programs and federally financed industrial training centers. Yet these programs are not only woefully inadequate in size and number; they also discriminate against the Negro entirely, or at best train him for "traditional" jobs which are rapidly passing from the industrial scene. The Civil Rights Commission recommends corrective action in the federally supported apprenticeship programs by withholding federal aid and support from those which discriminate. It recommends corrective action against federally supported industrial training programs through similar techniques. And it recommends a positive approach to the total problem of creating skills needed in the coming years, of rekindling belief in the sceptical youth, through a program of guidance counseling, making the youth aware of federal and federal contract employment opportunities; through a program of extensive training in useful and challenging skills; and through a program of mass training and retraining akin to that of the Civil Conservation Corps during the 1930s -- a domestic Peace Corps if you will, permitting a simultaneous experience of education, skill gaining, and helping others to help themselves.

We find ourselves at another frontier. Do we retreat, vacillate, or press on? The problem is grave, the challenge a thrill, and the promise of solution a reward without measure.

On to Appomattox.

IN THE SUPREME COURT OF FLORIDA
JANUARY TERM, A. D. 1956
EN BANC.

A. MAX BREWER and O. L. BURTON, individually and as State Representatives from Brevard County,

Appellants,

-vs-

CASE NO. 27,184

R. A. GRAY, as Secretary of State, RICHARD W. ERVIN, as Attorney General, CHARLES D. STEWART, BERNIE C. PAPY, W. H. CARMINE, JR., and WALTER O. SHEPPARD, as State Representatives, Appellees.

Opinion filed April 11, 1956

An Appeal from the Circuit Court for Leon County, Hugh M. Taylor, Judge
Butt & Akridge and Crofton, Wilson & Brewer, for Appellants
Richard W. Ervin, Attorney General and Howard S. Bailey, Assistant Attorney General, for Appellees

THORNAL, J.:

Appellants Brewer and Burton who were plaintiffs below appeal from a decree of the Chancellor sustaining the constitutionality of Chapter 31378, Laws of Florida, Extraordinary Session 1955, which reapportioned the membership of the House of Representatives of the Florida Legislature.

The question before us on appeal and which was ruled on by the Chancellor below is whether Chapter 31378, supra, which reapportioned the membership of the House of Representatives of the State Legislature is unconstitutional or at least inoperative until the Legislature reapportions the State Senate in accordance with the requirements of Section 3, Article VII, of the Florida Constitution. No Act has yet been passed by the 1955 Legislature reapportioning the State Senate.

By Chapter 31378, supra, the ninety-five members of the House of Representatives were apportioned among the several counties in accordance with the mathematical formula governing the House as set forth in Section 3, Article VII, Florida Constitution. The ultimate effect of the Act so far as these parties are concerned was to reduce representation in the House from two members each to one member each for Brevard and Lee Counties and simultaneously to increase representation in the House from one member each to two members each for Monroe and Okaloosa Counties. The apportionment was stated to be based on the 1950 Federal Census.

Appellants Brewer and Burton presently represent Brevard County in the House of Representatives. Appellees Carmine and Sheppard represent Lee County. Appellee Stewart represents Okaloosa County and appellee Papy represents Monroe.

In holding the Act under attack to be constitutional and operative in accordance with its provisions, the Chancellor stated:

> "The existence of two duties (a) to reapportion the Senate and (b) to reapportion the House of Representatives, does not make the performance of one duty ineffectual until the other has been accomplished unless it is clear from the Constitution that this was the intent of the people. I cannot find that intent clear in the Constitution."

We hold that he ruled correctly and his decree must, therefore, be affirmed..

It is appropriate to consider certain basic principles that guide us to our conclusion. We have separated Article VII, Section 3, of the Florida Constitution into its four component sentences for convenience of analysis, and quote the same as follows:

> "The Legislature that shall meet in regular session A. D. 1925, and those that shall meet every ten years thereafter, shall apportion the Representation in the Senate, and shall provide for thirty-eight (38) Senatorial Districts, such Districts to be as nearly equal in population as practicable, but no county shall be divided in making such apportionment, and each District shall have one Senator; and, at the same time, the Legislature shall also apportion the Representation in the House of Representatives, and shall allow three (3) Representatives to each of the five most populous counties, and two (2) Representatives to each of the next eighteen more populous counties, and one Representative to each of the remaining counties of the State at the time of such apportionment.
>
> "Should the Legislature fail to apportion the Representation in the Senate and in the House of Representatives, at any regular session of the Legislature at any of the times herein designated, it shall be the duty of the Legislature or Legislatures succeeding such regular session of the Legislature, either in special or regular session, to apportion the Representation in the Senate and in the House of Representatives as herein provided.
>
> "The preceding regular Federal orregular State Census, which ever shall have been taken nearest any apportionment of Representatives in the Senate and in the House of Representatives, shall control in making any such apportionment.

"In the event the Legislature shall fail to reapportion the representation in the Legislature as required by this amendment, the Governor shall (within thirty days after the adjournment of the regular session), call the Legislature together in extraordinary session to consider the question of reapportionment and such extraordinary session of the Legislature is hereby mandatorily required to reapportion the representation as required by this amendment before its adjournment (and such extraordinary session so called for reapportionment shall not be limited to expire at the end of twenty days or at all, until reapportionment is effected, and shall consider no business other than such reapportionment.)" (Emphasis added.)

Appellants rely upon the language emphasized to support their contention that the effectiveness of the reapportionment of the House of Representatives is contingent upon reapportionment of the Senate.

The statute under attack comes to this court clothed with a presumption of validity. One who challenges the constitutionality of an Act of the Legislature must clearly demonstrate its invalidity. All doubts are resolved in favor of the constitutionality of legislative action and as between two possible theories of interpretation, the courts are bound to adopt the one which results in upholding the Act if such interpretation is consistent with reason. See Ball vs. Branch, 154 Fla. 57, 16 So. 2d 524.

The duty imposed upon the Legislature to apportion representation in the Legislative branch of the government is political and administrative. It involves the exercise of judgment and discretion within the orbit prescribed by the organic law. It is a governmental function in the sense that it is commanded by the Constitution pursuant to the responsibility of providing for the actual structure of the government itself. The Florida Constitution mandatorily places upon the Legislature the duty to take the initiative to apportion representation in both Houses of the Legislature in accordance with the constitutional requirements.

It is clear from an examination of the second and fourth sentences of Article VII, Section 3, quoted above, that this is a continuing duty. See Smith v. Holm, 220 Minn. 486, 19 N.W. 2d 914; Parker v. State, 196 Pa. 396, 46 Atl. 505; and 11 Am. Jur. Constitutional Law, Sec. 70, p. 688.

Under our democratic system equality of representation is essential to the preservation of Democracy itself. The thought is well expressed by the Supreme Court of Oklahoma in Jones v. Freeman, 193 Okla. 554, 146 P. 2d 564, from which we quote as follows:

" The principle of equality of representation lies at the very heart of representative government. 18 Am. Jur. 192, §17. This principle was > enjoined upon the Legislature by the cited constitutional provisions. At the ballot box, in a representative government, each citizen is supposed to be, and should be, the equal of every other citizen, and all are entitled to approximately an equal voice in the enactment of laws through elected Representatives."

Despite the importance of this legislative responsibility and despite the fact that the provisions of our Constitution are clearly mandatory, we are nevertheless forced to the conclusion that the responsibility rests with the Legislature and not with this court. The Legislature is a coordinate branch of the government, and even though the performance of a duty is required by the Constitution, the courts, being another coordinate branch of the government, are not authorized to compel the Legislature to exercise a purely legislative prerogative. We are not here intending to hold that once the legislative discretion is exercised and crystallized into a statute, the courts do not have the power to examine the statute and measure its validity by the prescriptions of the organic law.

We here intend to hold, and do so hold, that the Florida Constitution places upon the Legislature two related duties. One is to apportion the membership of the State Senate and the other is to apportion membership in the House of Representatives. The Legislature has performed one of these duties by passing the statute under attack. We cannot read into the Constitution a provision which is not there. There is nothing in the Constitution which provides that reapportionment of the House is contingent upon reapportionment of the Senate, or vice versa. While a casual examination of the quoted constitutional provision might lead one to the thought that both branches of the Legislature should be reapportioned simultaneously or at least within such proximity of time as to be originally effective at the same general election, a more careful analysis will reveal that no such stipulation is written into the organic law and we are without power to provide one.

On the relationship between the Legislature and the courts with reference to reapportionment statutes, see Donovan v. Suffolk County, 225 Mass. 55, 113 N.E. 740, 2 A.L.R. 1334 (note 1337), and also 37 Illinois Law Review 20.

As was stated in Smith v. Holm, 200 Minn. 486, 19 N.W. 2d 914:

> "The remedy lies in the political conscience of the legislature, where lies the burden of the constitutional mandate. It is not within the province of this court to prompt the action of that conscience. It is usually sensitive enough to promptings from the electorate."

The exceedingly able briefs of counsel for all parties have failed to reveal any really direct precedents that would be considered conclusive. Possibly the most closely analogous decision is Stenson v. Secretary of State, 308 Mich. 48, 13 N.W. 2d 202. In construing a constitutional provision somewhat similar to our own, the Supreme Court of Michigan held:

> "We are not in accord with the intervening plaintiffs' further contention that since the Constitution, Art. V, Sec. 4, provides for 'rearrangement' of senatorial districts, as well as reapportionment of representative districts once in each ten years, the 1943 reapportionment act as to representative districts should be held invalid as an 'abuse of legislative discretion', because the 1943 legislature did not also rearrange senatorial districts."

Like the court in the case last cited, we are not in a position to conclude that the Florida Legislature has abused its legislative discretion by enacting Chapter 31378, supra, without enacting a companion measure for the reapportionment of the Florida Senate. As pointed out above, the courts are without power to order legislative action. A contrary ruling would destroy our system of "checks and balances." We judicially know that pursuant to a gubernatorial call issued in accord with the fourth sentence of Section 3, Article VII, the Legislature of 1955 is still technically in extraordinary session and is scheduled to reconvene on June 4, 1956. We must assume that the Legislature will do its duty as its discretion dictates within the limits of the fundamental law.

What we have heretofore said disposes of the problem before us except as to the contention of appellee Stewart to the effect that by the enactment of Chapter 29615, Laws of Florida 1955, Regular session, which adopted the Florida Statutes of 1955, the Legislature in effect reapportioned the Florida Senate by including Section 10.01, Florida Statutes 1955, in the 1955 Revision. Section 10.01, Florida Statutes, is nothing more than the codification of Chapter 23614, Laws of Florida 1945, reapportioning the State Senate as of November 5, 1946. While we have held the inclusion of a general Act of the Legislature in the statutory revision will cure a defect in the title of the Act, as it originally passed the Legislature (see State v. Lee, 156 Fla. 291, 22 So. 2d 804), we cannot conclude that the Legislature of 1955 can perform the constitutional duty imposed upon it in 1955 by including in the Revision a reapportionment Act enacted in 1945. The third sentence of Article VII, Section 3, of the Florida Constitution, provides that the preceding regular Federal or State Census which shall have been taken nearest any apportionment shall control in the making of any such reapportionment. An examination of Section 10.01, Florida Statutes 1955, will reveal that it became effective at the general election on the 5th day of November, 1946. It could hardly be logically contended that a reapportionment effective in November, 1946, could have been based upon the Federal Census taken in 1950, which we judicially know to be the last preceding regular Federal Census and the one which would control any reapportionment made by the 1955 Legislature. We dispose of this point by adopting the reasoning of the Supreme Court of Alabama in Opinion of the Justices (Ala. 1950), 47 So. 2d 714, where the following conclusion was reached.

> "We judicially know that the population of the various counties of this state has changed during the years which have intervened since the Constitution of 1901 was adopted, so that the representation as provided in Sections 1 and 2 of Title 32, Code 1940, cannot be said to be on a population basis. The contention is without merit that by bringing forward into the Code of 1940 the provisions of previous Codes as to the Division or apportionment of representation in this state constitutes apportionment of the representation of the legislature within the purview of Sections 198-201 of the Constitution of 1901."

Chapter 23614, Laws of Florida 1945, remains the law of Florida until repealed or superseded. However, in and of itself, it cannot be construed as amounting to a compliance with a constitutional requirement that could not be performed until 1955 at the earliest.

All parties are commended for the enlightening and helpful briefs filed in this cause.

We find no error in the ruling of the Chancellor and his decree is therefore Affirmed.

Dear Miss Irving:

In response to your letter of September 25, we are enclosing a map of the State of Arkansas which outlines the senatorial districts and indicates the number of senators elected from the respective districts. In addition, we are enclosing a roster of the membership of the 1955 General Assembly. This roster reveals the number of House members elected from the several counties.

The Arkansas Senate is composed of 35 members chosen from 26 senatorial districts. Seats in the Senate are apportioned on a reasonably equal population basis. The Arkansas House of Representatives is composed of 100 members. Each of the 75 counties of the State is entitled to one member of the House and the additional 25 seats are apportioned among the more populous counties.

If we may furnish additional information do not hesitate to write.

Very truly yours,

Marcus Halbrook

ARKANSAS

STATE SENATORIAL DISTRICTS

REVISION MADE BY

SUPREME COURT OF ARKANSAS

FEBRUARY 25, 1952

PUBLISHED BY

C. G. "CRIP" HALL

Secretary of State

DEPARTMENT OF LEGISLATIVE REFERENCE
CARL N. EVERSTINE, DIRECTOR

CITY HALL
BALTIMORE 2, MARYLAND

September 28, 1956.

Miss Florence B. Irving,
Research Assistant, Southern Regional Council, Inc.,
63 Auburn Avenue, N. E.,
Atlanta-3, Georgia.

Dear Miss Irving:

In your letter of September 25, you asked for a list of the Senatorial and Delegate Districts in the State of Maryland.

We do not follow the plan here which is used in many States whereby a number of the counties will be comprised in one Senatorial District. In Maryland, each of the twenty-three counties is a separate Senatorial District and, in addition, Baltimore City is divided into six Districts, so that we have a total of twenty-nine members in the Senate of Maryland. Each of these Districts also serves as the District from which the members of the House of Delegates are elected. There are from two to six members from each District. Up until several years ago, the exact number of Delegates depended upon population but, at that time, we froze the membership at the existing levels.

The names of the Counties in Maryland are as follows:

Allegany County
Anne Arundel County
Baltimore County
Calvert County
Caroline County
Carroll County
Cecil County
Charles County
Dorchester County
Frederick County
Garrett County
Harford County
Howard County
Kent County
Montgomery County
Prince George's County
Queen Anne's County
St. Mary's County
Somerset County
Talbot County
Washington County
Wicomico County
Worcester County

Sincerely,

Carl N. Everstine

Director.

Dear Miss Irving:

I am sending you a map of the state senatorial districts in Missouri. There are thirty-four districts, each district having one senator. You will see that some of these districts have several counties within their borders, and I also call your attention to the fact that Jackson County (Kansas City) has four senators, St. Louis County (Districts 13, 14 and 15) has three, and St. Louis City, seven.

There are 157 members of the House of Representatives, each county is entitled to at least one representative. St. Louis City which is a county for this purpose has eighteen, St. Louis County 7, Jackson County 9, Greene, Buchanan and Jasper Counties three each. All other counties have one.

I hope this information is helpful to you.

Very truly yours,

William R. Nelson

October 9, 1956

OFFICE OF THE
EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR

Miss Florence B. Irving
Research Assistant
Southern Regional Council, Inc.
Room 432, 63 Auburn Avenue, N.E.
Atlanta 3, Georgia

Dear Miss Irving:

As requested in your recent letter, we are sending you at this time lists of senatorial and representative districts, by counties, for the Texas Legislature. One senator represents each senatorial district. When there is more than one representative from a representative district, indication is made on the list as places. For example, District No. 22 (Harris County) show places 1 through 8, indicating that there are eight representatives from this district.

I trust this is the information you desired.

Yours very truly,

You might be interested to know that the 1955 General Assembly made provision for a commission to study the representation in the state and to report to the Governor during the 1957 legislature.

We hope you will find the information included in this letter to be of use to you.

Very truly yours,

Catherine Maybury

Urban Population	1,471,696	1,022,931	448,765	30.5
Rural Population	1,211,820	773,752	438,068	36.1
Urban Population as % of Total	54.8	56.9	50.6

* Source - Louisiana State Dept. of Health estimate

 Source - U. S. Census, 1950

 We have no explanation for rural % increase 1958 over 1950. State estimates for 1958 are straight projection from 1950 census. An examination of figures suggests possibility that state is basing estimates on the old urban definition and not the new, which is the source of above 1950 figures. Straight-line projection may account also for the estimated increase in non-white percentage.

B. Median Income, 1949, persons over 14, U. S. Census

United States	9.7	6.9

II. ACTION DESIGNED TO RESIST DESEGREGATION

A. Statements by public office-holders:

1. Governor Robert F. Kennon: 1954 court decisions presented "no change in the legal situation of the public schools." He argued that the state was meeting its responsibility through equalization of separate educational facilities.

2. Attorney General Fred LeBlanc: "We are not parties to any of the segregation suits before the Supreme Court." (Following 1954 decision)

3. State Senator William M. Rainach: "Segregation is a natural order - created by God, in his wisdom...We should be ashamed of ourselves if we cannot win our fight. We are by no means broke, we can vote, we still have our officials, and we can pack the NAACP off where it belongs. Our forefathers won the battle. We can win now." (1954)

4. Governor Earl K. Long: Won election on platform including pledge to close the state's public schools rather than submit to a federal desegregation order. (1956)

B. Major actions of legislature:

1. Interposition, Censure:

a. A May 20th, 1954 legislative resolution censured the Supreme Court for a "usurping of power." Only 4 votes opposed.

b. By unanimous vote adopted interposition resolution, May, 1956 (the sixth Southern state to do so).

2. Schools:

a. "16th Amendment" to state constitution, ratified in 1954, provides that separate schools for white and Negro children shall be maintained under the police power of the state. (Also called "Police Power" amendment.)

b. Other 1954 legislation prohibits State Board of Education approval of any school violating segregation requirements, and provides for pupil assignment to specific schools by local superintendents.

c. 1956 Constitutional Amendment withdraws permission for suits to be brought against "special agencies" of the state without legislative approval. Governing boards of public schools and parks are established as "special agencies."

d. 1958 enactments permit governor to close any school in a district in which one school is ordered integrated; authorized sale of school properties; set up rules for parent "cooperative" private schools; provide state grants for education in cooperative schools; and establish pupil assignment criteria to be employed by district superintendents.

3. Other:

a. Red Cross required to label blood plasma by race. (1958)

b. Joint Legislative Committee created for the purpose of "carrying on and conducting the fight to maintain segregation of the races." (1954)

4. "Anti-NAACP" Legislation:

a. Act 260 (1958)-Provides that associations of persons engaged in social, educational or political activities in the state are prohibited from being affiliated with any foreign or out-of-state association of which any of the officers or directors are members of Communist, Communist-front, or subversive organizations, as cited by the Un-American Activities Committee of the "House of Congress" or the U. S. Attorney-Reports.

b. Title 12, Section 401 - Requires organizations* to file each year with the Secretary of State a list of members and officers and their addresses.

c. Section 402 - Requires each subdivision or subordinate body of each organization* to file each year with the Secretary of State a list of members and officers and their addresses.

d. Section 403 - Prohibits meetings of organizations* and their subdivisions unless membership lists have been filed.

Section 405 - Empowers the Attorney General to dissolve by injunction or otherwise any organization* or subdivision violating the provisions outlined above.

e. Acts No. 248, 249, 250, 252 of the 1956 Regular Session provide for removal of permanent teachers, school bus operators, and any other employes of public schools and public colleges in the state who are member of or who contribute to any group, organization, movement, or corporation that is prohibited by law or injunction from operating in the state of Louisiana.

* "fraternal, patriotic, charitable, benevolent, literary, scientific, athletic, military, or social organizations, incorporated or unincorporated."

 Act 249 (pertaining to permanent teachers in the public school system) was held to be unconstitutional by federal district court judges in April, 1957, in connection with a suit attacking certain laws barring Negro students from attending white state colleges.

C. Other Official Action:

1. Joint Legislative Committee (headed by State Senator William M. Rainach)

a. A full page ad placed in the N. Y. Herald-Tribune in order to "carry the cause of the South to the nation." The ad suggested that the North adopt the Southern system of racial separation. (February, 1958)

b. Investigation of 66 LSU faculty signators of an American Civil Liberties Union petition opposing school closing bills. (June, July, 1958)

c. Hearings to find "the causes of racial unrest in the South" and to "paint the other half of the picture being given by the civil rights hearings in Washington."

At hearings held in Baton Rouge (March, 1957) six witnesses, all cooperative, described so-called "Communist infiltration" into intergroup and church centered organizations. "Star" witnesses were professed ex-Communists Manning Johnson and Leonard Patterson. Committee Chairman Rainach said after the hearings that Communist agitation is behind the race troubles. Spokesmen for the accused group, none of which were represented during the hearings, called the charges "fantastic", "unjust," "misrepresentations and smears." (March, 1957)

2. Local Agencies

a. The Natchitoches police jury (administrative body of the parish) cancelled its contract with the Natchitoches Enterprise, formerly approved as an official journal, because editor Milton Beckerman signed an A.C.L.U. petition protesting legislation to close schools. (June, 1958)

b. Morehouse Parish School Board voted unanimously to discontinue use of a ninth grade general science textbook that some persons said contained "Un-American ideas on the origin of races." (November, 1955) This passage was among those cited as objectionable: "Living things which belong to recognizable kinds, which are alike in most physical traits, and which breed freely with each other are said to belong to one species. All men on this earth belong to one species--homo sapiens." Persons who object to the book said this is a plain insinuation that races "breed freely with each other" and is a dangerous socialistic trend of thought to instill in the younger generation.

c. Both the Claiborne Parish and the Bossier Parish School Boards placed a ban on three national magazines - Time, Life, and Look - because of what it called their "distorted" view of the segregation issue. Subscriptions were cancelled and back issues ordered removed from library shelves. (May, 1956)

d. Orleans Parish School Superintendent James Redmond ordered all copies of "The Rabbit Brothers" removed from the public schools. The Citizens Council of New Orleans had attacked the Anti-Defamation League booklet as an attempt to "brainwash" school children on the idea of racial integration. (September, 1956)

D. Organizations Opposing Desegregation

1. Church Centered Groups

a. Louisiana Baptist Convention, November 1957, resolved that forced integration "would be unwise and harmful" under prevailing circumstances.

b. Official publication of Louisiana Baptists, the Baptist Message, editorially attacked the Christian Life Commission of the Southern Baptist Convention for its views favoring desegregation. (August, 1957)

c. A Catholic Negro priest, sent to Jesuit Bend, was turned away from the church.

d. Mangum Memorial, one of Shreveport's largest Methodist Churches, adopted a resolution against desegregation in June, 1958. Spokesmen said that if Negroes presented themselves for membership in the church they would be courteously refused.

e. "Association of Catholic Laymen" was formed in 1956 (a few weeks after Archbishop Rummel's condemnation of segregation) with membership appeal directed to "Roman Catholics of the Caucasian race." Emile Wagner was group's founder. A public appeal to Rome for support was not answered, but the group remains active.

2. Other

a. Louisiana Farm Bureau Association went on records as opposing integration at its 1958 convention.

b. Delegates from posts composing Louisiana First District of American Legion adopted resolution condemning use of federal troops in Little Rock as "unlawful, unconstitutional, irresponsible, clumsy, and un-American." (October, 1957)

c. American Legionnaires at Homer pressed for a drive against desegregation in V. A. Hospitals. Arcadia and Minden posts offered support, with Arcadia Legionnaires condemning desegregation of patients as "adding to the dangers of social diseases." (December, 1956)

d. All 5 posts in the 13th district of the VFW signed a resolution opposing integration of white and Negro patients in V. A. Hospitals in Louisiana. (March, 1957)

3. Organized Resistance Groups

a. Ku Klux Klan

Dissolved in the thirties under state statute requiring membership lists to be filed with the secretary of state. Charter for renewed operation issued in May, 1956. Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith reported in April, 1958, that subsequent activity has been sporadic and insignificant.

b. Association of Citizens' Councils of Louisiana

Headquarters in Homer; State Senator William M. Rainach, formerly president of the south-wide WCC organization, heads the state organization. A 1957 SRC report listed the following prominent Louisianans among officers: J. Stewart Slack of Shreveport (member of the LSU Board of Supervisors); Malcolm Dougherty, Baton Rouge (president, Louisiana Farm Bureau Federation); Dr. Emmett Irvin, New Orleans (past president of the Louisiana Medical Association); C. Carneal Goldman of Waterproff (attorney and farmer); and Harry P. Gamble, Sr., of New Orleans (president of American Association for the Preservation of State Government and Racial Integrity). 1956 membership claim: 75,000 to 100,000 with over 50,000 members in New Orleans. Among recent activities:

(1) Monthly publication of "The Council Newsletter," June, 1958, issue editorialized as follows: "Our attention has recently been called to the current practice of certain large department and clothing stores in New Orleans of using a shadow-graph process to depict white and dark models in their advertisements appearing in the New Orleans newspapers.

"An investigation reveals that the shadow-graph ads are being sent to the stores from New York advertising centers, and in one large department store, the president has stopped using the cuts showing the dark models.

"In the opinion of an alert New Orleans housewife, the ads are being deliberately sent South for the purpose of accustoming our citizens, through the power of association and suggestion, to the idea of race mixing. The Councillor is indebted to this fine New Orleans Citizens Council member for advising us of the situation so that we may pass along the information to our readers, who may, in turn, watch for this type of advertisement and take whatever action they may see fit at stores where such suggestive advertising is used."

(2) Gave notice that through a constitutional provision for challenging the qualifications of registered voters or prospective registrants, "the problem of Negro registration will be solved in a legal way." In October, 1956, WCC units began challenging the qualifications of registrants in 13 parishes. Some 10,000 names were removed from registration lists. (see "Suffrage")

(3) Distributed literature attacking American Telephone and Telegraph Company for featuring Negro performers: "...(we) believe that there should be a stop to the ever-increasing Negroes featured on television, shown in close and intimate relations with white people. It is nothing more than integration of races in the most intimate medium of TV. And unquestionably it is the most effective medium through which to brainwash the youngsters, by not only accustoming them to seeing white and black people mixed, but through the grandiose introductions the Negroes invariably receive on the show and in their advance publicity...." The Council urged its followers to write directly to Southern Bell because Station WDSU, the local outlet, "has openly advocated integration of the races." It also urged whites to either protest the appearance of Negroes on TV shows or turn off their sets. "Everytime you see a Negro featured on TV you should let the sponsor know of your protest."

(4) Candidates for New Orleans City Council were polled by the local Citizens' Council and their answers to questions concerning the continuance of segregation made public. (February, 1958)

c. Other groups in the state include the Federation for Constitutional Government, (James U. Barr, New Orleans); the Southern Gentlemen, Inc., (J. B. Easterly, Baton Rouge); ~~the Ku Klux Klan (Edgar Taylor, Baton Rouge)~~; the Society for the Preservation of State Government and Racial Integrity (Harry P. Gamble, Sr., New Orleans - largely inactive); and the Knights of the White Christians (Alvin A. Cobb, New Orleans - inactive). Free Men Speak, a newspaper devoted largely to third party movements, is published in New Orleans by Kent H. Courtney.

III. ACTION SUPPORTING DESEGREGATION

A. Electorate and Public Officials

1. Louisiana voters defeated, by a 190,410 to 178,833 vote, a proposed constitutional amendment which was designed to hamper voting by Negroes (by requiring two additional administrative steps by voters removed from registration lists before federal court action). (November, 1958)

2. Senator Russell Long said in 1954 that although he disagrees completely with desegregation decision, his oath of office required him to accept it as law. "Every citizen is likewise bound by his oath of allegiance to his country."

3. Camille F. Gravel, Jr., state Democratic National Committeeman, declared that Louisiana would eventually desegregate its schools and backed the 1957 Civil Rights Act "insofar as it protected the right to vote." (A coalition of segregationists, states righters, and supporters of Gov. Long voted in October, 1958, to fire Gravel on grounds that he was unfaithful to the South; however, the national committee sustained his membership claims.)

B. Organizations

1. Church Centered

(a) Louisiana annual conference of the Methodist Church resolved that "segregation, both in and out of the church, is unwise, unconstitutional and unChristian." (May, 1958)

(b) Presbytery of New Orleans (Presbyterian Church in the U.S.) called for a study of the matter of integration by its 39 member churches, and a Christian outlook on the problem. (May, 1955) The same group opposed destruction of public school system, June, 1958.

(c) The Catholic Commission on Human Rights of the Catholic Committee of the South called for desegregation soon after the 1954 School ruling.

(d) New Orleans Interdenominational Ministerial Alliance has advocated compliance with desegregation decisions.

(e) Archbishop of the New Orleans archdiocese of the Catholic Church, Joseph F. Rummel, had "colored only" signs removed from churches (1949), integrated the archdiocesan school board (1950), called for the integration of all archdiocesan organizations (1953). In 1956 he issued a pastoral letter calling segregation "morally wrong and sinful." He reiterated this condemnation in late 1958.

2. Other

(a) New Orleans Council of Social Agencies, a racially integrated body, adopted a resolution asking that the "New Orleans parish school board be informed there should be no more school planning on a segregated basis." (June, 1955)

(b) New Orleans section of the National Council of Jewish Women passed resolution supporting S. C. desegregation decree. (November, 1954)

(c) Coordinating Council of Greater New Orleans, composed of representatives of 40 Negro organizations, issued a statement condemning attempts to circumvent Supreme Court desegregation decisions. (April, 1955)

(d) Louisiana Civil Liberties Union petition signed by more than 500 persons branded school closing plans unworkable, warned they would "undo in one day what has taken 100 years and millions of tax dollars to construct." (June, 1958)

3. Intergroup Organizations

a. NAACP

b. Commission on Human Rights of the Catholic Committee of the South

c. Southern Conference Educational Fund

d. Louisiana Council on Human Relations (not functioning at present)

IV. SEGREGATION-DESEGREGATION PRACTICES

A. Education

1. Public schools, elementary and secondary level, desegregated: None. Federal District Judge J. Skelly Wright for the second time ordered desegregation of Orleans Parish public schools as soon as necessary arrangements could be made. Appeal was announced by school board attorneys (October, 1958). (Wright's desegregation order was originally rendered in 1956, upheld by appeals court in March, 1957, and appeal from it was denied by the Supreme Court in June, 1957. However, on the basis of a technicality involving late filing of bond, the school board brought new litigation.)

2. Parochial Schools

   None desegregated.

3. Desegregated Institutions of Higher Education (as of January 1959):

Institutions	Legal Control
1. College of the Sacred Heart, Grand Coteau, La.	Roman Catholic
2. John McNeese State College, Lake Charles, La.	State
3. Louisiana State University Graduate School, Baton Rouge, La.	State
4. Louisiana State University at New Orleans, New Orleans, La.	State
5. Loyola University, New Orleans, La.	Roman Catholic
6. New Orleans Baptist Theological Seminary, New Orleans, La.	Southern Baptist
7. Notre Dame Seminary, New Orleans, La.	Roman Catholic
8. Southeastern Louisiana Institute, Hammond, La.	State
9. Southwestern Louisiana Institute, Lafayette, La.	State
10. Xaviar University, New Orleans, La. (Formerly, all Negro)	Roman Catholic

B. Elections and Appointments

1. Negroes serving in public office

a. Gilbert Porterfield, of New Orleans, was named to congressional staff of Congressman F. Edward Hebert, for "liaison in the area of race relations." (December, 1954)

2. Negroes running for office

a. I. M. Augustine, Jr., ran for a post on the New Orleans school board, November, 1956.

b. Alexander P. Tureaud campaigned for election as U. S. Congressman from Louisiana in 1958, but was defeated by almost 6 to 1.

C. Employment

1. Federal

New Orleans. A Negro general foreman is employed in the office of the Superintendent of the Postal Transportation Service.

2. Municipal

a. Negro police are known to be employed in the following cities:

Caddo Parish, La.
Lafayette, La.
Monroe, La.
New Iberia, La.
New Orleans, La.
Shreveport, La.

b. A Negro civic organization, Studs Club, Inc., asked that Negroes employed on the New Orleans police force be assigned to duties in keeping with their qualifications rather than on the basis of their racial origin. The protest followed a Citizens Council objection to the further hiring of Negro policemen and policewomen and their use in directing traffic in the downtown area. (April, 1957)

3. Private

a. A 1956 Urban League survey indicated that the percentage of Negroes employed by companies with 200 or more employees was 21.1 in the New Orleans area, while the Southwide percentage was 10.2.

b. Two Negro employees of the Celotex Corporation, Marrero, asked a federal district court for an injunction to prevent firm and union officials (Local No. 4-179, Oil, Chemical and Atomic Workers International, and OCAW-AFL-CIO) from discrimination against Negro employees through a system of job classification. (August, 1957). A consent decree was approved by the court, under which all parties agreed to eliminate racial discrimination in seniority, and job opportunities. (January, 1958)

c. An Oil, Chemical and Atomic Workers local voted to request Cit-Con Plant in Lake Charles to eliminate separate lines of progression and an all Negro department. (May, 1956)

d. Esso Standard Oil Company, Baton Rouge: company desegregated all seniority lines and transferred 25 Negroes to mechanical helpers' classification, previously open to whites only.

D. Health and Medical Care

1. New Orleans: "Lack of hospital facilities keeps Negro doctors out of Louisiana," according to John G. Lewis, Jr., "The only hospital in which a Negro doctor can secure hospital service for his patient is the all-Negro...Flint-Goodridge hospital." (June, 1956)

2. Director of New Orleans' Charity Hospital urged private hospitals in the area to provide care for Negroes not eligible for admission to the state supported hospital. (April, 1957)

E. Housing

1. New Orleans' residential pattern, particularly in the poorer districts, has always been mixed, sometimes to the extent that a white family will occupy one side of a duplex and Negroes the other..

F. Jury Duty

1. The Supreme Court, in setting aside the conviction and death sentence of a Negro accused of murder, held that Negroes were systematically excluded from the New Orleans grand jury which returned the indictment. The court's opinion noted that only one Negro has been picked for grand jury duty within memory, and that this exception apparently resulted from the mistaken impression that the juror was white. (May, 1958)

2. For the first time in over 60 years a Negro, Lionel J. Trouppier, acted as foreman of a New Orleans petty jury by which a white man was tried. (March, 1958)

G. Law Enforcement

H. Membership in Voluntary Organizations

1. New Orleans Council of Social Agencies is not segregated.

I. Public Accommodations

1. Limited service at Main Public Library is extended to Negroes in:

East Baton Rouge Parish
Jefferson Parish
Lafayette Parish
Lake Charles
New Orleans
Tangipahoa Parish

No main libraries are known to offer full service.

2. Act 579, 1956 legislative session, prohibits interracial social functions or sports contests, and requires separate seating and facilities for whites and Negroes at approved social functions and sports contests.

J. Recreation

1. Segregation barriers at New Orleans City Park were dropped in December, 1958, following receipt of a mandate of the U. S. Supreme Court. Park general manager Ellis Laborde said the action "means Negroes are now permitted to use all park facilities - the tennis courts, the baseball fields, the golf courses, the amusement rides...all facilities. The swimming pool is closed at this time. I won't be able to say anything about it." Laborde said he had "no intent of violating the order of the United States Supreme Court." (The park integration issue has been in the courts since 1949)

2. A resolution opposing the desegregation of recreation facilities was adopted by state directors of public recreation expressing the belief that if integration were attempted it would result in the destruction of the facilities.

3. Act 14 of the 1956 legislature orders complete separation of races in all public recreational facilities, to be enforced by the state's "police power" to promote "the public health, morals and the peace and good order."

4. U. S. Supreme Court declared a 1956 law banning racially mixed sports to be unconstitutional (May, 1959).

K. Suffrage

1. U. S. Civil Rights Commission postponed a decision on whether to hold hearings on voting complaints from Louisiana. 71 complaints had been received; however, state law permits records to be viewed only by qualified voters of the state and to be made generally public only upon petition of 25 Louisiana voters. (April, 1959)

2. Webster Parish registrar Mrs. Winnice Clement was object of White Citizens Council criticism in January, 1956 because she failed to require registrants to read and interpret state or federal constitutions. Mrs. Clement then applied the requirement and disqualified 24 white registrants. Shortly after that the police jury (parish governing body) asked the board of registrars to fire her, and that action was taken in May, 1956. Mrs. Clement then brought suit, seeking to restrain the police jury from naming a successor. However, incoming Governor Earl Long, who took office the day after Mrs. Clement was fired, stayed the dismissal.

3. East Feliciana Parish Police Jury voted an investigation of the registrar of voters after hearing complaints about a letter on integration attributed to him. The registrar, Charles Kilbourne, had written the Commercial Appeal saying integration is making deep strides in the South and that pro-segregation groups are fighting a "delaying action." (October, 1956)

4. U. S. Assistant Attorney General Warren Olney reported in early 1957 that FBI investigation of voter registration in 10 Louisiana parishes revealed that 8,552 Negroes were challenged when they tried to register in 1956. Over 3000 of some 4000 Negroes registered, to vote in Ouachita Parish were denied ballots. "...Investigations in Bienville, Caldwell, DeSota, Jackson, LaSalle and Ouachita Parishes disclosed that the registrar in those parishes did everything to discourage the filing of reply affidavits (by challenged registrant; necessary for reinstatement) ...and generally refused to accept them when offered," Olney stated.

L. Transportation

1. City buses were desegregated in New Orleans in 1958.

2. Special limousine service is provided for Negro transients travelling to and from the New Orleans airport.

3. Five Shreveport Negro ministers rode in white section of bus in protest of segregated seating, June, 1957. No arrests were made, but police chief said other Negroes following the ministers' lead would be arrested.

4. Shreveport bus and train stations continue to maintain and enforce use of segregated waiting rooms and facilities. Policemen are reportedly "posted to direct Negro passengers to Negro waiting room" in the train terminal. (Summer, 1958). Air line waiting room is desegregated, although separate restroom and restaurant facilities are provided.

5. Following a 1955 ICC directive to eliminate segregated waiting room facilities, then Governor Robert F. Kennon ordered all state, parish and municipal officials to continue rigid enforcement of state laws requiring separate facilities for the races at such stations. (January, 1956)

M. Violence, Intimidation

1. Bishop of the Lafayette Diocese Jules Jeanmard excommunicated two women who struck a teacher in a racially integrated cathechism class at Our Lady of Lourdes Church in Erath. Cathechism classes have been desegregated since 1946 in that church.

2. Two days of incidents - milling about, name calling, and the painting of insulting signs - followed initial attendance of Negroes at the New Orleans branch of Louisiana State University. One Negro was expelled, other expulsions were threatened by administrators, and the disorder ended. (September, 1958)

3. A Catholic priest, the Rev. Eugene McManus, received an anonymous threatening telephone call after speaking at a meeting on integration. The caller used "unprintable language" and threatened "to get" the priest. (March, 1956)

4. A cross was burned on the lawn of U. S. District Court Judge J. Skelly Wright, hours after the New Orleans bus desegregation order, which he had signed, went into effect. (May, 1958)

Creation of an 11-member advisory committee to keep the U. S. Civil Rights Commission posted on conditions in Alabama was announced May 26, following the organizational meeting in ~~Montgomery, Ala.~~ Maxwell Air Force base , near Montgomery, Ala.

Mayor Douglas Brown (Ozark) chairman
Dr. E. B. Goode (Mobile, Negro) vice-chairman
Mrs. Robert D. Elly (Birmingham, member of Nat'l exec. comm. United Presby. Women, secretary
Dr. Walter D. Agnew, Greensboro, former president of Huntingdon College at Montgomery
Louis Eckl, exec. editor, Florence Times and Tri-Cities Daily
Mrs. L. H. Foster, wife of president of Tuskegee Institute
A. G. Gaston, Birmingham Negro funeral home owner
Dr. Arthur D. Gray, Negro president of Talladega College
Byron K. Huffman, Mobile lumberman
Dr. Robert A. Lambert of Fairhope, member of the board of visitors at Tulane Univ.
Milton H. Lanier, Huntsville attorney
Mrs. Fletcher McLeod, Montgomery church and civic leader

Committee members decided as their first task to undertake a study of voting rights in Alabama. The Civil Rights Commission held its first hearing in Alabama last December to look into complaints from Negroes in six counties who said they were denied the right to vote. ~~The Civil Rights Commission h~~ Later, the Justice Dept. filed an injunction suit in federal court to prevent officials in one of the counties, Macon, from discriminating against would-be Negro voters. The suit was thrown out of court because no registration board is functioning in the county. Federal attorneys have appealed to the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

It's Easy ... to advertise in Georgia Newspapers!

Through the central office of the Georgia Press Advertising Service, it is possible for you to deal with all Georgia newspapers, as easily as if they were ONE NEWSPAPER.

● Select the list of papers to be used. You will find newspaper markets listed in three ways in this book, (a) alphabetically by cities and towns; (b) alphabetically by counties; (c) by outline map of Georgia, showing all towns in which newspapers are located.

● Make up a single order to the Georgia Press Advertising Service, attaching a list of papers to be used, and mail to our office. Include one set of copy and mats for each paper you wish to use.

● At the end of each month, you will receive promptly from us one consolidated statement for all papers, properly supported by tearsheets (proofs).

And that's all there is to it! This office handles the details and assumes the complete cost of mailing copy and mats, pulling tearsheets and remitting to the papers.

It's also easy to obtain the free "one order, one bill, one check" service on a regional or national basis. For complete information, write or call your Georgia Press Association.

Dear Don:

Somehow your letter of June 5 got fouled up in the inter-office mail shuffle here, and I could not remember just what it was you asked me to do. The letter has now turned up, fortunately, and we can't do much. This is, as a matter of fact, a slight bit amusing. We were unable to get 1958 registration figures from North Carolina, except for a state-wide total of 150,000 as estimated by the executive secretary of the State Election Board. Some time ago there was an item in the papers stating that the North Carolina Advisory Committee to the Commission on Civil Rights was gathering county figures. I promptly wrote to Mr. Marion Wright, a member of the committee and one of our officers, asking that the figures be forwarded to us as soon as they were compiled. He said he would do so. Now comes your letter. The fact is, we have never had good figures for North Carolina. In the Council's 1956 Voters Survey, a man by the name of Solomon Sutker, who now teaches at Oklahoma A. & M., made estimates for a number of counties. He used a variety of sources in doing so. I am enclosing a copy of his figures. You might be interested in Sutker's entire report, too, on North Carolina voting, and I shall work out some way of getting it to you; it seems to me a fairly interesting analysis.

We have in process pamphlets by a Norfolk reporter and a Duke professor, neither of whom I have met except through correspondence. Also, Walter Spearman, at your school, is finishing up a pamphlet for us and I would like to look in on him. I am thinking of taking a junket next week. If I do, I would like very much to see you and to learn more about your Carnegie (Rockefeller?) grant. Will you be in, say next Wednesday, July 1, or Thursday, July 2 ? Please drop me a quick line. Needless to say, this is not to forestall your promise of an Atlanta trip next fall.

We will keep in mind your query about a research assistant, but at the moment we do not know of anyone.

Sincerely yours,

Leslie W. Dunbar
Director of Research

Dear Donald:

If plans go straight we will arrive in Chapel Hill late Tuesday night or Wednesday morning. At the last minute, we have decided to run a couple of days of vacation into this and so Peggy and the children will be with me, and we shall leave from here tomorrow. If I were alone I would be delighted to stay with you and Maggie. As it is, I shall call you after we settle down somewhere in a motel. We will be glad to see Cleaveland and any others you may have in mind. I can stay over into or through Thursday, depending on how much time Walter Spearman and my man at Duke take. I probably will have to.

Sincerely yours,

Leslie W. Dunbar
Director of Research

Dear Donald:

Visiting with you, Maggie and the children was a tremendous treat. I want to thank you for all that you did to make the trip to Chapel Hill both useful to me and pleasant.

We move along here at about the same pace. The student I told you about did write to Bowermann, who replied that there were no assistantships being awarded at this time and suggested an application for 1960-61. In the meantime, Hammonds has accepted a National Defense Scholarship for Sociology at the University of Tennessee.

Give my regards to Maggie.

Sincerely yours,

Dear Don:

It is good news that you are coming to Atlanta next month. I hope we have a few things here to make it worth your while, though by this time you are probably well advanced beyond us. But whether or not it is worthwhile to you, I am sure it will be to us.

April 7-8 is fine for the business side of the trip; Harold Fleming is on jury duty then, but should not be tied up the while time. Our home situation is that we are expecting guests (mother and tenn-age son) on the 8th and 9th, which means that we can bed you only on the 7th, and we are hoping that you plan to stay over Friday night. But if you can take a hotel on Friday night, the timing would be perfect all around. We are also in good shape at the office and home any time in April except the week after Easter.

You are bringing Maggie too, I trust.

Incidentally, we have a letter here from Thomas F. Pettigrew, who is now at the Department of Social Relations, Harvard (Emerson Hall, Cambridge 38). He would like a copy of the North Carolina voting data that you worked up.

Would it be possible for you to send it directly to him and save us the trouble of thermofaxing it?

Give my best to Maggie, and I'll look forward to seeing you.

Sincerely yours,

Leslie W. Dunbar

Dear Don:

For a man who is normally at his desk practically all the time, I seem to be having unusual troubles in connection with your visit when I want them least. It is probably just as well that you are not coming next week, considering Harold's jury duty and the added fact that Peggy is working as a census enumerator. For a lot of complicated reasons, April 28-29 now looks possible but very unappealing. May, on the other hand, is good, and I am most eager to pick a time when we won't be crowded by other things. May 12 and 13 is altogether clear. May 5 and 6 just as good for me, though Harold will not be here on the 6th. You decide and let me know which it will be.

Best wishes.

Sincerely yours,

Dear Don:

May 12 and 13 it is, and my fervent apologies for all the backing and filling. And let Miss North know, please, that she is welcome here next week.

I am pleased to hear that Jim Prothro will be working with you. He is not only a good man but I know that you two operate as an effective team.

Let me know before you arrive what your schedule will be.

Until then -- and good luck in your efforts to persuade Maggie,

Sincerely yours,

Dear Don:

We shall expect you Thursday in time for lunch. The Airport bus comes by our corner, usually; if you ask the driver to let you off at or near the corner or Auburn and Ivy, he may do so, and then again he may not. The first regular stop is the Piedmont Hotel, about five blocks from the office.

You will be spending the night with us.

There are several people at the Atlanta University center whom I think you ought to see. Rather than setting up individual appointments, I have asked Dean Brazeal at Morehouse College to try to arrange a meeting with three or four people some time Friday.

With best wishes,

Sincerely yours,

Professor Donald R. Matthews
Department of Political Science
University of North Carolina
Chapel Hill, N. C.

Dear Don:

We are sending you a list of Negro office holders. We are certain that it is not complete, and in most cases our information is dated. It does, however, represent the best compilation we have on hand.

The clips are the product of a once-over check of our files for information on Negro voters' leagues. In addition to the ones cited in the clips, there is the state-wide Virginia Voters League, and there are the Tuskegee (Alabama) Civic Association and the Haywood County (Tennessee) Voters League. We are enclosing also a list of local citizens council units. Undoubtedly this is an incomplete listing, but it is the best we can do without taking considerably more time. On this item you might want to check in with Vander Zander at Duke.

There are no figures on voter registration in Tennessee. In our pamphlet, The Negro and the Ballot in the South, we mention an estimate of 185,000, attributed to "a veteran capitol reporter" (Fred Travis, the Chattanooga Times); see pp. 8 and 9. I am enclosing a copy of Travis's letter. You are free to use any of this information except Travis's name and can attribute any of it to us that you wish, though I hardly think that is necessary.

Glad to have evidence that you are hard at work. We all have great expectations for what may come out of it.

By the time you get this I suppose your boy Kennedy will be our boy, although I still plan to cast one silent, reluctant vote for him in November, and then to creep away from the polls unhappy about a country which can cast up for its post of highest leadership only two such people as Dick Nixon and Jack Kennedy. I think that basically they are much alike: synthetic men, shaped and contrived to suit a mood, fill out a pattern, and to be immune from tactical errors.

Sincerely yours,

Leslie W. Dunbar
Director of Research

Subject: Comments on the Zinn manuscript

1. Page 1, second paragraph: The comment on the "participation of young southern whites" - I am not aware of any considerable white participation in the Albany situation.

2. The same paragraph: Is it fair to charge the administration with "cautiousness approaching timidity"?

3. Page 12, 4th paragraph: Did the Tuesday demonstration consist of "400 high school and college students"? I was not aware that it was so overwhelmingly made up of young people.

4. Page 13, 2nd paragraph: I would not designate Jim Foreman as "a leader of many desegregation struggles".

5. Page 14, 2nd paragraph: Wyatt Tee Walker was also in the SCLC group. Is it accurate to indicate that persons other than King himself were invited from SCLC?

6. Page 15, 2nd paragraph: Should there not be some mention of the press conference held by Page of the Albany movement declaring the local nature of the movement. Most of the maneuvering that day was between SNCC, SCLC, and the Albany movement. I am not aware that there was NAACP involvement at that time, as was noted in this paragraph.

7. Page 18. I don't think that the comments on agency competition are adequate. If this subject is to be handled, it should be at greater ~~length~~ length and not simply in answer to published reports.

8. Page 19. 2nd paragraph. I think it questionable to use the Communist analogy in analyzing this situation. I question whether there needs to be a discussion of outsiders as such.

9. Page 21, 1st paragraph. This particular line of argumentation seems to me not particularly relevant to the subject.

10. Page 22, 2nd paragraph. There was a Herald reporter on hand at least some of the time while I was in Albany.

11. Page 24. I believe that this entire analysis of the police situation should be carefully gone over. We need to be clear on our legal bases.

12. Page 27. 2nd paragraph. The comments on the total penalogical failure of the nation seems to me, again, superfulous editorializing.

13. Page 31. Following. I'm not sure that this much evaluation of what the federal government might have done is useful or that I would accept all of the logic involved. This requires careful analysis.

General comments. I think this study will be of the greatest value if it is primarily a consideration of a new technique, applied in McComb and again in Albany, through the catalytic agency of SNCC agents coming into the community. This seems to me not sufficiently an evaluation of these tactics and too much an analysis of just another local difficulty. I think further that there is too much pamphleteering and editorializing to give the impression of an objective and careful analysis.

Comments on Frances Pauley's comments.

1. Her reactions to page 13. If the details of the negotiations are going to be reported in the analysis, they should also include the fact that while the white negotiators were attempting to convince these city commissioners to accept the report, the Negroes sent over another document listing a series of differing demands from those agreed upon earlier by the negotiating group. This document was signed by one of the Negroes who had been on the interracial committee. As one of the white negotiators, Mr. Wilson, told me, this was "the last straw."

2. Her comments on page 20. If don't believe its quite accurate to give the impression that the SNCC people were as much outsiders as representatives of other agencies. During the press conference Sunday, which gave rise to stories of interagency rivalry, Charles Jones and Don Hollowell were present and participated in the conference called by the Albany Movement leaders. In fact, the announcement of the press conference was issued by the SNCC office. On that Sunday occasion, the names of members of the executive committee were announced and Charles Jones was listed as a member. That night, it is true, Jones was dropped as an executive committee member, to strengthen the impression of a local movement. I had the understanding that his being dropped at that time was purely pro forma.

Notes on Albany Report

Page 1. Too much emphasis on students and young people. The Albany movement, asfar as I could see was mostly adult. One of the fine things about it is that it is a cross section, of the Negro community. However Mr. Hommes found many who were against the movement and many who were apathetic.

Page 4. The usual rumors of how much the people were paid was mentioned here and also later. This was not refuted. There was great difficulty in raising the money for the tickets for the Thursday morning sit in in the bus station. Money was very scarce.

Page 9. The NAACP had already been working on registration also. I wonder about this SNCC figure on registrations. SNCC had bee n primarily interested in regsitration in Terrill county, I was given to understand.

The connection with NaaCP Youth Council and SNCC should be checked because Chapman, the NAACP leader told me he had been by-passed by SNCC. I'll try to check this again while I'm in Albany this trip.

Page 11. Chalres Jones testimony in court was interesting, I understand. Why did he tell the Albany Police the riders were coming? and also why did he tell the newspaper?

Page 13. The sequence of events on Thursday is not altogether correct.
There were no demonstrations except the group who went to the bus tickets, bought tickets to Tallahasee, some had coffee, were arrested, jailed, and later returned to the bus station under police guard. This was a little before ten in the morning. Before lunch, I had contacted one minister who went to the City Hall (Later to be a member of the negotiating committee) had gotten through to the mayor through a prominent business man, had ~~xxxxxxMarion~~ notifued Marion Page to go to see the Mayor for the first interview which led to the negotiating committee. ~~The~~ We were working as fast as possible to keep from having another demonstartion and jailing that day. By two O'clock the negotiating committee was meeting. They continued to meet with a break for supper until 10 P.M. These six were: (Don't have the names at home-- if you want them I have them at the office) The Negroes were chosen by the executive committee of the movement-- and the Mayor appointed the thee whites-- Rev. Fred. ~~Smitx~~ Wilson, Rosenberg (business) Caldwell(business) Negroes----

+ Mrs Wright

I do not know the exact time of all the Washingto n phone calls. The Negotiations did continue until noon on Friday or shortly after. Rev. Wilson thought they had made good progress because they were in agreement on releasing the prisoners on their own bond; ope ning the bus and railway terminals; continuing negotiations. The disgreement was on the point of the original 11 Freedom riders, whose ~~trial had been~~ hearing had been that Thursday afternoon and they had been returned to jail with a higher bond and another charge. The F.B.I. had been asked for reports on these 11. The reports had not been received.

The report of the negotiating committee was turned in to the Mayor who called t he commission in session.(They had been in almost continual session). The commission continued to meet in secret with no answer given. It seemed that they were stalling for time-- perhaps until King would leave town-- perhap s just refeusing ~~the~~ to face the decision. It was ru mored that the vote was 4 to 3 not to accept the committee report. The Mayor being one of the three.

Friday P.M.

Page 14. I think the quotes used from the King speech were not the best. He was not inflammatory-- but calm-- he did not call upon the Negroes to march again. Of course he did tell them to continue working-- but for the feedom of the white as well as the Negro.

Anderson's statement has been over emphasized in the press. He did say it as a final word which many didn't hear, because the crowd was breaking.

King went to two churches. The people had been promised that the overflow could hear-- that a speaker system would be installed. But the city would not give a per mit to put the line across the street. So King spoke both places. A longer speech at Shiloh where the camers and radio were. Ruby also spoke at both places.

After the Negroes received the rude, curt, answer from the Mayor on Saturday morning. They were silent (Anderon Page, King,Abernathy, Hollowell , Atty King, Walker etc) then King said "Lets try one more time to negotiate"-- and they called the Mayor who agreed to see a small committee. Anderson, Page, Atty King and Hollowell went------ these negotiations started about 10:30 and lasted until mid-afternoon before they failed.

Page 20. The Wed. night I attended the steering committee meeting Jim Foreman and Chas. Jones were there. But they very defi nitely were not a part of the group. They were as much an outsider as I. Some of their suggestions were accepted and many were not. They seemed to be very careful to stay out of the decisions. They were not in favor of inviting King dowwm All of the local steering committee were eager for King to come. The telegram was worded and sent that night asking him to come.

Page 24--- I'm uncertain about the attack on the police. The papers did compliment them too much. But they did keep from having violence. However I never saw more than a handful or rough ~~whitex~~ looking whites.

Page 27. . From what I was told by ~~the~~ Negroes, Charles Sherrod's treatment wasn't quite as bad as it sounds here.

Page 29. . Where was the Federal Govt.? I may be very wrong, Les, but I think those white people have got to wake up and make some decisions themselves, and give in to some extent without the federal governement. It all happened so fast-- I can't think -- the federal government was all that bad.

Give the local community a chance---- Albany refused to take it. But they did learn. Those business men I talked with were plenty upset-- too. They weren' t taking it calmly. . they were quiet-- everyone was quiet, we hope something-

I simply don't know about unlawful arrest-- When isit?

Page 34. . I don't buy the Conclusion at all.---- at least not the first paragraph.

O.K. That's it. . I'm afraid this isn't very helpful. . Hope some of it will be--

I'm off at noon for Albany. Anderson says it is O.K. for Vernon and me to be there. Paul and Art are helping us prepare. We'll try to do a good job. . . I'll phone you.

INTRODUCTION

Advances in civil rights of Negroes in the South during the past decade have been ~~associated with~~ accompanied by ~~strategies unique~~ unique strategies in the field of race relations, ~~with~~ which have varying degrees of effectiveness in their reults. Although the principle of non-violence has operated at the core of Southern Negro protest over the last seven years, the specific techniques ~~in~~ used to induce change has ranged from a prolonged mass boycott in the Montgomery bus protest, to the student sit-ins in lunch counter desegregation, to the Freedom Rides in efforts to desegregate bus and train terminals.

The recent demonstrations in Albany, Ga., combine~~x~~ these major strategies in a single situation. The Albany movement, like the Montgomery boycott, is broad-based, cutting across age and class groups within the Negro community. The initiating spark that gave birth to the movement was ~~a sit-in~~ an attempt by members of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee — in the tradition of the Freedom Rides — ~~and the target of this group -- as the Freedom Riders -- was the~~ to test~~ing of~~ the I.C.C. regulations concerning public accommodation facilities in carriers involved in interstate travel.

It is partly because the Albany demonstrations represent a marked variation on recent methods for attacking segregation, and partly because of a concern for providing the background against which crucial decisions are likely to be made, that this on-the-spot ~~survey~~ report was undertaken. At least two crucial decisions presently confront the city of Albany, Ga. What action should the City Commission take on the recommendations prepared by the Albany Movement at its meeting ~~originally scheduled for~~ which was postponed from January 11 ~~now postponed to~~ to Febrauary 23?

How will the expulsion of over 40 students from Albany State College for participation in the demonstrations affect the tense equilibrium now present in this deep South city?

Athens Riot Trial Plans Still Lacking

Another term of criminal court is about to begin in Athens, and there still are no definite plans for trying 11 persons indicted in connection with the desegregationriot at the University of Georgia, according to Sol. Gen. Marshall Pollock.

Criminal court week will begin Jan.15, and Sol. Gen. Pollock said Saturday he will call the year-old cases for trial. However, he said he had no intention of dropping the charges. "I just don't know if they'll be tried now," he said.

INDICTED IN connection with rioting when the university admitted two Negro students, were two students and nine Atlanta area men, eight of whom were admitted Klan Klux Klansmen.

Their trials have been postponed from the April, July and October terms of court.

ALBANY STUDENT PENALTY STRESSED

By Gordon Roberts

An Albany attorney contended Saturday that Negroes suspended from Albany State College were dealt with more harshly than white students who took part in anti-integration riots at the University of Georgia last year.

C.B. King, who represents about 40 Negro students who have been suspended thus far at Albany, charged that punitive action was taken against them "for doing what they had a right todo", while white university students were not punished for participating in "mob action."

The suspended Negroes will appeal their cases, if necessary, to federal court, Mr. King said. Appeal procedure calls for seeking a rehearing at the college, and that failing, to ask the University System Board of Regents to review the suspensions.

* * *

THE NEGRO STUDENTS were suspended for taking part in anti-degregation demonstrations in mid-December, which for the most part involved "freedom" marches to the Albany Cith Hall.

Mr. King said he knows personally of at least 40 who have been suspended, but the number could run as high as 100. He said there were about that many Albany State students arrested as a result of the demonstrations. STUDENTS WERE CHARGED WITH "CONDUCT" DETRIMENTAL TO ALBANY STATE COLLEGE." COLLEGE OFFICIALS WERE STILL HOLDING CLOSED DISCIPLINARY HEARINGS SATURDAY MORNING.

In appealing the cases, Mr. King said he would contend that the Negroes were ousted for doing what they had a right to do, but white University of Georgia students were allowed to stay, though what happened there last January "was clearly mob action."

(According to university officials, three university students -- two of whom were indicted by a grand jury for allegedly participating in the riot -- were suspended, but were cleared to return to the University after being out about one quarter. Two other students withdrew while university action was still pending against them.

ATTORNEY KING ALSO NOTED THAT THE ALBANY DEMONSTRATIONS OCCURRED AFTER SCHOOL HOURS OR WHILE THE NEGROES WERE OUT FOR THE HOLIDAYS, AND THAT THEY DID NOT OCCUR ON THE COLLEGE CAMPUS.

College President William H. Dennis reportedly has received from the State Law Department advice on the actions he is taking. There also are rumors in Albany that University System Regent Roy Harris, an arch-segregationist, has advised President Dennis.

HOWEVER, Mr. Harris Saturday said that report was without foundation, that he has not discussed the situation with the college president. He said the regents did discuss it at a recent meeting, but decided to let President Dennis handle the matter.

Meanwhile, Regent Chairman Robert O. Arnold supported Mr. Dennis in the suspensions.

Dear Mr. Zinn:

I have just completed reading your report for the Southern Regional Council on Albany and find I must admit you have out-reported newsmen on the job. Splendid! I received the report in the mail this morning and could not wait until reaching home to read it.

It is well organized, oriented, and lucid. Many of the features of the report were news to me -- a reporter who arrived in Albany December 11.

Having covered Freedom Rides in Jackson, Mississippi and racial developments in McComb, Mississippi before Albany the report is something I have longed to do myself ... this is what, and justly, must be done after white citizens in a secluded city discover they have been wrong for years about the feelings of their Negro brother.

I am grateful to you beyond words for sending me a copy of Special Report on Albany. It is tops in every respect. I am especially happy that you included the section on "outside" influences. It is studies of this kind which are based upon factual information and presented objectively that are somuch needed. Not only are you to be congratulated on the report, but the manner in which you have presented it.

...your report on Albany was magnificent. We read it aloud ...one night until after midnight. My hand is shaking slightly with both emotion and cold. I was about to write asking if you could not get it published in book form - a Bantam paperback or something - anything to give it the widest possible readership.

The report is the best kind of history - the only meaningful journalism, and the really fine sense of language made it that much more impressive. To write about social injustice without screaming, without somehow enhancing one's own moral value at the expense of the subject material is most difficult.

...Before I close, however, I must add just a word or two about the latest special report of the SRC, Zinn's memorandum on Albany. In my not in the least humble opinion, it is one of the best of the SRC has published (sic.). It is beautifully written, perceptive, and does not in the least confuse objectivity with partisanship. I believe it is an outstanding bit of reporting, and I trust it will receive wide circulation.

And on that good word I will close.

Dear Sirs:

I have received and read this date of your excellent Special Report entitled "Albany," by Howard Zinn.

I hereby request that a similar type report be made on the Baton Rouge situation. It is felt that this would be most helpful both nationally and locally.

Howard Zinn's "Albany" just arrived in today's mail and I want to take this opportunity to tell you how appreciative I am that you include me in your mailings of the Council's "special reports."

I find the material invaluable. It comes in very handy in lectures, in preparing articles, and currently in writing a textbook on minority relations that I have under contract.

Slowly developing anger and unpublicized dignified protest by Negro adults -- a dramatic outburst of Negro students to bring the issues to public attention -- and then a new synthesis of adult-student leadership marshaling the forces of the entire Negro community: this has been the developmental pattern in a number of southern protest movements these past few years, and so it was in Albany.

Two weeks before Christmas, 1961, 737 persons in the Black Belt city of Albany, Georgia -- college students, professionals, working people, and children -- marched, prayed, sang, and went to jail to try to force open doors shut tight to Negroes since the city was founded in slavery days.

Into that week of protest and excitement was compressed every major issue debated today in the changing South: the enforcement of national law by local authorities hostile to that law; the absence of communication between whites and Negroes living close together in a small southern city; the ambitions of local politicians; factionalism in Negro leadership; monopoly of the press and television; charges of "outside" agitation and "subversive" influence; the peculiar operations of local justice; jailhouse brutality. Intertwined with these were other elements: the remarkable role played by a handful of young people, already veterans of several prisons, devoted to a philosophy of non-violence in an atmosphere of police repression; the participation of a few young southern whites, trying to pay with personal sacrifice the debt of their ancestors for ten generations; the awkward cautiousness of a national administration.

The following report is based on newspaper accounts in Atlanta and Albany, and on-the-spot talks with the mayor, businessmen, deputy sheriffs, white ministers, politicians, local editors, Negro leaders both local and national, men and women just emerged from prison, young Freedom Riders in and out of the county jailhouse, white local people unconnected with the city leadership, and Negroes not involved in the demonstrations.

Albany, Georgia

Many Georgians call it All-benny. Andrew Jackson drove the Indians from the flat, wooded plain so that cotton could become king here and all over the deep South before the Civil War. This was slave plantation country, and Albany was its trading center, incorporated in 1841 to become the seat of Dougherty County. DuBois, in The Souls of Black Folk, describes the area as it was in those days:

> For a radius of a hundred miles about Albany stretched a great fertile land, luxuriant with forests of pine, oak, ash, hickory, and poplar, hot with the sun and damp with the rich black swampland; and here the cornerstone of the Cotton Kingdom was laid.

At the turn of the century, blacks outnumbered whites five to one, and Albany was a placid little town, slavery gone and segregation firmly in its place.

Today the city is a four-hour drive straight south from Atlanta, past scraggly cotton, clusters of Black Angus cattle, and beautiful brown fields of pecan trees. Across Kinchafoonee Creek, on the banks of the Flint River, it is wide-avenued and clean, a commercial center for southwest Georgia, trading corn, cattle, and pecans, attracting tourists, new industry, and travelers heading toward Florida. "Tenth fastest booming city in the U.S.A.," the man at the Chamber of Commerce said proudly. "There's the rating -- in black and white." We both must have had the same thought.

The black majority has gone down to 42% since World War II -- 23,000 Negroes out of a total of 56,000 -- making it possible for political leaders to say now, as one did sitting back in his swivel chair, "We need to listen to the majority." In the practicality of it, however, democracy often counts voices rather than heads, and in the year 1961 the spoken demands of 40% may sound thunderous in contrast with the century-long silence of that overwhelming majority which once made the Black Belt really black.

A History of "Good Race Relations"

Again and again -- in the office of a political leader, in the anteroom of a businessman, sitting with a newspaper editor, in the living room of a middle-class white family -- the statement was made, "Albany has always had good race relations.... Our colored folks have been satisfied.... We have made considerable progress...." In a nation with ten thousand history teachers, memories remain poor; for the same statements were made in Montgomery before the bus boycott, in Atlanta before the sit-ins, and all through the South in the days of slavery.

Yet, the argument cannot be dismissed without meeting it, for it rests on stubborn facts: that the relations in Albany were peaceful; that the Negro community raised no shouts of dissatisfaction; that progress had been made. It is only when they are moved out of simple isolation into the texture of life itself that these undisputed facts become part of a much more complex vision of Negro life.

In a market where social goods are unevenly distributed, peace must always be paid for. The price, paid in the South by blacks and received by whites, has begun in recent years to seem not quite right. And the mistaking of silence for satisfaction has often been the ruin of a dominant group in the social order, who usually pay little attention until centuries of accumulated grievances gather and explode in a chain reaction. The white South has been notably unequipped with the kind of social seismograph that would detect the first faint tremors of unrest, and too far out of touch with Negroes (the physical proximity of blacks and whites at work in Albany and elsewhere is offset by the social distance inherent in unequal status) to hear any but the loudest noises. Thus, southern whites have been hurt and shocked by the eruptions of the past few years.

In Albany, deep in the Black Belt, the shock of the pre-Christmas protest was particularly great. This was so because white and Negro residents have starkly different perceptions of the city in which they live.

A city political leader respected by many Negroes, twice mayor of Albany and a law partner of the present mayor, cannot believe that Albany Negroes are dissatisfied. Mr. James W. "Taxi" Smith (a champion runner in college, he once got tired in a cross-country race and took a cab the rest of the way) stated, "Outside agitators have caused all this trouble. Those Freedom Riders are getting $100 a day. Minimum! Some getting $200. Albany Negroes," he went on, "got as fair trials as white folks. Same crime, same sentence." (On the other side of town, the story was different. A Negro businessman whose independence irritated the city fathers, it was said, was fined $400 for a traffic offense.) As for juries, Negroes got on the lists, Mr. Smith said. A question about Negroes on actual trial juries brought a serious look, perhaps even a twinge of uneasiness; one got the feeling that he, as a lawyer, found it hard to square his professional ethic with the consistent exclusion of Negroes from juries. "Well, I don't know. I don't think it will work in this situation."

"Progress" rivals "satisfaction" in the frequency of its occurrence in the white comments on race relations in Albany. The history of these relations in the city was one of progress, intelligent and good-hearted white people said again and again. Like the confusion of peace with satisfaction, and silence with consent, here is another failure to understand the complexities of social change. The evidence is strong that it is precisely progress which brings the clamor for more progress. The American colonies on the eve of the Revolution, France under Louis XVI, Russia in the early 20th century, India and some of the African territories in our time were all making remarkable progress when the social fabric was burst by revolution. For progress creates expectations, and if its pace (no matter how swift compared to the past) does not match the ballooning of expectations, it is not enough.

This century has created expectations for Negro Americans which cannot be satisfied by the air-conditioned segregated school pointed to pridefully by the civic leaders of Albany, and by a friendly young cab driver. Albany Negroes live on clean and pleasant -- if unpaved -- streets in a town where roses bloom in December and there are no concrete skyscrapers or billowing smokestacks to keep out the fragrance and beauty of the surrounding countryside. White Albanians are friendly and helpful in personal contact. White lawyers have defended Negro clients. "A.T. Walden /Atlanta's venerated Negro attorney/ would phone me from Atlanta and ask me to handle this case for a poor colored boy. And I'd do it."

In Mayor McAfee's administration in the early 1950's, streets were paved in some Negro areas, the Negro football field was lighted, and a liaison committee kept contact with the Negro community. When the committee wanted to go beyond the paving of streets, and started talking about hiring Negro policemen, it fell into disuse. And then there is -- it must be mentioned at least twice, to give a slight notion of how often it is mentioned by Albany's white leaders -- the air-conditioned school.

To the Negro community, however -- and this is one of the hardest things for whites in Albany to understand -- all this was like improving the food inside a prison; for all progress was within the framework of a sharply segregated society. While in Albany's natural landscape, greens, yellows,and browns blend imperceptibly, its library, schools, hotels,and other public accommodations are all designated either black or white.

A Negro arriving in Albany on the colored part of the bus, enters a colored waiting room, drinks from a colored fountain, uses a colored restroom, has to walk eight blocks to find a restaurant which will feed a colored person, and must pass by five white hotels to find a modest Negro motel -- a better one is six miles away. He had better not get into trouble, for the entire machinery of justice in Albany is bound up with skin color. The courts are segregated, the jails are segregated, the judges, juries, sheriffs, deputies, and city police are all white. Tax forms for Negroes have a special color. There are no Negroes in city or county government, but there are well-educated, cultured, and competent Negroes in Albany who could move tomorrow into the highest municipal offices and bring credit to the community. Negroes in Albany get jobs on the basis of ability, but only after color has narrowed the field to a slit. "If I can do a job as good as a white man, why shouldn't I have it?" a Negro porter asked me as we stood on the steps of the white church where he was employed.

To see the situation on the most elemental level, a white man must somehow recognize that no Negro in downtown Albany can stoop to a water fountain before making sure it is labeled "colored." On a level both more abstract and more heartfelt, whites need to comprehend, even dimly, the attack on his dignity felt by every Negro adult male who is called "boy." There is a basic hurt attached to being an American Negro -- both North and South -- which cannot be conveyed by any cold list of specific grievances.

In Albany, there has been no way for fair-minded white people to know these things. There has been contact, but it has been superficial. There has been exchange of words, not of feelings. But if communications inside that little city are crude, between Albany Negroes and the outside world they are as advanced as modern science can make them through radio, television, air travel, national newspapers, and magazines. And there are the mails, no longer closed, as in Abolitionist days, to the arguments for racial equality. Besides this there is the fact that several thousands of Albany's population are attached to Air Force or Marine Corps units in the area -- integrated units. Young Albany Negroes have gone to college in other parts of the country. The only college in the city -- Albany State College for Negroes -- long quiescent, is now sensitive to the winds blowing from Atlanta, Nashville, and Greensboro which tell of student demonstrations and protests and remarkable changes, fought and then accepted, in the once-adamant South.

All of these influences have acted on Albany Negroes and created expectations far beyond the crawling progress and kindly tolerance which Albany's white leaders thought -- and think -- sufficient. The white community somehow has not faced the idea that Albany cannot escape the general upheaval shaking the South today.

Something was necessary to shake the white community into the first pang of such awareness. So, around Thanksgiving, 1961, the Albany Movement was born.

The Albany Movement

On the first of November, 1961, a white college girl from Memphis named Selyn McCollum raced through the streets and back alleys of Albany to evade the police, took refuge in a Negro home, slipped out in a makeshift disguise to make her way to the bus terminal, and stationed herself in a position to watch nine young Negroes ordered out of the white waiting room. It was the day that the new Interstate Commerce Commission ruling for desegregation of train and bus facilities went into effect. Within 48 hours, the Department of Justice was notified that this ruling had been violated.

Behind the action of those young people in Albany that day was a history of rising indignation in the Negro community of that city. Slowly developing anger and unpublicized dignified protest by Negro adults -- a dramatic outburst of Negro students to bring the issues to public attention -- and then a new synthesis of adult-student leadership marshaling the forces of the entire Negro community: this has been the developmental pattern in a number of southern protest movements these past few years, and so it was in Albany.

The demonstrations in Albany had their roots in two race relations incidents, both occurring in the winter of 1961. Early in January of that year, a group of Negro leaders presented the city commissioners with a request to initiate the desegregation of certain city facilities. It is reported that the commissioners never replied to this request. On February 6, the Albany Herald, edited by James H. Gray, Chairman of the Georgia Democratic Party and a leading southern segregationist, published an editorial rejecting the Negroes' request both presently and also for the future. This action brought into the open a long-standing feud between the Negro community and the city's only daily newspaper. Negro leaders contend that the newspaper's editorials had the effect of inciting action against Negroes. In February and March, sporadic incidents occurred around the Albany State College campus, in which marauding whites in automobiles threw eggs, fired shots, and once tried to run down a Negro student. The Dean of Students at Albany State, a dynamic young woman named Irene Asbury Wright, newly wed to an Air Force lieutenant stationed in Albany, resigned in protest over the college administration's timidity in defending the students. (She and her husband were later to become leading figures in the Albany Movement.) Before going off for the summer, Albany State students staged a protest march on the president's office.

The Negro ministerial alliance had written a letter to Mr. Gray asking fair treatment. The ministers next sent a registered letter to Mayor Asa D. Kelley, asking for a hearing, and proposing a biracial committee to discuss Albany's race relations. There was no response.

It was against this background of local unrest, frustration, and developing action that the Atlanta-based Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) in September, 1961, sent a team into Albany to register Negro voters. SNCC was born out of the sit-in struggles of 1960 and staffed by a small group of young people who had experienced jailings in the sit-ins and beatings in the 1961 Freedom Rides. They set up an office in a run-down little building two blocks from the Shiloh Baptist Church, registered voters, and through their enthusiasm and energy acted as a catalyst to a community which had already begun to stir.

When the I.C.C. ruling was handed down, SNCC, whose members had gone to jail through the summer to force this ruling, was ready to test it the very first day of its existence in the segregated terminals of Albany. That is why on November 1, Charles Sherrod and Cordell Reagan, two veterans of the Freedom Rides, rode down to Albany from Atlanta on the Trailways bus, with white Selyn McCollum deliberately sitting apart from them but prepared to witness later that day the test of the new ruling. The sight of police waiting for them at the terminal produced Selyn's hour-long race through Albany streets before she could slip, undetected, into her intended refuge, a Negro home. When, later that afternoon, she made her way back to the terminal, and watched the students being ordered out of the white waiting room, the SNCC mission was accomplished, and she took the bus back to Atlanta.

In the meantime, the Youth Council of the local NAACP had made plans to test the I.C.C. ruling and began to work with SNCC. There was some uncertainty by NAACP adults about SNCC's entrance into the situation. It was partly in an attempt to rectify this confusion about roles, partly to gather into a cohesive organization the loose and lengthening strands of discontent in the Negro community, that the Albany Movement was formed on November 17, 1961, about two weeks after the SNCC action at the Trailways Terminal.

Oddly enough, it was Mayor Asa D. Kelley himself, worried on the eve of his re-election over the possibility of a Negro write-in vote, who asked to meet with Negro leaders. Assembled to prepare for this meeting, they formed the Albany Movement, a coalition of the colored ministerial alliance, NAACP, SNCC, and other Negro organizations. They named local osteopath Dr. W. G. Anderson as president, retired railroader Marion Page as secretary, and expressed their determination to attack discrimination at a number of key points: bus and train stations, libraries, parks, hospitals, buses, jury representation, public and private employment, and police brutality.

As one of the leaders of the Albany Movement saw its birth, "The kids were going to do it anyway...they were holding their own mass meetings and making plans...; we didn't want them to have to do it alone." Thus, the third element fell into place; after slow local build-up and sharp action by the youngsters, the coalescing of all forces into a united and militant movement took place. Now, the next reconnaissance action in the desegregation campaign would find massive reinforcements ready to act.

The I.C.C. Ruling and the Albany Police

That first move came Wednesday morning, November 22, 1961, three weeks after the I.C.C. ruling forbidding segregation in terminal facilities, when three members of the Youth Council of the NAACP in Albany, Evelyn Toney, Eddie Wilson, and Julian Carswell, entered the Trailways bus terminal and bought tickets to Tallahassee in the white waiting room. They sat down undisturbed, then went into the restaurant and ordered something to eat. The waiter started to serve them when Chief of Police Pritchett appeared and called them outside the station to tell them that if they went back into the lunchroom he would arrest them. The students turned away silently, re-entered the lunchroom, and were promptly arrested for breach of the peace. There were only a few people in the terminal at the time. In a half hour, the three were out on bond.

Later that afternoon, hundreds of Albany State students arrived at the terminal to go home for the Thanksgiving holidays. The new Dean of Students of Albany State College was there to point out the colored waiting room, which most of them used. Two students, however, Bertha Gober of Atlanta and Blanton Hall of Athens, went into the white waiting room and were arrested. They decided to remain in jail rather than accept bail of $100. They were soon out of jail, but expelled from Albany State College without a hearing.

The Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, in consultation with the Negro community of Albany, decided to test once again the much-broken I.C.C. ruling. A group of eight young people, Negro and white, men and women, took the Central of Georgia in Atlanta on Sunday morning, December 10, sat together in the "white" car, ignored a conductor's demand that they move, and continued that way on to Albany. Over a hundred Albany Negroes gathered at the Albany Union Railway Terminal to meet them. It was about 3:30 in the afternoon, a quiet time in Albany, with little traffic and few whites near the station. The soft-spoken Negro editor of the Southwest Georgian, A.C. Searles, watched the scene, said later, "Reason there were all these folks waiting -- we know by experience that if you come alone, you may get a beating. Having people around helps." Waiting also for the eight riders were police and newspaper reporters. They got off the train, went into the white waiting room, and sat down. Police Chief Pritchett told them to get out. They left with Charles Jones. (a widely-known leader of the student movement since the Charlotte sit-ins, and in charge of the SNCC Albany office) and Bertha Gober to cars outside the terminal which were waiting to take them into town. The group now numbered ten. Editor Searles reported, "I try to get close enough to hear, but not close enough to get spoken to." He said he heard Police Chief Pritchett call out, "I told you to get off the street. You are all under arrest." Some of the ten were already getting into cars. All of them were now ordered into the paddy wagon, along with Willie Mae Jones, an Albany student who was in the crowd watching. The eleven were charged with obstructing traffic, disorderly conduct, and failure to obey an officer, with bond set at $200.

Police Chief Pritchett's version, as reported in the press, was, "I told the demonstrators to move away from the terminal three times; then we called the paddy wagon and I gave the order to arrest them. We will not stand for these troublemakers coming into our city for the sole purpose of disturbing the peace and quiet of the city of Albany."

Editor Searles interpreted the incident as follows: "There was no traffic, no disturbance, no one moving. The students had made the trip to Albany desegregated without incident. Things had gone so smoothly I think it infuriated the chief. There was a good feeling in the group. They wanted to stop this."

Mass Arrests

Now the Albany Movement went into action and the next seven days saw a series of mass meetings by the Negro community, marches downtown by over a thousand Albany Negroes, singing and praying, asking freedom for the arrested students and, as one woman said after her release from prison, "to get our rights."

When the trial of the eleven was to take place at the city courthouse on Tuesday, December 12, over 400 Negro high school and college students marched downtown to protest, singing as they went by the courthouse. Police cars with loudspeakers ordered them to disperse, they continued to walk, and then they were herded into a 15-foot-wide alley running alongside City Hall, where they waited in a driving rain for two hours as police booked them one by one on the same charges leveled against the Freedom Riders. That night a mass meeting at the Shiloh Baptist Church sang hymns and heard speeches by leaders of the Albany Movement. Many of the jailed were being released on bond, but 153 remained in prison and early the next morning were transferred to neighboring county jails.

On Wednesday, three different demonstrations took place. As court convened in the morning, about 70 Negroes marched downtown and knelt on the sidewalk in front of City Hall to pray. Their spokesman, Slater King, member of a distinguished Negro family in Albany, was arrested and sentenced to five days for contempt of court. In the early evening, 300 Negroes made one slow circuit around City Hall, returned to the Shiloh Baptist Church, re-formed, marched back to City Hall, and were arrested on charges of unlawful assembly, parading without a permit, and unlawfully congregating on the sidewalk. Chief of Police Pritchett told newsmen, "We can't tolerate the NAACP or the SNCC or any other nigger organization to take over this town with mass demonstrations."

That same day, the original 11 were bound over from the city to county court on a new state charge of unlawful assembly. Charles Jones was released on $1000 bond and took his place in the leadership of the surging Albany Movement. Bernard Lee, young staff member of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, left prison to return to his duties in Atlanta, and Tom Hayden, a white youth from Royal Oak, Michigan, was released to fulfill a speaking engagement up North. Remaining in the county jail back of Elm Street for part or all of the next seven days were: Lenora Taitt, a Spelman College graduate and veteran of the Atlanta sit-ins; Norma Collins, business manager of the SNCC office in Atlanta; Willie Mae Jones, the young Albany woman arrested "by accident"; James Forman, Executive Director of SNCC; Bertha Gober, the Albany State College expellee; and three young white people -- Per Laursen, a writer from Denmark; Robert Zellner, active in recent protest movements and a white girl, the last two, Southerners born and bred.

By Thursday, the total arrested reached 560, with 300 of these remaining in jail. That day Governor Ernest Vandiver called 150 National Guardsmen to duty in Albany and wires began arriving in Attorney General Kennedy's office (from SNCC to "stop illegal mass arrests," and from some faculty and students at Spelman College in Atlanta to "intervene in the Albany situation"). Governor Vandiver and Mayor Kelley assured the Attorney General that they could handle the situation. Albany Movement chairman, W. G. Anderson, talked by phone with the Assistant Attorney General. That day, too, ten Negroes were served coffee at the Trailways lunchroom, were arrested, jailed and later returned to the bus station under police guard, then released.

Late that night, three whites and three Negroes -- in each group one minister and two businessmen -- began negotiations to end the crisis. Neither negotiating team, though designated to discuss terms, was empowered to decide on a settlement. The negotiations continued all Friday morning and broke up at noon, with agreement on acceptance of bus and train desegregation and on release of all the Negro marchers, but disagreement on the release of the original Freedom Riders without bond.

On Friday night, Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr., invited by the Albany Movement Executive Committee, arrived from Atlanta with Rev. Ralph Abernathy and spoke to a packed prayer meeting at the Shiloh Baptist Church. King told the more-than-1000 assembled listeners, "Don't stop now. Keep moving. Don't get weary. We will wear them down with our capacity to suffer." Ruby Hurley, Southeastern Regional Director of the NAACP spoke, too. "There are only two languages the white politicians and the power structure understand. One is the power of the almighty dollar bill. When those cash registers are not ringing they understand what you're talking about. They also understand the ballot." And the Albany Movement's chairman, Dr. W. G. Anderson, told the meeting, "Be here at 7 o'clock in the morning. Eat a good breakfast. Wear warm clothes and wear your walking shoes."

Meanwhile, the city commission was meeting and balking at release of the Freedom Riders without bond. In the wee hours of Saturday morning, the Albany Movement sent a wire to Mayor Kelley which he received late, at 9:30 a.m., and interpreted as an ultimatum. The wire set a 10:00 a.m. deadline after which demonstrations would resume, and the mayor responded by accusing the Negro leadership of "threats" and "bad faith." The Albany Board of Commissioners rejected the terms proposed by the Negro leadership.

At the intercession of some leaders in the Albany Movement, the mayor agreed to see a small committee. The negotiations resumed at 10:30 a.m., Saturday, but were broken off by early Saturday afternoon.

Saturday evening, December 16, came the climax of the demonstrations and mass arrests as Martin Luther King, Jr., and W. G. Anderson led 250 hymn-singing men, women, and youngsters down Jackson Street toward the county courthouse. Police Chief Pritchett stopped them two blocks from the city hall and asked King if he had a parade permit. King said, "We are simply going to pray at City Hall." Pritchett ordered the entire group arrested for parading without a permit. They were moved into the alley near the city hall, police cars rushed up to seal off the back of the alley, white onlookers were cleared off the sidewalks by police loudspeakers, and the Negroes were led one by one into the police station and booked. A southern white student from Brunswick, Georgia had marched with them and was also jailed. King, Abernathy, and Anderson were sent to Sumter County jail in Americus. Now the total arrested stood at 737, with over 400 people still in jail, many of them farmed out to prisons in nearby counties. Late Saturday night, sound trucks moved through the city calling military personnel back to the Air Force and Marine Corps bases, and police closed bars and liquor stores. The NAACP wired Vice President Johnson, Attorney General Kennedy, Governor Vandiver, and Mayor Kelley, protesting "unwarranted and illegal arrests."

Sunday was a quiet day, but the news vacuum was soon filled by reports of a rift in the movement. James Gray, the Herald editor, appeared on Albany's television station -- of which he is a part owner -- to denounce "outside elements." The Atlanta Constitution quoted an Albany Movement figure as saying, "Why can't these national organizations understand that this is a local movement?"

Negotiations were resumed Monday morning, and continued all that day, with the Albany Movement represented by C. B. King (first and only Negro lawyer in the history of the city); Attorney Donald L. Hollowell of Atlanta, the state's leading handler of civil rights cases; and Marion Page, acting as chairman of the Albany Movement now that Anderson was in jail. These three conferred with the Police Chief, Mayor, and City Attorney at City Hall. Verbal agreement was reached on: the acceptance by the city of desegregation of the train and bus facilities; the release of all the demonstrators from jail on the signing of simple property bonds, with the exception of the remaining eight original Freedom Riders, the reduction of their bond; the calling off of further demonstrations; and a promise by the city to hear the Negro community's case at the first business meeting of the new City Commission.

Late Monday night and up to 5:00 a.m. Tuesday morning, Negro men and women came forth from the jails. Wednesday, in the early afternoon, the eight Freedom Riders walked blinking into the sunlight outside the county jail. The Albany Herald called it a smashing defeat for the city's Negroes. Marion Page said, "We have just begun to fight." And pundits everywhere exchanged their analyses of the pre-Christmas turmoil in Albany, Georgia.

Awaiting the hearing, Albany Negroes have been framing their demands. The City Commission has set the date of the first business meeting for January 23.

And Albany State College has expelled* at least 40 students for participating in the demonstrations. What the city does now will be studied by the entire nation.

Was it Victory or Defeat?

A front-page story in the New York Herald Tribune the day after the Albany settlement called it "one of the most stunning defeats" in the career of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. The Tribune correspondent termed it a "devastating loss of face" for King, said the Albany Movement had been considerably weakened by King's arrival, and noted a "collapse" of Negro pressure. James Gray's Albany Herald quoted from this article to underline its own analysis of the situation as a huge defeat for the Negro community. A young man sitting in the shabby SNCC office, just after his release from jail, was asked how he felt about the agreement. He smiled. "You curse first and then I will."

Undoubtedly, the Albany Movement got little in the way of specific concessions out of the settlement. For the city to agree to the desegregation of the terminal facilities was belated recognition of what became law on November 1. The release of the demonstrators simply restored the situation before the arrests. Trials and jail sentences still hang over everyone at the discretion of the police chief. The City Commission promises to listen, but not necessarily to act.

One immediate and specific gain did result: the establishment beyond question of Negroes' right to use the terminal facilities without discrimination. Despite statements by the mayor and police chief, this was not a fact before the Albany crisis. Today it is a fact. On Wednesday, December 27, the Trailways restaurant re-opened -- it had been closed by order of the Chief of Police when the trouble began -- and 15 Negroes were served without a murmur of resentment.

Still, no long-term assessment of the Albany actions can be based on what was or was not conceded at the moment of settlement. This is a Deep South city, with a hundred-year history of Negro silence and white complacency which has now been shattered for all time. Anyone who sat in the Shiloh Baptist Church at the prayer meeting following the settlement knows that expectations have been raised which will not be stilled without a change in the social patterns of the city. "Albany will never be the same," Attorney Hollowell told the crowd that night, and he was right. The call for a boycott at that meeting came not from the platform but from the crowd, and was echoed by a dozen men and women who stood up amidst a swell of approval and called, with the passion of people who have tasted prison, for Negroes to stay away from the downtown stores.

Analysts may coolly add up the concessions on both sides and come out with a mathematical sum which signifies defeat. But the Negroes of Albany have no such feeling. The Negro porter on the steps of an Albany church said, "No, we're just beginning. Just beginning." And a woman on the Executive Committee of the Albany Movement declared, "We are anything but through with the fight to be full citizens right here in Albany. There's a lot that can't be told right now, and we're trying to go along and see how much good faith will be shown in January. But anybody who thinks this town is going to settle back and be the same as it was has got to be deaf, blind, and dumb."

Is Negro Leadership Split?

There were disagreements among Negroes and Negro organizations in Albany, and some remain. In this observer's view, the stories of "rift" contain some truth but have been exaggerated out of proportion to their size in the total picture. In a successful movement, organizations proliferate and begin to get in one another's way. Personalities clash and egos become involved. But when the enemy is gargantuan, it tends to devour such disagreements before they get too big. The overwhelming need of Negroes in the South for unity against the awesome economic and political power of long-entrenched interests will probably act to keep disagreements within manageable bounds.

"Outside" Influences

James W. "Taxi" Smith is convinced that the Albany troubles before Christmas were the result of "outside" agitators, Freedom Riders getting $100 a day, and troublemakers stirring up generally-contented local Negroes. Mayor Kelley of Albany and Georgia's Governor Vandiver* both told the press that "paid agitators" were at work and Kelley produced the prison records of SNCC youngsters who had gone to jail in sit-ins and Freedom Rides to prove his point. King and Abernathy were both denounced by James Gray's Herald for coming in to stir up Albany Negroes.

In the South, "outside" influences are often evident, but they do little more than heighten and sometimes direct an already intense set of grievances felt by local people.

*When students in the Atlanta University Center penned their famous "Appeal for Human Rights" in the spring of 1960, Governor Vandiver said it could not have been written in the state of Georgia, and probably was produced outside the confines of the United States, though, in fact, the student who wrote the original draft was born and bred in Atlanta.

In Albany, local people -- especially students at Albany State College -- were in motion in the spring of 1961. The Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee came on the scene in the early fall and acted as a further stimulus. Albany youngsters in the Youth Council of the NAACP began to act. The first arrests (November 22) were of Albany State students. The next arrests (December 10) were of SNCC young people -- white and Negro, mostly from the South, but not from Albany. The mass demonstrations were planned by local Negro citizens and the more than 400 arrested by Thursday were evidently Albanians. Only at this point did Martin Luther King, Jr. and Ralph Abernathy, Negroes from another part of the same state, arrive on the scene. They (along with that young white fellow from South Georgia) were the only non-Albany people, so far as is known, involved in the mass arrests of Saturday night, December 16. The Albany Movement was overwhelmingly a local movement.

The Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee introduced a novel technique into the Albany situation. They came from the outside, set up headquarters in the community, and worked so closely with local people that after a while they were, as one Albany Negro put it, "completely integrated" with the Negroes of that city. By their enthusiasm, ability, and their obvious courage they won the respect of local people.

Communications

Albany whites do not know what Albany Negroes are thinking. It would balance the equation neatly to say that Albany Negroes do not know what whites are thinking, but this would not be quite accurate. For Albany Negroes read the white press, while Albany whites do not read the Negro press (the weekly Southwest Georgian reaches 5000 Negroes in a 60-mile radius from Albany). Albany Negroes see and hear Albany whites on television, but are not seen or heard themselves. And the conversations that take place between maids and housewives, between porters and employers, are hardly accurate transmitters of genuine feelings.

James Gray's Albany Herald is one of the many examples in the United States of a journalistic monopoly -- the one daily newspaper in town. Its total circulation is 29,000, of which 5000 is Negro. While it has a Saturday page devoted to activities in the Negro community, it offers no opportunity for Albany Negroes to communicate their grievances to the white people of the town -- except for an occasional letter to the editor. The editorial policy is strongly pro-segregationist, and the leading Negroes of Albany consider the Herald the city's most formidable obstacle to racial amity. Out of the recent events came a Negro boycott of the Herald, so severe that the paper dismissed the Negro assistant circulation manager who now had little circulation to manage. The man was also Treasurer of the Albany Movement, and Mr. Gray had kept him on, knowing this, firing him only when Negro readers fell off drastically.

Even the Herald's news columns are colored by its editorial antipathy to Negro moves for desegregation. On Friday, December 22, a front-page news story read, "There was a wave of feeling among Albany's Negroes to purge themselves of the Reverend King, who now seemed transformed from the Great Leader into a political liability who was impeding the path of good relations between the races in Albany." Herald reporters gave little first-hand coverage to Negro activities, and, with the obvious admiration for King expressed by Albany Negroes both before and after his arrest, it is hard to avoid the conclusion that this news report was manufactured in the office. This kind of reporting misleads the white community of Albany about local Negro sentiment. It makes whites adamant about holding to the status quo because it spreads the erroneous notion that Negroes are satisfied with things as they are. An element of honest self-delusion is apparent.

There are no opportunities for whites and Negroes in Albany to meet and exchange ideas in an atmosphere of equal give-and-take. Albany whites, in general, are not aware that there is a top layer of highly competent, well-educated, cultured Negroes who are worth knowing as persons, and who could make genuine contributions to the progress of the city outside of racial questions. A white minister in Albany, prominent in the city's ministerial alliance, asked me, "Are there any Negroes in Albany like the kind you find in big cities, to whom one can talk on an intellectual level?" I told him of the Negro home I had visited the previous evening, and of the authors represented in the man's library: Barzun, Edmund Wilson, Steinbeck, Schlesinger, Durrell, Suzuki, and Robert Graves.

It is not easy to find, in Albany, the white liberals who crop up in such numbers in a city like Atlanta. But this may be because the first spadeful of earth has not yet been overturned in a soil hard-encrusted since Civil War days. Once it is, people long silent will speak up, softly, but unmistakeably. A few -- ministers, businessmen, others -- have already begun. An elderly white couple, whose daughter I had met in Atlanta, invited me to tea and showed, in their questions, a basic humanity deep in all Southerners -- and, of course, in all people -- which will make race relations in the South warm and noble once artificial obstacles are removed.

Albany's white people, like Albany's Negroes, are mostly hard-working, quiet, and peaceful people. One striking feature of the Albany situation was that at no time during the week of demonstrations -- nor during the earlier incidents connected with the Trailways Terminal -- were there any mobs, or angry crowds, or voiced threats. Could this be the first indication of what will be the pattern of Deep South reaction to subsequent Negro protests? There was one white man arrested for singing "Dixie" near Negro demonstrators, and once when a crowd gathered at the Trailways Terminal on Thursday, December 14, a few mutterings of hostility were heard. But signs of real tension were observed by no one, white or Negro, to whom I spoke and who had been on the scene. The New York Times reported in the midst of the turmoil, "There were no indications that the 30,000 white residents of Albany were greatly aroused over the dispute." Where whites did appear at the scene of demonstrations, the chief motivation seemed to be curiosity. "What were the white people doing when you were marching?" I asked a Negro man. "Nothing but reckless eyeballin'," he said, and then smiled. "That's what I call it -- reckless eyeballin'. Just curiosity."

Police, Jails, Justice

Police Chief Laurie Pritchett was hailed widely in the press for preventing violence in Albany during the week of demonstrations. An Atlanta Constitution reporter did a special piece on Pritchett in which he did not conceal his admiration. The reporter for the New York Herald Tribune said Pritchett "brought to Albany a standard of professional achievement that would be difficult to emulate in a situation so made to order for violence...." All of this praise may indicate that Americans have unwittingly accepted a distorted conception of the rights of citizens and the duties of police officers in a democratic state. It needs to be strongly asserted that it is the function of police officers to defend the rights of citizens against anyone who would prevent them from exercising those rights. The negative function of preventing violence is an instrument supporting the positive exercise of constitutional rights by persons of the community. The praise is also a measure of the extent to which the purveyors of violence in Montgomery, Birmingham, and McComb succeeded in their function: they have managed to lower the settlement terms for race crises in the South, so that it becomes sufficient evidence of successful police action to have prevented violence. The requirement of positive protection of equal rights has been waived.

Recall what the police did, again and again. On November 1 -- the day the I.C.C. order for non-discrimination took effect -- they ordered two Negroes out of the bus station in a situation where, observers noted, there was no crowd, no threat, no indication of imminent violence or even nervous upset. On the morning of November 22, three weeks after the I.C.C. ruling, three Negroes were sitting quietly in the Trailways Terminal restaurant, waiting to get the food they ordered, with only a few people around and not the slightest sign of disturbance, when the police ordered them out, and arrested them for returning to the restaurant. The charge was breach of the peace, but there was not the slightest evidence to support the idea that they had disturbed the peace. That afternoon, two more students were arrested for using the white waiting room.

On December 10, six weeks after the I.C.C. ruling, the police arrested the eight Freedom Riders, the two young people who came to meet them, and the one observer, as they came out of the white waiting room and began to get into cars. The charges: obstructing traffic, disorderly conduct, and failure to obey a police officer. Talks with a dozen witnesses corroborate the fact that there was virtually no traffic to obstruct, that there was nothing disorderly about the conduct of the group, and that, at the moment of arrest, they were obeying the order to disperse -- since some were already getting into cars and the rest were about to leave. There were few whites around, the hundred or so Negroes standing nearby were quiet and orderly, there were no signs of disturbance or imminent trouble, and the whole scene would have melted away in a few minutes if the order to arrest had not been given.

In the demonstrations that followed that week, over 700 people were arrested for walking in single file, or twos, on one occasion threes, downtown to the vicinity of City Hall, singing hymns and praying. The New York Times reporter, describing the first demonstrators on Tuesday, said they "strolled slowly past the courthouse in pairs, singing hymns as they walked." (It should be noted that Albany's streets are exceptionally wide.) Again, no evidence of disturbance or imminent trouble. Whites stood around staring curiously. There were no angry speeches; these people were peacefully expressing their disagreement with the city administration's actions in arresting the Freedom Riders. Wednesday and Thursday, more walks downtown followed, with again no indication of white anger or probable violence. The Associated Press dispatch from Albany that Thursday said, "White residents of this city have shown little close-range interest in the incidents."

The arrest of the hymn-singing marchers led by Martin Luther King, Jr. on Saturday night was given a more sophisticated legal basis -- parading without a permit -- and it would be fruitless to go into the niceties of what constitutes a parade. But the pattern of all these arrests is quite clear: the police kept a peace which had not been broken and with no signs that it was about to be broken, by putting into prison over 700 men, women, and children who were exercising basic American rights to assemble peacefully and to petition the government for a redress of grievances. To put it bluntly, this was not a situation where local police needed to protect citizens from private violence, but where the exercise by citizens of constitutional rights required protection.

There may be a valid question about the propriety of demonstrations which may influence judicial proceedings, but the chief did not raise this question, nor did his responses to other demonstrations that week indicate that this factor was primary for him.

Albany apparently followed the pattern of police action devised by the State of Mississippi and the City of Jackson at the time of the Freedom Ride: arrest quickly, quietly, and imprison. There have been times in the past when southern authorities have delegated "law enforcement" to the mob. No mobs formed in Mississippi around the Freedom Riders, nor in Albany. This is undoubtedly a great improvement. Yet if police action effectively suppresses the exercise of legitimate protest, leaving nothing for the mob to do, there is no real advance.

The Jails

A sheriff in a neighboring county surveyed the prisoners sent over from Albany, spotted a button in the lapel of one of them. It read, "We Believe in Human Dignity." The sheriff snatched the button, threw it to the ground, and stamped on it. This could hardly be called "police brutality" but it suggests the kind of jailhouse psychology which determined the treatment of 400-odd prisoners in the Albany crisis.

There were eight places of confinement finally, when the city ran out of space: the city and county jails in Albany, the National Guard armory, and county jails at Americus, Dawson, Leesburg, Camilla, and Newton. The conditions ranged from just plain discomfort and bad food for most, to sickness for some, to cuffs and blows for a few, though probably jail conditions here are not worse than in many other local prisons in the country.

Charles Sherrod -- who had come to Albany to open the SNCC office in September -- said that when he arrived at Dawson in Terrell County with a number of other prisoners, Sheriff E. Z. Mathison told him, "Now remember. You left all your rights behind in Albany. I don't want to hear nothing about freedom." Sherrod said the group wanted two devotions a day, that though he was in jail he was still a man and still a Christian. The sheriff hit him with his hand and took him to his office. Then another man hit him in the mouth, cracking his lip. His mouth was full of blood. He was put in a cell by himself from 11:30 a.m. to 6:00 p.m., then returned to Albany where F.B.I. agents listened to his story.

A small group of Negro men and women, just out of jail, sat on a bench outside the office of the Shiloh Baptist Church and told about prison conditions:

A woman in jail for a week said, "I was in the Leesburg stockade with 51 other women. There was no place to sleep. The mattresses were wet and dirty.... They would put the food in a box, place it on the floor, and kick it into the cell.... Peas, peas, peas. Grits in the morning, fatty meat, crushed bacon in grits, two slices of bread, water. I wouldn't eat for four days....We continued to pray and prayer does change things."

Another woman was in the Dougherty County jail in Albany: "We got bitter black coffee...there was a sick woman there...it was eight hours before the county doctor came...she asked for glasses because she gets headaches without glasses...they didn't get her any glasses...they told us if we don't stop singing they'd put us in the dark."

A man arrested Saturday night: "Although no one put a hand on me, I feel like I been beaten. When you sleep on steel and concrete you are automatically sore. I'm a trailer driver, on the job a year, came back to work this morning, found I got no job...they told me, 'You a Freedom Marcher'...My wife lost her job, too."

A woman: "We were 88 in one room from Saturday night to Monday night, with 20 steel bunks and no mattresses...most slept on steel benches and the concrete floor. Waited 12 hours from one meal to the next... grits and gravy...Sheriff took us to Camilla. On the bus he told us, 'We don't have no singin', no prayin', and no handclappin' here.'"

Another man: "Forty-two of us in a cell for 12 in the city jail...then we were put in a bullpen, 60 men, 16 beds...all standin' up on one another. The food? Oh bad, man!"

A young married woman, senior at Albany State College, left two children with her mother and demonstrated Wednesday evening. "I didn't expect to go to jail for kneeling and praying at City Hall." She slept on an iron cot in the city jail and got sick. From Wednesday to Friday she ate nothing. Slater King, Albany Negro leader in the same prison, tried to slip his food to her through a hole in the door, but a guard came along and hit him in the back as he was passing the plate through the opening. He fell against the bars and hurt his head. (Police Chief Pritchett fired the guard soon after.)

When I went to the sheriff's office Wednesday morning, December 20, to see one of the original Freedom Riders still in the county jail, I was told they were allowed no visitors except for a lawyer. Husbands, wives, mothers, fathers, could talk to prisoners only by shouting through a barbed wire fence at a thick-meshed wire window through which no one inside was visible.

At the prayer meeting in the Shiloh Baptist Church that Tuesday night after the settlement, a young white girl arrested with the original group on Sunday, came down the aisle to the rostrum. She had been released from jail a few minutes before and was out of breath. She spoke briefly, softly. "First time I'd ever seen a jail. It's a funny mixed-up feeling to hate being in a dirty place but to be glad you're there for a good reason....We hope you'll keep going."

The Police Chief of Albany said, "We met non-violence with non-violence."

Where was the Federal Government?

While young people on three separate occasions were being ordered out of Albany terminals and arrested, while over 700 persons were arrested and over 400 kept in jail for marching downtown to sing, pray, and protest, the Federal Government, pledged through specific Constitutional guarantees, statutes, and administrative rulings to protect the rights of citizens against local usurpation, took the following visible actions:

On November 1, 1961, when Selyn McCollum watched the police order nine young Negroes out of the white waiting room at the Trailways Bus Terminal, and this was reported to the F.B.I., there was no apparent result. On November 22, when five students were arrested for using the Trailways facilities in Albany, no federal action was visible. When Chief Pritchett ordered the Freedom Riders outside the railroad waiting room on December 10, and then arrested 11 in the street, for the third time in six weeks the express ruling of a Federal Agency failed of enforcement. With the start of demonstrations and mass arrests on Tuesday, December 12, local police practice came into conflict, not with the very pointed I.C.C. ruling, but with broader -- and more complex -- issues represted by the Bill of Rights: freedom of assembly, the right of petition.

On Wednesday, with more demonstrations and more arrests, telegrams began going to Attorney General Kennedy asking federal intervention. On Thursday -- more demonstrations, more arrests--and the New York Times reported from Albany that, "The Justice Department was watching developments here closely." That day, Attorney General Kennedy conferred by phone with both Governor Vandiver and Mayor Kelley. The Mayor said he assured the Attorney General that law and order could be preserved without federal aid. Also that day, the Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Civil Rights Division talked with Albany Movement leader W. G. Anderson. On Friday, with demonstrations and negotiations in progress, he phoned Mayor Kelley and offered to mediate, and the mayor assured the Assistant Attorney General that the city could work out its problems. On Saturday, negotiations broke down. Martin Luther King, Jr. led the march downtown that evening, hundreds more were arrested, and the NAACP wired Vice President Johnson and Attorney General Kennedy to protest the arrests. F.B.I. men were reported cruising the streets in cars.

On Monday, December 18, a settlement was announced, and within a hour Mayor Kelley said Attorney General Robert Kennedy called to congratulate him for a good job.

Events in Albany were caused by the city's violation of the Interstate Commerce Commission's regulation. The Federal Government took no apparent action to curb that violation, although it undoubtedly has power to enforce its own orders. Today in Albany the I.C.C. order is being complied with. It was enforced, not by federal authority, but by demonstrations in the streets.

Conclusion

Over 700 Negroes in Albany, and a few sympathetic whites, spent time in prison in December of 1961, as a mass substitute for federal action to compel recognition of a legal right. They were not opposed by the white people of Albany, but by local law enforcement officers. These officers acted, not out of malice, but out of a too-faint comprehension of the changes which are rolling slowly, but inevitably, through the South today, and which, with McComb, Jackson, and Albany, have begun to move into the heart of the Black Belt. As in other cases, a movement born of specific grievances was nurtured in crisis and developed larger objectives, those of full equality and untarnished human dignity.

The real feelings of the Negro community were kept from a fundamentally fair-minded white community by the powerful barrier of segregation, propped up by a hostile press and an unsympathetic city administration. As Christmas approached in 1961, masses of Albany Negroes pressed the weight of their bodies against this barrier. They moved it only slightly, but the tremors were felt in Albany and through the nation. They may have to press against it many more times, but now that the first rumblings have sounded in the ears of the white community, help may come from that side of the barrier. One day, certainly, it will be dismantled, and Albany whites and Negroes, quietly, unspectacularly, will begin to live together in a manner consistent with the new expectations of this century.

The following items appeared side-by-side in the Atlanta Journal and Constitution, January 7, 1962:

ALBANY STUDENT PENALTY STRESSED

By Gordon Roberts

An Albany attorney contended Saturday that Negroes suspended from Albany State College were dealt with more harshly than white students who took part in anti-integration riots at the University of Georgia last year.

C.B. King, who represents about 40 Negro students who have been suspended thus far at Albany, charged that punitive action was taken against them "for doing what they had a right to do," while white university students were not punished for participating in "mob action."

The suspended Negroes will appeal their cases, if necessary, to federal court, Mr. King said. Appeal procedure calls for seeking a rehearing at the college, and that failing, to ask the University System Board of Regents to review the suspensions.

The Negro students were suspended for taking part in anti-segregation demonstrations in mid-December, which for the most part involved "freedom" marches to the Albany City Hall.

Mr. King said he knows personally of at least 40 who have been suspended, but the number could run as high as 100. He said there were about that many Albany State students arrested as a result of the marches.

The students were charged with "conduct detrimental to Albany State College." College officials were still holding closed disciplinary hearings Saturday morning.

In appealing the cases, Mr. King said he would contend that the Negroes were ousted for doing what they had a right to do, but white University of Georgia students were allowed to stay, though what happened there last January "was clarly mob action."

(According to university officials, three university students -- two of whom were indicted by a grand jury for allegedly participating in the riot -- were suspended, but were cleared to return to the University after being out about one quarter. Two other students withdrew while university action was still pending against them.

(Seventeen students arrested by Athens police in connection with the rioting and other protest demonstrations on and off the campus were tried in the city court and a number of them convicted. The University placed them on probation.)

Attorney King also noted that the Albany demonstrations occurred after school hours or while the Negroes were out for the holidays, and that they did not occur on the college campus.

College President, William H. Dennis reportedly has received from the State Law Department advice on the actions he is taking. There also are rumors in Albany that University System Regent Roy Harris, an arch-segregationist, has advised President Dennis.

However, Mr. Harris Saturday said that report was without foundation, that he has not discussed the situation with the college president. He said the regents did discuss it at a recent meeting, but decided to let Pres. Dennis handle the matter.

Meanwhile, Regent Chairman, Robert O. Arnold supported Mr. Dennis in the suspensions.

ATHENS RIOT TRIAL PLANS STILL LACKING

Another term of criminal court is about to begin in Athens, and there still are no definite plans for trying 11 persons indicted in connection with the desegregation riot at the University of Georgia, according to Sol. Gen. Marshall Pollock.

Criminal court week will begin January 15, and Sol. Gen. Pollock said Saturday he has not decided whether he will call the year-old cases for trial. However, he said he had no intention of dropping the charges. "I just don't know if they'll be tried now," he said.

Indicted in connection with rioting when the university admitted two Negro students, were two students and nine Atlanta area men, eight of whom were admitted Klu Klux Klansmen.

Their trials have been postponed from the April, July and October terms of court.

Dear Bob:

I read Serpents and Doves and liked it very much. I have just two general comments, neither of which I would press very hard. They are simply personal reactions which reflect my own ways of reading things. I did, in the first place, think it a bit prolix. Sometimes it seems to me that you made your point and then instead of leaving it, battered it into the ground. I do not mean that in any serious sense the piece is too long, but rather that you might excise some modifiers here, a sentence there. The material is good and I simply felt (I use the word advisedly) that occasionally the material had too many words surrounding it.

My second comment is simply a thought for the future. The work of these "non-violent youth" is not an altogether unique manifestation of effort. Their situation there and reaction to it is comparable with -- though certainly not identical with -- that of people who gave so ardently to labor organizing work in the 20's and particularly the 30's. So far as I know -- no one glimpsed those people close-up as you have these students. But I think there is a common experience here which may occur irregularly in various generations and which is itself something worth definition or at least, or perhaps better, description.

to the Mayor here

I have also a few nit-picks: page 2, L12: "cannot" - right tense? page 2, L-20 - why "cellophane bags"? page 3, last par. - seems to me a fairly vague story. Shouldn't it be pinned down with either the name of the journalist or some description of how they "were prompted even pushed"? page 6, L-13 - "many exiles"?? page 8, L-3 - "they" - antecedent? page 12, top - I don't seem to be familiar with this incident. page 12, L-17 - "some... may... they... often." page 21, L-13 - "We have not yet, etc" - not clear to me; page 23, L-1 - unlike? page 23, L-3 - manner? page 25, L-29 - "as each generation does" - is this true? page 38, L-6 - "them" is technically correct, but I had to re-read before getting the antecedent straight. page 39, L-4 - "very much continue" - can't you get more precise words? page 46, L-3 - "We have no... wish to add" - means what?

Your report for us I like very much. It is not as finished a piece as Serpents and Doves, but frankly I think its even better. I think so because you have more material resulting from your more extensive and your more intimate knowledge of the children in desegregated schools. (Incidentally, their situation is,historically, almost unique and perhaps this enhances their interest.)

As I told you Blackford will be here so soon that I think we should wait and let him think about how it should be used. Furthermore, I believe that it's too good not to be made better by some polishing. Maybe only the first few pages and the conclusions. It is an instructive piece.

It will be good to see you next week. Best wishes to Jane and to you.

Sincerely yours,

Dear Mr. Cohen:

During your visit here in March, you may remember that we discussed an SRC study being prepared by Dr. Robert Coles. That study, which is titled "The Desegregation of Southern Schools: A Psychiatric Study," has now been completed and edited. We are planning to send it to the printer at the end of this week.

As you may recall, Les mentioned the possibility of bringing out this study soon after the publication of Ken Morland's piece on tokenism and preparing a joint release about the two pamphlets. For this reason, I am enclosing a corrected copy of Dr. Cole's study for your consideration. If ADL would like to co-sponsor this study as well as the Morland pamphlet, we will be glad to run its name on the title page together with outs. That page will, of course, be the last to be set in type, so you will have time to consider our proposal.

Once you have read the study, I trust you will let us know your decision. Thank you very much.

Yours sincerely,

LITTLE SCIENCE BIG SCIENCE
by Derek J. de Solla Price

The transition from the science of the one-man laboratory to that of today's multi-million dollar research centers has been accomplished in a period of less than 30 years. This extraordinary growth has profoundly affected not only the scientist, in terms of his communication and work, but our very national posture. This book discusses the impact of big science on our age, and analyzes the problems and potentials which arise from it. A book that "will be much quoted by those concerned with the growth of scientific endeavors in the United States."—Library Journal

THE REPORTER'S NOTES

The Vagabond Kings

What makes an issue an issue, and when is it no longer one? This year most of our worrying is concentrated on the tax structure. Last year medical care for the aged was the big thing. The year before it was Federal funds for public schools. Typically, a period of intense concern is followed by either legislative failure or sudden indifference, or both. We do not pretend to understand this phenomenon, but it has occurred to us that the very paraphernalia of concern—that sudden spate of articles, speeches, studies, and pledges—may function as a substitute for action rather than as a stimulation to action. In other words, as soon as everyone has made his position clear, we are free to turn our attention to something else.

Any number of national problems have been disposed of in this fashion, but none more flagrantly so than that of the migrant farm workers—remember them?—who were the objects of so much solicitude and attention just three years ago. Whatever happened to them? The answer is: practically nothing—some new state laws, a few benefits from general legislation. "The long-standing, brutalizing facts of the migratory labor problem are rediscovered every few years," Senator Harrison Williams (D., New Jersey) told a Senate subcommittee recently. "Each rediscovery prompts a surge of study, doggedly followed by a horde of recommendations. The migratory farm families, having prompted countless studies, continue to live almost in a state of medieval poverty."

What the studies have shown is, by now, pretty familiar stuff: being uneducated, unskilled, and unprotected by most modern welfare and labor legislation, some 400,000 migrant farm workers plus their families continue to live in sub-standard housing, to be paid sub-standard wages, to enjoy sub-standard health, and to be treated by many of their employers with sub-standard decency.

The recommendations have bebecome almost as familiar as the studies. The proposals considered most bold and least likely to succeed are extension of the minimum-wage law and of NLRB coverage to migrant workers. Those considered politically more feasible are Federal registration of crew leaders; Federal grants to states to improve education, housing, health, sanitation and day-care facilities; establishment of a national advisory council; establishment of a farm-employment service; and finally an extension of child-labor legislation. All these measures have in fact been incorporated into bills and introduced by Senator Williams over the past few years. One, authorizing the Federal government to spend $3 million annually in grants to the states for health care has been enacted into law, but in its first year of operation it is already being trimmed by the House Appropriations Committee. The others were defeated and have been introduced again this year.

The problem of translating good intentions into effective political action is very much on everyone's mind in Washington these days, and a history of the unsuccessful efforts to ameliorate the lot of the migrants provides some useful lessons. One is that double-talk, apathy, and laziness on the part of many in both Congress and the administration who are verbally committed to migrant-labor legislation has cost just as dearly as organized opposition. Last October, for example, after Williams had maneuvered his child-labor provisions through the Senate and after the necessary strength appeared to have been mustered in the House, the House ended up by amending it to death. Why? "It was an election-year Thursday," one Senate aide explained. "It got late and the liberal Congressmen from the East went home to campaign."

Being the constituents of no one in particular, the migrant workers depend as much on the seriousness of "do-good" lobbies as they do on the seriousness of "do-good" Congressmen. But except for certain church groups, particularly the National Catholic Welfare Conference and the National Council of Churches, and for one or two unions such as the Amalgamated Meat Cutters, whose legislative representative, Arnold Mayer, happens personally to be particularly interested in migrant legislation, most of the labor and social-welfare lobbies have done little beyond testifying when called upon. The same, unfortunately, cannot be said of the American Farm Bureau Federation and the various growers' associations that oppose most of the prospective legislation. Some people may leave Washington to campaign when the chips are down, but the farm lobbyists have a way of arriving by the plane load. And all year 'round they keep up a steady attack on the Williams bills, mainly on the ground that they will seriously restrict the liberties and prosperity not only of the grower but—yes—of the migrant laborer, too. In a package of "suggested news releases, editorials, speeches" sent out by the National Farm Labor Users Committee and accompanied by careful instructions ("substitute the name of a local association and individual for the name of the National Users Committee . . ."), one typical editorial described the proposed farm-employment service as a grant of "authority to recruit American citizens into work gangs." America, the romantic editorialist writes, "was built by people who liked to roam from place to place as their desires moved them." Not only is the migrant laborer depicted as a sort of vagabond king, but those seeking to pass child-labor laws are depicted as a menace to the migrant child's health and happiness. "There are no sweat shops on the farms of America," Congressman Harold Cooley (D., North Carolina) declared on the floor of the House. "On the farms of our nation, children labor with their parents out under the blue skies." Such irrelevant nonsense may not stand up well against the statistics on farm accidents involving children under thirteen, but the lobbyists have not counted on intellectual persuasion so much as on a mere show of political strength to achieve their ends. When lobbyists have been aroused and have succeeded in arousing a sufficient number of farm-state legislators, supporters of the Williams measures in Congress and in even higher places have tended to back off, with the excuse that there were other legislative priorities to be considered and that the situation was by and large impossible anyway. In 1954, for example, former President Eisenhower established a President's Committee on Migratory Labor to give administrative leadership to the battle. It is composed of the Secretaries of Labor, Agriculture, Interior, and Health, Education and Welfare plus the Administrator of the Housing and Home Finance Agency; it has met exactly three times since 1954. Two of its meetings were held during Eisenhower's time, but the second one hardly counts since only Secretary of Labor James Mitchell is said to have showed up. Under the Kennedy administration there were high hopes that it would become an effective body. Unlike Ezra Taft Benson, Secretary of Agriculture Orville Freeman has supported the proposed legislation, and the committee last year even issued a report backing some of the Williams program. That was in January. But increased pressure from the growers later in the year caused a tactical retreat, and it was reportedly decided to "lay low" and "consolidate" such gains as had been made. A reorganization in the Labor Department, where the committee is based, further reduced the committee's activities. At the present time it has no staff execept a secretary.

While we do not question the good intentions of those in the administration and in Congress who consider the migrant problem hopeless for the time being and even a liability to the rest of the President's program, we suspect that in this as in other domestic issues there is a fundamental confusion about what leadership really means. It does not necessarily involve a suicide attack on the Congress. It does involve more than speeches. And above all, it is not simply a futile exercise of idealism against the so-called realities. The activities of Senator Williams and his subcommittee in fact illustrate most of the virtues of effective leadership: shrewdness, patience, and sustained hard work are a few. Their triumphs have not been oratorical. Rather they have consisted of such unlikely feats as persuading Senator Harry Byrd (D., Virginia) of the merits of some of their proposals and even making a few inroads into the opposition of the lobbyists, who are said to have relaxed a bit this year, at least on the social measures. With Secretaries Wirtz and Celebrezze both strongly committed, this could even be the year for a little progress. Every May, the President said a while back, commenting on the rhythm of the issues, ". . . there are those stories about Presidential leadership." We are happy to open the season.

Dear Les:

It was, as always, a pleasure to see your agitatedly calm countenance here.

Now, in regard to the Coles ms.:

Oscar has read it and is, on the whole, very pleased with it. We are, therefore, happy to join with the SRC in publishing it.

We talked about making this the second in a joint series, the first being the report on tokenism. A possible third item might be an updated edition of "The High Cost of Conflict." We should at some early time work out precise arrangements about sharing costs, print-runs, release, and imprint. I'll be glad to have your suggestions. I should think that our needs for the "Tokenism" would be either 5,000 or 10,000. Why don't you get prices on that basis, and then we can make a firm commitment.

I merely want to mention again here the two or three points of editorial comment that Oscar and I made the other day about the Coles study. First, I would urge that Dr. Coles consider adding some first-hand material to the present manuscript, i.e. quotations from his interviews, etc. I think that this would enliven the text, which is now a bit remote from the real people. The direct use of the inscriptions in the one yearbook, for example, are greatly moving, and perhaps some direct transcriptions from the raw material might help. Second, we should make sure that either the text of the report or else the foreword explicitly counteract the possible impression that the upshot of the report is "token integration is good for mental health." The loci of both investigations were necessarily in token-desegregation cities, but the generally affirmative results of Dr. Coles' research should not be open to the misinterpretation that we therefore endorse token desegregation. Thirdly, perhaps Dr. Coles can be urged to look once more at the material in the light of our desire to be of somewhat more concrete programmatic help to the community. It is a bit of a let-down not to be able to learn, for example, what psychiatric indications there might be for preferring desegregation early or late in the school process. If he cannot in all good scientific conscience make any affirmative proposals, so be it; but it may be worth trying once more.

About Birmingham, all I can say is (in Tom Mboya's words): "The future looks black!"

Dear Staige,

New York was hot, soggy, but interesting, including some good movies (see 8½ when you can) and a long and pleasant Luce lunch. Today my parents finally saw some sense in my work, since Time mentioned their little boy's name and up to now it's all been very depressing for them. Since they subscribe to Time and Life and the National Geographic it is clear that they really would settle for my retirement in glory at this point (A friend of my mother's told her that the New Republic was a left wing "thing" supported by Harvard radicals...all very encouraging)

I was moved up from a footnote and incorporated in the Education section, but they plan a full story when you release the news, and I told Bob Shnayerson you'd send him the release. He is a very bright and interesting fellow, and his researcher a real Boston Bean type, full of social register crap which annoyed the Hell out of me (she checked our address out; I told her she'd better look me up more carefully before she runs to any gratuitous conclusions) but bright and Vassary and very able. They took me to a long lunch, and I felt like dissolving in booze, and also felt slightly like a little boy finally seeing the White House or something. I should have dignity and feel "mature" and "grown", but it's all very exciting and strange, magazines and confident journalists and their world on that funny, mad island.

I'm writing to ask for about ten more copies of that report. I'm getting some headshrinkers and such types here to read it and send it out, and I want to send it to some professional organizations, and they say first they want to see it. Rather than type all their names and have you send it, I'll write their names and mail it, saving time and effort.

Also, let me know when you plan the release, and send the release to me, if that isn't too much trouble. Shnayerson seemed very interested, and he couldn't resist including the paragraph because they'd been working on that De Facto thing for several weeks and it seemed suitable for them, in fact, "just what we wanted to get in."

One shame is that all the drawings and pictures I had are in cartons of our Vinings stuff, in storage, so I can't supply any to them like I did to Newsweek, though he said to try, and I may spend the next week in w wharehouse, which would about kill us, since the weather here is almost unbelievable in its duress, and has those Cape people at the ocean's edge in a paranoid state of suffering...."Never had it like this before...I wonder what's happening...." As if any suffering is unbelievable or impossible.

Well, enough of my troubles and demands. Regards to "nm" and all others there

Best

Bob

SERPENTS AND DOVES: NON-VIOLENT YOUTH IN THE SOUTH

by

Serpents and Doves: Non-Violent Youth in the South*

There are today in this American land young men and women, black and white, who are going to jail for the freedom of their fellow men. They are doing radical things in novel and challenging ways; and they are doing them in everyman's sight. They are doing them in restaurants and in stores and in movie houses. They enter bus terminals and the obscure rural offices of voting registrars to do them. In fact, wherever they are and wherever they go, they test and defy. Here, certainly for the first time in my life, I have seen American students behave toward their society with the "ideological" concern said to possess young people in Europe or Asia. But, they do not man barricades. They do not scream at other countries and their visiting leaders. They throw no bombs. They are concerned with their own country, and they want to become her true citizens. They very definitely want to change social and political customs, but they want to change them peacefully and in their time. No, they do not seem lost or confused; they know exactly what they want, and they are ready to give their lives for their goals. I went to study them and I came to respect them; and so I will tell their story so as to let them and their tasks and fate come to word.

*The work upon which this paper rests is part of a study which is now in its second year, and is concerned with the psychological problems which occur in desegregation among Negroes and whites, particularly in the schools. This effort is sponsored by the Southern Regional Council, a distinguished group of white and Negro Southerners who wish "to attain the ideals and practices of equal opportunity for all peoples in the South." I am deeply grateful to them, and wish to thank them and their fine staff. I especially wish to express my gratitude to the Executive-Director, Mr. Leslie W. Dunbar, for his kindness and extraordinary intelligence.

In those public places which these students visit they are met by men of business and seen by ordinary citizens of all ages and classes. These people have grown up with certain assumptions and deeply felt ways of getting along with one another. That is what happens when you grow up anywhere, you learn who you are, and who you are not. You learn who is nice and who is bad. You learn who has rights and who doesn't seem to have any. Until recently, if you were born in the South and you were white you learned that the colored man cannot go certain places, cannot have certain jobs, cannot expect certain rights. You learned that he took care of you, did a lot of things which were hard and difficult for you. You were told about his bondage, and soon learned about the Civil War. Associated in your mind with the Negro were the hard times of the South after that war, the pride and power of the North, and your unending conviction, based on the laws of human nature, that there was hypocrisy afoot up there, and under all those words from them.

But these traditions and sentiments are not in a cellophane bag. Carrying them are all those human beings in Greensboro, North Carolina and every other town there is. If you look at those towns in 1962 you will see television sets and air fields. Living in these towns are young people who expect someone of their generation to land on distant planets. Perhaps they think of themselves as Southerners; but they also look at themselves as living on a patch of a planet which is orbited, radioactive, and supersonically travelled. We all know how their parents struggled with how or whether Americans should get involved in the problems of distant continents. Somehow we did, and somehow the distance between the continents has been abolished. Now we worry about countries who want to drown us and continents where new countries arise from the ashes of old empires. We worry, and we gird ourselves for a long haul of trouble. We pull ourselves together, and parts of us get closer together. Factories move from one region to another, ~~pulling~~ TAKING people with them, drawing people to them. Farms are left. Cities grow. People leave places where they can't work or feel hunted and go to other places where they still have their troubles but where these seem less overwhelming. Feelings about dark people persist, but now have to be put on complicated scales and weighed with other feelings about work and country. Feelings about white people persist, but the white world is changing and so is the dark, and new feelings arise and demand expression. The towns and cities hold all that, grapple with paradox and contradiction and new ideas and events, live or die in future history books on how they settle in themselves, how they get along with themselves.

A Southern journalist emphasizes with the special pleasure in irony which a newsman takes that the four young Negroes who first dared in 1960 to ask for dime-store coffee in Greensboro, North Carolina were prompted, even pushed, by whites impatient with the pace of the Negro's walk to full citizenship and pressing for changes which they felt at hand, if unreached. Apocryphal or not, there is truth in the story. The truth is that students are attacking conventions by picketing and by boycotts; they are going on freedom rides and risking arrest for their sit-ins. But, the additional truth is that when they lean hard the walls, more than not, crumble. It takes a kind of society for this to happen. In some countries the protests would be crushed, turned into revolutionary plots. In our own country these protests have been made many times in the past with little success. There were sit-ins decades ago, and they are now remembered because the present ones work. If they work they say something about the country and the South. Social changes seem to occur when a ripe moment is plucked by shrewd as well as hungry men. This ripe moment of the South today captures the world's interest. All over the earth races trouble one another. One of the great issues in this century is whether the different races will be able to get along in some new mutual respect. The alternative is fairly grim, but may help make it possible. The world watches a great protagonist try to make its ideals more truthful. The South is the troubled scene, and much depends upon the resolution of the drama.

There are many actors. Some of them are storekeepers, some of them are governors. Policemen are prominent. The students seem to initiate much action and cause many changes; and we are here to try to look at these lean and crafty youths. We might ask ourselves about their aims and their tasks. We might want to know about their ages and origins, their manner of living and how they respond to some of the troubles thrown their way.

What they want is called "desegregation", or it is called "integration." Some call it "mixing". Under names are wishes and fears. The students wish that the Negro people in the South would have an easier, kinder life. They would like a Negro to feel able to vote. They would like him to hold a job which bears some connection with his interests or abilities. The time has come, they assert, when a Negro can eat in those restaurants, and sit in those movies. Parks are for people, and they want to feel like people. No other group of Americans has been shunted aside so long; kept in such personal degradation; exploited so unremittingly. They say all those words, and then they say that all bad things must come to an end, and that the glorious moment has come. They seem to have the idea that they are holding a clock or a calendar, and a secret has been heard and read by them. This secret tells them that no longer can their country endure with the old segregated ways. It goes on to suggest that the past years have shown a slow yielding of the law and a gradual improvement in their separate but equal position. Then it bellows into their ears and scrawls on their student notebooks the advice that to their freedom there are many roads, each for different people. Their road is that of the direct and non-violent protest. They are young, and they feel directly as the young do, and they direct their attention to some very specific customs, and they say to one another that these exist in the middle of the twentieth century only by their own sufferance. They sense that the South as well as their country is in a bind. Both would like to be rid of this shameful relic from other years. Both feel guilty, but both are afraid, and don't quite know how. They sense the changes among white people, and have watched their growing friendship. Many of them notice that when that friendship comes in the South it means more, is deeper than what they experience in the North. They also sense that they have not been terrorized alone; that with them have been white people in every city and state of the South, people afraid to say what they feel and for this reason not free.

Their aim is not to conspire or to destroy their country. They want what others in the country have, what others have often taken for granted. They want what their country says it is all about. They want to feel like they are more a part of their country. Then, as they let their minds wander into the future, they hope for more trust and friendliness between the white and dark people of this country. They carefully distinguish among themselves between desegregation and integration. They know that you cannot legislate affection. But they suspect that if many of their exiles end, hands of acceptance may begin to reach. One of their buttons shows a white and a black hand clasped. I suppose that this is their wish.

What they do to get what they want is to protest. They do not carry weapons. They do not hit or hurt people, at least physically. They will not fight with sticks or stones or their hands or feet. They wear suits, and they shave. They are very determined to appear as presentable young Americans. Before they protest they study and think about the way in which they will protest, and they practice this too. This is the way of non-violence. To protest without violence is fairly self-explanatory. But like many simple matters, there are complicated results, for them and for the world which is protested.

It is complicated for them because they must control very carefully some very strong feelings which they have, and have had. It is in the nature of protest to be unhappy with something and to be willing to assert that unhappiness. Mild unhappiness may be endured and not protested. Overwhelming unhappiness and indignity may also be endured and not protested. This latter situation of long suffering will prevail when protest is impossible, because it will be crushed forthrightly. Such was the case in past years, though protests there were, and crushed they were. Now it is different. It is fairly clear that protest is possible, and changes inevitable. But the emotions which have been felt in the past, risen out of humiliation and injury, these do not disappear. They urge protest, but they are not very quiet emotions. They are emotions of anger and frustration and fear. Worse, they are those of shame and self doubt. It will be hard to deal with these when people shout at you, and attack you. When people remind you of all the lacerations and insults, it will be hard to keep yourself so that your cheek is turned. You will need the help of others, the help of rehearsals, and the help of some of the books which you left to make these protests. And, the more you study and think about it, the wiser and more satisfying the whole idea seems. This idea has its roots in Christ's teachings. When they had very little else, Negroes were given the Christian religion, and their spirituals tell about how sad they were and how the only better day would be a funeral day, when a whole new world might appear with more certainty than any changes in this one. Insofar as the student has a tradition, insofar as his race has been allowed to develop one, it will have large amounts of this view. It will be a tradition of bearing pain without protest. Then, there is Gandhi, and how he studied

Christ, and loved Tolstoy, and wanted freedom for his people, and didn't want violence to get it, and knew how to make it very embarrassing for those who wouldn't give it, and they got it.

Perhaps, for a minute, we should turn to those protested. Perhaps they will help us see how the students manage the balance of getting angry and controlling their anger; manage the balance of drawing upon their own traditions of Christ, and upon more recent traditions of Gandhi, and feeling active enough to use them as a weapon rather than rest upon them for future consolation, in this or some other world. It is just as complicated for the white people. Most people are hurt when others are hurt. Most people are particularly moved by what they see and hear. If the Negro is off yonder in some shabby slum, he can be forgotten, as he is very often in the North. If he is off yonder in some field by day and then in some shack by night, he can be forgotten, as he was in the South. He is often remembered in the South by very kindly and decent people, for whom he has worked and labored. They have never heard him complain, and they have grown up with their special ways of talking with him and caring for him. It has not all been hate. It has been love, but a kind of love. But it is a kind of love, a kind of relationship which is no longer wanted. And the hate and insults, plenty of them, too, they will not be allowed anymore. This has to be told and conveyed to many people, and it is important to remember that many people simply do not know this dissatisfaction. Otherwise they would not repeat so often that the Negro is happy, were it not for sinister outside forces. Thus, there are the uninformed. There are also those who really are very informed and for years have ached ~~for~~ WITH the injustice which they see and feel.

Such white Southerners, and they are legion, have known that when others suffer, they do, and that the lessons which their children will learn from such are the lessons of hate and confusion, the lesson that Christian messages do not apply to large groups of human beings, not really. All of these people will be very forcefully confronted by these young people, preaching to them the lessons which they gave them after they brought them here from Africa, preaching to them by their requests and deeds and placards and in their silent, direct manner the lessons of this country, of the Republic. This makes many white people twinge. It also awakens many frightened Negro people, unable, unwilling, afraid to do as their brothers do. When you are walking on those sidewalks, and are afraid of the police and the jails, one of the most important events for you is seeing others, dark and light in complexion, affected by your risk, your dare, your willingness to be there. You can arrange things in your mind, and help arrange them in your friend's, but you must feel that it is all to some result. And, it has been. In city after city lunch counters have opened, movies yielded. Some youths enter a park and play golf, and that issue is settled. Libraries find their shelves open to all. These victories give courage for other trials where success is less likely so quickly. The point is that this is a way for students to reach people and directly challenge social customs. It may violate local and state laws, but it has worked, and it gives promise of working. And so it keeps happening.

These who keep these protests happening are of many ages and cities and families. They are mostly black men, but there are many black women, and many white men and white women. Some are from poor families, some from those in better circumstances. The son of a distinguished Negro college president works beside a very poor and orphaned boy from a rural town. There are many kinds of demonstrations, and they may draw upon different participants. Some are spontaneous and astonishingly successful. In Asheville, North Carolina, some boys and girls who were going to junior high school and high school decided one day to use the library, and to try to get sodas from several stores. That did it, and that surprised the Negro community perhaps more than the white. Some are spontaneous, but need much more planned and persistent action at later times for success. In Nashville many months were required. In Atlanta picketing of stores was followed by a boycott, and much negotiation. More recently in Atlanta the movies houses were cautiously desegregated under an arrangement between the students and the owners, with the mayor acting as a friendly helper. This seemed to be quite an acknowledgment of what these students in some situations can accomplish. The city did not want picketing, and the students agreed to a date in the future and a gradual program. The mayor's role is reported to have been a recital of how in today's Atlanta picketing might be more harmful to the theaters than desegregation. But there are other demonstrations which are attempted in those desperate areas of last defiance, requiring careful action by experienced people. To dare to work in a small Mississippi town with Negro families, encouraging them to want to vote, tutoring them in their letters, helping them in the incredible intricacies of laws designed chiefly against them, requires more than a college weekend of time and experience. Some students stay in school and help during vacations or free time. Others leave school and devote months, years to full-time training and action. Most protests have their origin in the local town, the local Negro college, or one nearby. The freedom rides were an obvious exception, drawn from Northern students to some extent, Southerners, too. These rides were a thrust into the heart of segregation, the bus terminals in Alabama and Mississippi. They were followed by some removal of separate rest room signs. What they illustrated is the anxiety and concern which this country must show for the welfare of these students. A policeman told one of the students "Even ten years ago you'd have been dead, all of you. Can't do that now." Although they are not sure, the students are sure enough to feel able to go ahead.

Those who go ahead seem to elude classification by class or geography or even age. College students predominate; but there have been younger boys and girls and young married couples with children by their side, and on into adulthood. In south Georgia or in Alabama or Mississippi or Louisiana any protest will have heavy odds against it, and, in some towns in these states the mere act of protest is almost incredible to those who know these towns. It is in these areas that violence is almost certain. It is here that terror stalks, and danger is reliable. Police dogs are threatened in one state, and a man running for governor says that his body in front of the buildings will prevent execution of a federal law on school desegregation. He is elected. In another state students are arrested on charges of "criminal anarchy" for organizing sit-ins for coffee or encouraging campaigns to register voters. High bail is set, and some stay in prison and solitary confinement for months. In another state students escort some Negroes to register to vote. These students are a Negro graduate student from Harvard University and a native, white, Alabaman. Crowds heckle and attack, arrests are made, students kicked and hurt. Something prevents their murder, their lynching as in olden days. No one can say that such restraint in those towns is not some kind of communication from an outside world no longer so far away. The students leave jail, go right back to their work.

Those students who have taken leave of school for some months, and who venture into these most troublesome sections, leave dormitories and live different lives. How they live can be known. If you know the cramped, desolate, dreary quality to the Negro sections of Southern towns; the huddled cabins of squalor and defeat; if you've heard the spirituals and seen the funerals; diagnosed the tuberculosis and vitamin deficiencies; smelled the cheap, bad booze which blots out poverty, persecution, the whim and fickleness of the alien white lords, then you will know how some of these students may live. They will often come to one of these towns and live there for months, getting to know people and finding out the usual problems of these people and suggesting new and direct responses to these problems, like a boycott, or a school where people can be helped in reading and interpreting constitutional law so that they may try to register to vote. It is not simply the hardness of the whites, many of whom are very poor and very much struggling themselves, very soft and tender people, in small towns, who are friendly and generous with the little they have and talk long and wonderful stories and memories and know their kin all over and can laugh so easily and whose voices are honey and whose eyes are sly with earthy, human affairs, and whose eyes are hard and fixed with money troubles and job troubles and bitter old times which are getting better, and whose ancient consolation following ancient frustrations was a lowly, yelping, always handy, nigger. It is the apathy of the Negroes which is harder, harder to look at and most painful of all. It is their inertia and resignation which is so difficult. Death of spirit or soul, by murder, by suicide, by illness and exploitation, is worse than live, howling, frightened enemies.

Some stay in one town for months and help local leaders plan action. Others move about from town to town, state to state, talking with young Negro students who have stayed in college and are planning some action, or helping them in forming a plan. White students will go with them, or will go to white campuses, where they will contact those who quietly, and in ways different from those in Negro colleges, work for changes. These students are often called "field secretaries". This means that they travel in the field of southern cities and try to change that field by participating in actions which directly disregard its rules and boundaries. They receive enough money to travel and eat and sleep. When they come into a town they will look at the restaurants and the drugstore fountains. They will find out who votes, and where. They will watch parks and stand near libraries, and note who works at what job in those places where people work. Then they will get a room in some YMCA or bunk in some home or college dormitory, and start "making the rounds", which means hearing the many and conflicting views of people, and recording and annotating them in their more than secretarial minds. After this, decisions must be made about what to do, in what order, and with whom.

When they decide, they decide their own fate, establish their own fears and hopes. Heavy odds they will be arrested and go to jail. Strong chance they will be kicked, punched, receive spit. Foul language is routine. Serious injury is a possibility. ~~Such can be their fate.~~ Most of these students have been in jail many times and in many states. You can talk with them and find that they are juggling several trial dates and bailed free periods. They will go to court and be sentenced and appeal and, if there is money, go free and continue their activities, and interrupt them to go to another trial in another state. Since most of what they do is illegal, and since they keep on in spite of this, they accumulate long prison records, 15, 25 times. You can hear them listed, the jails described, the treatment recorded in stories and jokes, Their fate is also notorious. They are noticed by the press and television and radio. Their names may be given, their pictures taken. Leading newspapers and magazines will describe their behavior, and of course the implications. This is important, because it is such news and widely spread consideration of this news which helps inform people, and causes them to pay attention and notice and become ashamed and get indignant. All this is pressure on segregation, which, like many habits, works best unnoticed. When the students are noticed, they have scored a victory.

There are victories in the outside world and victories which occur inside the mind and spirit of a person. Fears and hopes contend in us. Consider them both in some of these young people. They spend their time asking for things which they have been told they may not have, and which they are refused. This is unpleasant enough. For asking, moreover, they are called criminals, and arrested, arraigned, imprisoned. This is unpleasant enough. As they prepare to ask, and while they ask, moreover, they risk injury and sustain insult. This is unpleasant enough. But, when all is done, they must realise that what they have done is a very small beginning, and that can be very discouraging. And so, there must be hope, and the mind must find ways for persisting and continuing when factual hope is very sparse. It is in the nature of man for this to happen, and it does happen with these students. But not without some shifting and settling of emotions.

Abandoned are familiar routines and the comfort of daily rituals which are certain and predictable. Their clothes may be scattered over several states. There is no one bed and there may be many toothbrushes. These are students who have been brought up in homes where the discipline and routines of study are learned. They leave familiar feelings for contrasting and conflicting experiences. In our civilization we cherish possessions and order. We learn in those early years which bed is our bed and which glass is our glass. We learn what time school opens and when it closes and how many hours we go. We learn numbers for our houses and numbers for our ages and numbers for our grades in school. We learn our private names and learn to put our writing on our books. Programs come on the air at certain times, and watches are given to children at early ages. We learn the order of classroom seating plans and graduation walking plans. We get scored in tests and ranked in classes, and we have certain pages to read for certain examinations. We all laugh when we go into the army and receive a particularly long number beside our name; but the uneasy laugh is all too close to the long, familiar truth of our lives. When students leave college to risk punishment and leave a dormitory and classroom and library to face uncertain and changing quarters and work, they must find and make this possible for themselves. They are leaving what they have been brought up to value. They are leaving school, and the logical steps which they have been told to take as they become older; or they are staying in school but flirting with departure by their private actions in their spare time. They are no longer listening to their parents, or, if their parents agree with what they do, there is still in their memory the older words of their parents, words suggesting study, success, accumulation of knowledge, books and ideas, degrees. Obviously what each student does is balance in his own mind what he wants and what he wants to do. We may be interested in how these people think and what they feel. Each of them is different, and personal reasons will engage with public activity with differing results of happiness, nervousness, fearfulness. If we are going to talk about how the students get along with themselves or how they get along with others, we are going to talk with individual students over a long enough time to get some ideas and feelings about them. There are general observations about what they do and how they live, and there are individual observations about particular people . It is important to keep in mind that all the field secretaries live almost vagabond lives, but each field secretary comes to this life with his own resources and handicaps, and for his own reasons. We can watch people live and see them act and record that. Then we can talk with them and listen to them and hear their words and emotions and record that.

Here is some information about an American man of 20 who left college in his sophomore year to engage in some of these protesting actions. Let him be called John.

> In a small farming town of Southern Virginia he was born in the summer of 1942, shortly after we went to war. His father was away fighting in Europe during his first three years. This was the first time his father had ever left his home. His mother worked in the home of a white lawyer, taking care of three children. John was left to his maternal grandmother. He recalls her as his childhood mother, and talks about her even now with much feeling. He remembers his father's return, and the feeling of awkwardness and strangeness. A younger brother was soon to come. His father had trouble finding a job, and seemed irritable and punishing to the boy. He remembers being beaten with a strap, and running away. He remembers being punished when about five for trying to go to a circus, trying to escape his parents and enter and go on the merry-go-round. His grandmother must have told him many times about the difference between white and colored children, but he recalls that he "really learned it" when he tried to sit beside a white lady one day on a bus. "I used to straggle after her anyway, and I must have done it on the bus. She kept on pushing to the rear, and it didn't seem to have any seats. I just sat down in front. The woman pushed me and told me to get away and go to the back. I can remember how I felt then. I can still feel that feeling, like the world collapsing and not being liked. I felt I was bad and different, and I can still see that bus and that woman's look. Then, I was lectured by my grandmother, and her words drove everything I'd heard home for good. But my father was not happy with that, and he gave me the worst beating of my life when I got home. I can recall that too; I'll never forget him...telling me to keep my place...my grandmother cried and so did my mother." He tells about his school work. He was a good student, and the teachers told him that he should stay in school. Most of his friends left school when about 12 or 13, going to the fields. His mother would tell him about big and mysterious law books in her home by day. She would come home in the evening and tell the family about all the events in "the boss house." He recalls his fantasies about this, and the pleasure which those stories brought to the poor home. His father had by now a job in a new factory which came south after the war. The boy went to high school, and this was quite a distinction; in the entire family, spread over the nearby towns, he was the first. At 14 he fell in love with a girl a year older, who admired him "for my brains and promise." He wanted to leave school and marry her and get a job and she wanted him to stay at studying. They fought, he stayed, she left. He graduated, and was awarded a scholarship to a Negro college far enough away to be his break with home. He left, a family hero, and with great promise. "I remember," he tells in his deep and strong voice, "I can still remember reading about a sit-in which fellows from college were staging when I came there...I can still remember the Little Rock trouble. I used to have dreams about that. We'd sit and watch that on that television set, and we'd get angry, and my grandmother would say that those kids shouldn't try to go to that school, and my mother wouldn't say anything, and my father would curse those whites and say we should stay away from all of them...they can't be trusted, they're no good. And my mother would tell me, sometimes in a corridor away from dad, that that wasn't so, and then I'd hear about the lawyer and his family...Mother told me one day that the lawyer's oldest son told her that he was convinced that the South was changing, and that he didn't mind going to school with Negroes...mother told me that he used the word"Negro"...she can just tell and knows who thinks what about us in that house...like when they stop talking about something when she comes into the room. You can tell...I'd go to bed and dream that I was one of those nine kids in Central High, and that Faubus came over to the school and I killed him with a machine gun...or I dreamed one day that I was ambushed by the police in Little Rock and they wounded me and I was killing them, and then the army came and they stopped, and one of them told me that the only reason that I lived was because I was white. Niggers die! I can still picture that one." In his freshman year at college he did well in school. The school itself was in some turmoil, with various groups advocating various pursuits in civil rights action. "We studied, but what was happening in Nashville or what happened to those kids in New Orleans was more on our minds...we talked about that like I guess you talked about your courses when you were in college. We'd argue about whether you should stay and get through college, or go out and participate. We'd argue about whether you can serve your race better by just getting educated and doing your work, or whether you should get out there and fight for freedom. I always felt you could separate the men from the boys...I thought that this was our big moment in history... it wouldn't be worth having a profession and a family if they're going to grow up in semi-slavery. I wanted self-respect more than a degree. I felt the others were cowards... no I don't think that now. I realize that not everyone feels the way I do about this. A lot of our people don't know any better. And a lot are just scared. Some of the guys were scared of ruining what they thought was their big chance at college and their parents' one big hope. I thought of that, but I thought about how can you have a chance when a segregated society treats you only a little better than an animal...My father fought in France for this country, almost got killed. Why should he be afraid to vote? Why should he tell me that I'm not as good as some white kid, and why should he sit and "yes" the white man all day, and then come home and boose it up and tell us how rotten they are? Man, it's not worth it...I decided that...and I joined up on the freedom ride in my spring vacation...now I was really doing something, and I couldn't go back. I thought this was the best education and the best service I could perform...I'll go back to school in a while, maybe a few more months...I just want to make sure that I've really given something to this cause...and there are kicks, too. You meet a lot of interesting people. You get to know the reporters. You see yourself in the papers, and really feel that you're almost single-handed in breaking some of those things...I get worried and nervous a lot. Mostly tired though, it's tiring, travelling and talking to other students...No, I've never felt depressed. I'm in pretty good shape mentally. I get headaches sometimes, bad ones. Maybe I've got migraine... 24 times in jail, more than my age!"

We do not really know John after we read this. We have some idea about some of the things that have happened to him in his short and eventful life, and we have some idea about some of his feelings. A psychiatrist would talk with him a number of hours and would tell us that he is not deluded, and not distant, and can be understood when he talks. He would tell us that he is intelligent and he would find out that before this young man became involved in his present way of life he had never entered a courtroom, let alone a jailhouse. Hearing intently, he would begin to see how this young man grew up, how he got along with his mother and his father, and, of course, in this instance, his grandmother. He would consider his behavior as well as his words. He would find him to be a tall and thin man who looks a bit younger than his twenty years; who is neat and orderly in appearance and walks slowly and, at times, hesitantly; who talks easily and with warmth; who has enjoyed good health and who has never had any cause to feel unhappy enough with himself to see a doctor or a minister. His interests and hobbies and attitudes might be collected, and the roots of some of these in his earlier life might be uncovered. For example, "I think when I go back to school I'll take law...it's the best way to fight them (segregationists) when you get older and have to settle down...it's the same thing, we're doing one part of the job and they're doing another...we need Negro lawyers in the South...I'm going to stay right down here." These comments were replies to questions about future plans. They illustrate, again, the deep involvement of this man's life in his people's struggle for freedom. What is also shown is how his family life engages with the larger, racial issue. He is a strong, tough fighter, like his father, and now in a kind of war, and he wants to go to school and be a lawyer, with dignity and self respect, like his mother's employer. His personality and his problems are not very unique. They are the problems of growing up and finding himself as a man and a working man. What is unique for him in our country is that his skin has grimly attached itself to almost all these problems, to his early years as a child and his later years as an adolescent, to his dreams and actions and fears and aspirations. Trouble with his father, longing for his mother, attempts at achieving independence, all of these are touched by his light brown color. Decisions and choices have to pass the muster of race. If he becomes like his father in many respects, his father's opinions and feelings about the Negro and the white will be there to confront him, as well as how those feelings affected his childhood. And, with his mother, and with his grandmother. Like all people, he will sift and sort and take from many people, within and without the home, those many ways and traits and habits which make up the daily lives of a person. Race, religion, ancestry, affect us all. Saying that the Negro has a special problem in this regard, saying that he is pervasively affected, intensely affected, is merely describing his lot today among us. His lot, in each person, becomes the individual's private burden and challenge. It is hard to see how other burdens and challenges in the individual will escape the magnetism of this one.

But the individual life still exists in Negroes. We have not yet come to that among Negroes or whites. Each one of these students took his own road, made his detour for private as well as public reasons. It is a detour away from school, into jail, toward danger and possible violence. Many youths, Negro and white, in both North and South, favor what these students actively proclaim, but for reasons in their lives cannot or will not join them. Here we are up against history itself, and there are no easy separations or distinctions between these two groups of people - certainly no psychiatric ones. No, those who protest are not psychotic, retarded, delinquent. In over a year, in many meetings, in long hours with individuals and groups, I felt one girl to be rather vague and disorganized and with some ideas which were unintelligible to me, though she managed to get along fairly well in many situations. They are all very specific in their protests. Indeed, their college teachers have told me that they wish at moments that they would apply a portion of their defiant spirit to some of the crusty and stunted areas of college and classroom tradition. As you talk with one after another and hour by hour eliminate the broad categories of the crazed, eccentric, lawless, or mentally inadequate, you soon find yourself meeting yourself and your fellow human, that vast body of mankind which is alike and unalike, sometimes sad, sometimes joyful, gifted and tiresome.

Driven by their own motives and past lives, yes; but united by the historical moment that selects the doers and generates deeds. There is the very bright son of a Negro law professor who could not study well at college. Every college dean knows this problem, the famous father whose son for various reasons cannot assert himself academically. It was in the midst of this kind of difficulty that the students obtained this new recruit, able, forceful, very valuable. After over a year of doing things which very conservatively might be considered brave, he could return with high efficiency and performance to a less overwhelming and frightening college career. Another shy and slow talking boy, an only child, participated in one sit-in, for which he was arrested, lost his job, and with that, the means of support for an aged and sick parent, whose death occurred shortly thereafter. In his fierce grief he cried his accumulated rage of years after his mother's last penniless minutes in the grossly overcrowded, understaffed, slum of a Negro emergency ward in the city hospital, by leaving college for a time and walking in cities in silent outrage. These two are unalike in their homes and in their experiences in roughly the same two decades of living. One is bright, well spoken, rebellious, casual in attire and, among Negroes, born to a manor. The other is poor, cautious, very neat and careful of person, and a bit sad and heavy and unable to initiate ideas or actions. But he will follow more than the instructions of others as he walks the streets.

Walking with the Negro youth are their white friends. It is well known in the North that many white students in our universities have strong sentiments on the subject of civil rights. In the South these Northern students can be judged but another continuation of many who have hurled accusations in that direction, some of them unjust, some of them just, but rather foolishly and inappropriately self-righteous, all of them from outsiders. But in the South there are white students who are deeply of the South and who can be seen beside their colored brothers. They can be heard talking about their lives, and they can be heard talking about their rather special work and special trials. A tall, blond 22 year old native Alabaman speaks in a soft and leisurely fashion:

> "I never thought much about this one way or the other until I was a sophomore at college in Montgomery. I was taking a course in sociology and one of the topics was about the Negro in Alabama. I started doing some reading, and then talked with a few teachers. Many of them would tell us their private opinions about the issue, but were afraid to speak out publicly. I started getting more and more interested. At first it was just intellectual, I wanted to write a good paper and wanted to know about what I was writing about...I started noticing how Negroes existed. It suddenly occurred to me that all the things I took for granted were forbidden to them...Now I was a junior and a big deal on campus, and I talked with more of the professors about this...they seemed scared when I said that if everyone in Alabama said what they really felt we wouldn't have some of these things...I'm not even sure about that, but I do know what I feel, and I have to live with myself...My father once belonged to the Klan, but it had nothing to do with Negroes. I think the whole town joined after the first world war. He's a minister... has always said that this whole segregation thing is wrong. He's glad that I'm doing what I'm doing...says that if he were my age he'd be out there fighting, too. My mother worries, but she always worries about us...We've been in this state as long as anyone, generations...no, it was gradual involvement. I don't remember the exact moment when I went from studying the problem to doing something about it... I've always liked action. I think that if you believe something you can sacrifice for it...this is our biggest test here in the South, and we've got to solve it ourselves by realizing that we're not free when we can't say what we want or associate with anyone we wish...I like tennis, swimming, anything that really gives me a work-out...I'd like to put in another year at this, and then maybe go back to school and study about all this, like in sociology or psychology. Figure out why people are so strange about all this...let their kids be brought up by Negroes, let them serve them and prepare their food, then blow sky high if one of them tries to sit near them in a Walgreen's...we have our problems as whites in the movement. I no longer stay in white hotels...I decided that as long as they were segregated and I couldn't be in a place with my own friends, I'd stayed in the colored places. I go to the colleges and talk with students. You'd be surprised at how many people are with us, all over the South. They have to be quiet, and do things underground style...I never push them, never try to get them to do something that will get them expelled just to prove a point. They can talk in the cafeteria or in the dorms, and they can find out how others feel, and they can work from within...very often with the help of a lot of the faculty, who have to keep quiet about it, too...That's what bothers me more than anything else, not being free to speak out and say what I want to. I keep telling some of the fellows I meet that I joined this because if I can't say what I want, I'm not any more a free person than the Negro... I used to debate, was on the team...used to think I'd be a politician, run for the Senate, but not much chance of that... I've changed, learned so much about what's really going on around me...They really get enraged at me when they can't just dismiss me as a dammyankee...I've been arrested so many times I've given up counting, dozens...everything from disorderly behavior, violating city ordinances, unruly assembly, criminal anarchy, the whole range...The jails vary. Some of those police know the handwriting on the wall, laugh about the whole thing with us. Others are real sadists. Turn on the hot air in summer to burn you up, or let you freeze in winter, or mess your food up, and swear, can they swear! Sometimes I think I'm becoming anti-white, I get so disguseed...I can understand how some of the guys just get fed to the teeth with the whole white race...then we settle down...they remember me and a lot of others and we try to forget the whole skin thing between us. I'm black, they're white, we joke about it. I do get discouraged sometimes...but I think about what I'm doing, and it really is more significant to me than reading books...I can go back to that, but then I won't just feel I've been in an ivory tower all my life. This way I've done something to make this a better country...I'm no complete idealist...I know you've got to be strategic...but there's a time when regardless of what you say to yourself and read, it rings hollow compared with what people have to suffer in the world, and that's the time to commit yourself to action... It took me a few years, but I think you need time to find out about some of these things before you can do anything about them. It took me a long time to figure out what I could do even when I wanted to do something...Sometimes some of my Negro friends think I'm nuts for putting my life on the line... I tell them that they've been brainwashed by the segregationists into believing they're not worth the effort, and, besides, this is my fight, because the white race is really doomed if we don't solve this problem."

There is little need for comment here. This boy grew up in a deeply religious home, an active, vigorous, alert youngster who runs well, plays good tennis, reaches for prizes in expressing himself in argument in high school, dreams of political glory, does well in college, is slowly struck by certain underprivileged people, and, in his father's own tradition, stops a while in his life to apply his restless, seeking energy to their plight, which becomes his. He outdistances his father, as each generation does, and he lives with people the life of someone who gives of himself to those less fortunate. They love and, in a sense, adore him, as people do when they meet someone who extends, even if slightly, the possibilities in man, or confounds the expectations of him.

They also love a young girl whose eyes are hazel and hair long, brown and flung about when she turns her head in emphasis. Also Southern, she has not left college. But she works as hard there for what she believes as she studies what is taught. A willful girl, she had a less gradual introduction to the unreason of race.

"There are a few Negro girls at my college, and, honestly, at first they scared me. I didn't know them, but I just wasn't accustomed to seeing Negroes in a school or college with whites. I was brought up with them all over the house, but that's where they were supposed to be. My mother was always very good to them...told us they were like wonderful children with grown bodies that did all kinds of work for us, but not much mind. I believed her for a long time, but I began to question everything when she didn't want me to go to the very college she'd be hoping I'd go to all my life just because they desegregated and took in a few Negroes. You'd have thought the South was collapsing to listen to her. But I went, and one of the last things she told me was to be careful about them...kind of like there was a pestilence that might take every white body near it. Daddy just laughed and laughed, and used to tease mother, and tell her she was just plain scared, and letting it all out on the poor nigras. I can hear him saying 'Mother, you just leave them alone, and they'll leave you alone. They've done plenty for us, and if their day is coming, it'll be good for us as well as them. Take your fears out on something else besides them. We've used them too long already for that kind of hating and beating. I'd rather kick a tree or something when I'm not feeling good...' Daddy is a lawyer...comes from South Carolina, but has always been liberal on race...he told me to take anthropology in college and find out about as many people as I could, because they're all going to be heard from in my lifetime...But I was scared, kind of a physical feeling that told me to stay away from them, it's hard to explain. One day one of them was brought to the table where I was eating. I had to get a strong hold on myself to stay there and to keep on eating. I couldn't help it, I just felt sick to my stomach, sick all over. I smiled and tried to be friendly, but I was in a cold sweat...later, in my room, I realized that I was sick, that it was a kind of sickness when you react that way to another person you don't even know, just because of color... it's more than that, though, it's the way you've grown up, and been taught. I said that night to myself that if I could throw away some other ideas I'd heard at home, I could throw this one away too. I just had to...it was like curing myself... I forced myself at first to get nearer to them, to talk with them or sit with them at the table. Then I found that I really liked one of them, she and I had lots to talk about, and she was a really attractive person...then, my old reactions seemed so strange and I can't understand how I ever could have felt that way...of course, when I went home and told my mother about this, she almost died. She cried and we really had a time. She swears that she'll send my brother only to a segregated college, but I laugh and tell her that by the time he's ready to go to college she's going to have a tough time living up to her word. Bobby is 14. A lot is going to happen in 4 or 5 years...Daddy just laughs, and tells me that Mother makes a lot of fuss, but is tough underneath and she thinks she has to get excited about things like this...'Your mother hasn't it in her to hurt anyone, black or white...she's just changing her ideas in her own way. She has to cry them out, and repeat them a few times so that she can say goodbye to them. That's the South, holding to its own as long as it can, because it had precious little to hold to for a long time...' That's daddy for you...after a while I decided I'd actually do something about all of this, and so I started speaking up whenever the subject came up, and you'd be surprised at how many people just are waiting for others to take the lead...and then we formed our campus organization and picked certain jobs to do, like education at our own school and helping put pressure on the movie owners and restaurant people. Most of their business comes from students, so we should have some say in how they treat people..."

She and her friends were having much to say, and their words were expressed in deeds, which caused changes in the admissions policy of local movie houses and cafeterias. In her Southern state this is possible. There are others like her in the bottom tier of states along the Gulf of Mexico who, if they are to stay in college, must be more circumspect, and less hopeful of immediate translation of ideals into realities. If we play back the hours of tapes which have recorded her voice and her words and her story, we can sense certain themes: of her mother and her father, and how they differ and how she gets along with them and expresses her divided loyalties in many ways, not the least of which is her position on the racial question; of her childhood and training and memories as they meet a world which no longer sustains their value or truth or reality; of the crisis in her life, the discord when these old traditions in her meet upon new ways in the South, in her college; of her solutions, accompanied by fear and guilt, and brought home for their resolution, and her emergence as a grown lady. In this case there is a more decisive experience at the supper table, which engages with not too dormant personal struggles, in themselves universal for college girls. A crisis in history is a crisis for people, and human beings yearn for ways of expressing themselves. This girl found her way.

Since the way of these students involves obvious danger, those taking the way must be able to live with this danger, must be able to persist unflagged by it. Facing danger at their own behest, devoting themselves to its encounter with such fullness and passion, they offer instructive examples of how young people manage such commitments and do not falter. The obvious dangers are from crowds and from the police and from judges and jailers. But there are other problems, too. There are problems of money, needed to eat and sleep and travel; needed to get out of jail while the judgment and sentences are appealed. Bail can be set in the thousands by a local court which so desires. There are problems of the devil: of publicity, of attracting attention to their actions, so that people will be shamed, embarrassed, or forced to act out of expediency, national interest, economic or business anxieties. In a country of interests which often conflict and whose genius is their reconciliation, they too must become versed in the practical and possible. But this means practical and possible for them, and if they listen too closely to the wise counsel of even their most friendly elders they might well lose one of their greatest possessions, their own, youthful, sometimes heedless and blind, momentum. The problems of momentum are problems of the flesh: of how to behave before mobs, of how to behave with one another, of how to live with oneself, and keep one's morale high.

A psychiatrist interested in how people manage these tough assignments gets to know the young men and women and watches them in action. In this age of machines his impressions can be stimulated and recalled in later months by recording his conversations on tape; and he can hover over the tapes the way others may pore over books, looking for some of the thoughts and feelings which may pass him during the conversations themselves. After he's talked to enough of the students, long enough, he gets some ideas about how they manage. How they manage can be discovered without tape, but with tapes we can hear their every word; such as when they respond to questions like "How do you feel when you walk into a situation that you know in advance will lead to violence or arrest or jail?"

> "I don't feel, I just go ahead...We sing and encourage one another...We've practiced and rehearsed. It's like I suppose my dad did in France against the Nazis, you're in a kind of an army, and you've got no choice, except that you've joined on your own, not been drafted." Another says, "I close my eyes mentally...Sometimes I pray just before, or I keep on saying that nothing too bad can happen in America...we have the reporters nearby and the Federal government...they can't do what they used to do...you know...lynchings are harder for them...I know some of them would like to, but they're afraid to...not in this world, they can't..."
> The young wife of one of the students insists "I'm prepared to give up my life...I've made that decision, and it's almost as if I'm no longer in my body. The body can be sacrificed. I just look at myself and say to myself 'Man, you can lose your body, but they can't take your soul away. They can just lose theirs. And I'm going to help them...'" Another college sophomore, a young girl who wants to be a teacher someday but has taken a few months' leave hesitates then starts with "Every time I feel afraid I just remind myself that we've got nothing to lose. I think of all the things I've had to put up with in my life. I think of all the movies I can't go to, all the restaurants I can't eat in, all those separate rest rooms and water fountains, and, I tell you, I can get so angry that they could have atom bombs on their clubs and police dogs and I'd keep on walking or sitting. We've got our rights as human beings to gain, and absolutely nothing to lose, not a thing. So, why not? Oh, I have to get myself to thinking about this sometimes, when I get nervous, or when the jail is a bad one, and you don't know what they're going to do...you can do that, though, get yourself primed, like a pump or something..." A veteran of 18 arrests commented, "It's almost like going into an army. Well, a better example is the Crusades, where men went off for their religious convictions, almost voluntarily...You not only feel what you've always felt, but you've decided to stake your life on the line for it. You'll go to jail, face the police and those screaming seggies...face the whole world...We help one another, keep our strength up with music and we talk a lot after it's happened, and joke and get some laughs out of it...it's fun to see your picture in the papers, and read the different accounts, a lot of them get all botched up, or completely slanted, of course...one thing I've heard some of my friends say is that they never really believe that those crowds will hurt them...heckle and scream, yes, but not really hurt. I can't quite pull that off in my mind. I know that they may hurt me, but I figure we can take it, and give it back. I've taken worse all my life...this is the first chance I've had to do something while taking it that may end the whole rotten mess..."

These comments, spliced from inert tape, extracted from longer sentences of explanation and comment, give us some idea about how they keep going, and keep doing the things they do.

Clearly their feelings and their consciences impel them. Clearly, also, in order to endure inevitable apprehensions, they must either remove themselves or temporarily blot out some real threats. Determined minds can do this. They can abstract the mind and emotions from the body, and let it serve duty and risk injury. They can deny danger, wipe out or minimize hazards. They can make thorny dilemmas very simple, and they can oblige such activity, such continual movement and travel that there is little time for nervous brooding. They can encourage singing, and meeting, and praying with others, gaining the well-known strength of camaraderie. They can see fear, and terror in others, in the enemy, and fail to see their anger and rage. The enemy becomes afraid, and they are unafraid. They can urge talking and sharing in words the common dread. They can gain very human pleasure from anticipated rewards of renown, attention, approval, balancing with these all the present hesitations and doubts. They can fall back on what they call "techniques", dwelling upon the details of how to behave, where to go, what to say or do, placing their feelings in an envelope of rituals and memorized, almost automatic, maneuvers. They dribble away large doubts in small annoyances. Panic can splinter into a generally fretful day. Angry jokes can be told. Books which give comfort or release or escape can be read. There is always good food, and one can sleep longer hours. A bad headache, some vague stomach pains, these can silently express unallowed anxiety. There are day dreams, fantasies, nightmares, all perhaps lowering some pressures which may build up. In between fun, movies, exercise may help; and there can be very quick and nervously short and intense romances, almost as in wars, when the lovers know they may be separated by the nature of war, that they have only a brief time, to which they bring so very many emotions other than love. Letter writing helps. And, some of these minds can not only feel frustrated and anxious and angry and fearful, but they can hate. Often, if the alternative is despair, they can hate and hate mean and hard, can give back what they've received rather than sink into it themselves.

In courts and in jails their minds have additional difficulties. They are being accused and, usually, condemned. The charges range from disturbing the peace and loitering to criminal anarchy. Those under 16 or 18 may be called delinquents and sent for long periods of so-called evaluation and confinement. Some courts have even referred them to mental hospitals for psychiatric observation. With such certain punishment for their efforts, they must learn how to live in cells and under charges of criminality or insanity without losing their sense of themselves and their integrity. This requires no little effort. To do this they can deny their guilt, and turn the illegal into the just. You can hear them listing with pride their arrests and jailings. You can hear them upholding their own values against those of cities and states. You can hear them calling for the support of their government and the tradition of western democracy. They do this out of conviction and out of need. All the time they are being told by people in black robes and people in uniforms carrying guns, ~~and~~ by newspapers and influential citizens, that they are bad and they are unruly and they are outcasts. All the time they are being hustled and confined, after being refused and insulted. This cannot fail to affect them, cannot fail in some part of their minds to make them feel worthless or wrong or guilty as charged. Since all of us have gone through childhood and learned about being good and being bad, and doing good and doing bad, and being praised and being criticised, memories of the past and anxieties of the past can return under such evocative and haunting circumstances of the present. In a sense they are being sent to a room which is now a jail to be alone and repent for being bad and disobedient. And this is precisely what one of the students dreamed while in prison:

> "I had one of those really vivid dreams, that stays with you the whole day. I remembered most of it so clearly. I was talking to my father and he was mad at me because I had gone to the movies and didn't tell my mother, and she thought something had happened to me. He told me he was going to strap me, that I had done this too many times...I must obey them, or else a whipping. I was sent to my room and told I wouldn't get any supper; then I woke up, and I actually thought I was in that room for a flash of a second, and sort of looked around and got myself adjusted to where I was...it was one of the worst of the cells I've been in, dirty and really the lowest of the low for prison guards...filthy language and they love to tease and taunt you."

While many can remember early lessons and restrictions and can dream about them, these young students, by virtue of their actions, and the reactions of others to them, actually relive those days.

Living lives of the condemned asks something of you. It asks you to have control. Just as non-violent protest requires control, but now you are not free any more. Control of feelings and behavior is important to these students, and, in order to insure its strength they often live very ascetic lives, as if the large amount of control needed has to be obtained by spreading it into almost all of the person's activities. In some of the front lines of Mississippi relaxation of body or mind must be guarded. Even when they are not protesting they may be under constant surveillance. They must drive cautiously and live cautiously. Even amongst the Negroes they must keep an image of dedication, because they are suspicious and afraid. They must control the temptation to exploit their work. Once they become heroes to some of their people easy promiscuity and many comforts may be offered them. They are anxious, and part of them very humanly responds to such. One can hear them in meetings talk about this, warn themselves in advance and point out the dangers:

> "...If we're going to stay in the Movement, we've got to watch ourselves, we've got to control ourselves all the time. It's like a war. They call it a fight to the finish, and so will we. If we're going into Mississippi and Alabama, then we've got to have iron discipline...You either put all your energy into the Movement, or you stay behind and so do something else...no fooling around, we can't take risks like that, we've got enough with the "segs" without setting things up for them ourselves."

At times, under extreme danger, they go into a state which they call "commandati", which means extreme alert and caution, which measures a response to all the harassments that accumulate in a struggle such as theirs. It is not that they are by nature unruly or wild. On the contrary, they tend to be rather controlled and studious people. It is that they are under attack, and they must prepare themselves and one another for such unusual strains. To hold up under these strains requires devotion, and energy, and ingenuity. Perhaps only the young, the still unattached and unemployed and unsettled, can take this on.

They take on cells for homes. They must hold their sanity, keep their orientation amidst isolation and obvious humiliation. It is one thing to have the kind of mind which a criminal has, and to go to jail for a crime committed. Many such people can even shrug off the jailing as part of the game, part of the gamble. It is another thing to have a highly developed conscience, and to be moved by that conscience to certain deeds of fulfillment; and, in pursuit of these, in quest of being a fuller citizen, to be insulted, fined, sent off to solitary confinement or overcrowded cells. It is another thing because these students are not hard and tough and callous, and yet they must get along where they don't belong, but are made to be, and where they are often treated with more contempt than hardened lawbreakers who are there for robbery, assault, drunk and disorderly behavior.

In the East Baton Rouge, Louisiana ParishPrison I talked at length with a tall, thin, 20 year old student who had been there in solitary confinement for 2 months on a charge of criminal anarchy. When all the doors had been closed, and I was locked in, the first view was that of a large blackboard with the prison census divided by races first, sexes second. I wondered what genes or chromosomes made for such high numbers of male Negroes and low numbers of female whites. I was there at the request of his counsel because this young man, whom we shall call Jim, had written letters to friends in Atlanta requesting psychiatric help because "I'm beginning to think I may be cracking, I'm really getting near the edge." His criminal and anarchic behavior was that of organizing students in a Negro college nearby, urging them to help other Negroes vote, or be served in department store lunch counters. When he first came to the jail he was put in close quarters with recurrent criminals, the most beaten and desperate, the most lowly and chaotic of his people. In the medical examining room, and later after his release, he talked about it all:

"You know, I thought until then I knew how to get along in jail. I'd been in lots of jails since I joined SNCC (Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee, pronounced "Snick") but this was almost too much. First I had to fight to keep away from those guys...sodomy all the time, and I think they were egged on by the guards. What a bunch of thugs. They told me that the place had been investigated twice before, so they were going to be careful, but they let me have as much as they could...sent heat in the cell when I was hot anyway...finally moved me to solitary. I thought at first that would be better, but it gets strange after a while. You fight just to keep track of time and to get through time. It drags, man, it drags 'till you think you've just about had it. You try to write, if they'll give you paper. You dream, and try to sleep. But I couldn't sleep. No exercise, so I didn't need sleep. If only I could have slept, or dozed all day...terrible slop for food...I'll tell you what it does to you, it makes you wonder whether you'll ever get out, and, soon, you begin to lose some of your fight. They would get their trustees (prisoners who help the guards in carrying trays or cleaning. In that jail they get a certain number of days or weeks removed from their sentence for this) to come and shine their shoes in front of me. Those pitiful Negroes, on their knees shining the shoes of the guards, and then they'd ask them...'Joe, aren't you happy with things the way they are in Louisiana?' and big Joe, big, free, independent, American citizen Joe would look up at them and say'Yesuh, yesuh, Mr. Boss, I sure am, yesuh.' Then they'd turn and make the poor guy tell that to me...the worst was when they brought those kids in, those white school children and pointed me out as a Communist. They had me on display, like a damn guinea pig...I was marking the days off on the wall...they gave me, finally gave me two books...Kipling's short stories and a history of China written in 1849 or so...yeah, pretty funny, but not then it wasn't...those pills did help, they took the nerves out of me, let me settle down...they told me they didn't have to give them to me...the doctor came around and asked me why I didn't tell him about what was aching me or bothering me...I couldn't trust him...he was probably o.k... made sure I got the pills. I'm glad they let me write to you. Writing a letter can keep you going for days...I don't know if I can take another spell like that. I'm not crazy, but I began to wonder how many days I had left before I started getting there...."

He was indeed very anxious and more frightened than he may have known when he was in jail. He was afreid of assault, sexual, personal, moral, mental and spiritual. He was afraid of losing the complicated organization of mind and emotions which we spend so long building and which are not usually meant to be tested by hells like this. He was afraid of losing his gritty, tough, daring ways and dissolving in tears of panic and confusion, if not downright disorientation and delusion. When you are alone for a long time, and you know for a fact that people want to hurt you and have that in their absolute power, every sound, every shadow, every movement can signal danger and death. It is a slow fall downwards. Fortunately he was released after three months in jail. I think it was good for him to be seen by a doctor and put on tranquilizers and allowed to write. His jailers and their superiors in the nearby district attorney's office could scarcely let him effectively lose his mind. That might hurt their cause. Such was his protection, and such is how men are protected from men in some places.

Sometimes they spend short periods of a day or two in jail. Often they can turn these days into frolic. They are together in cells, and they sing and laugh and talk. Or, if alone, they can send messages and whistle and sing back and forth. They can make chess sets out of paper and hide them, and they can even talk with sympathetic guards and learn that many of them realize that it's a losing battle they wage..."That does you good, to hear them say things like that...when my daddy hears that he'll think I'm kidding... we grew up to fear the police like the Devil himself. I'll go home and say, 'Daddy, even the police are throwing in the towel in the great state of Georgia.'" Such remarks hint at some of the flippant, arrogant, angry phrases, the sarcastic phrases, the words of mock irony which can be heard; sometimes smouldering resentment, neatly kept, can become a white heat of anger and hatred. This can cause shame and alarm for those who are not Negro, and are torn by their sympathy and their ability because of different experiences, to know better, feel less desperate.

> "It's hard for the white student in this at times," one of them confided. "Sometimes you have to keep quiet and listen, let them get it all out of their systems every once in a while. I feel terrible...it's no good if we get desegregation and they're so embittered they become just like the segregationists. That's the danger, now. Look at the Black Muslims. Some of the guys I know are not Black Muslims, but they're becoming kind of African Nationalists... they tear down this country and say that Africa's the place for them, to live and...where everything is good. That's what happens when you treat people like this...most of them really love this country though...I don't know if I would... after a while they cool down...sometimes apologize to us... I understand how they have to get like that sometimes...I don't take it personally. I think the Movement should have whites in it, even in Mississippi, where they get so enraged when they see us together...that's what it's all about, that we can work side by side."

They work side by side, and then a time comes when they leave, going back to college, or back to work, or to a graduate school. When they decide to leave, like when they decided to come, will vary from person to person, as will the length of their stay. Some have been working at the problem for years, some for months. They all recognize that one cannot spend a lifetime at this, at least not in the capacity of a student. But it can be hard to leave a group of students who are all on leave from college and who have created in themselves the several alliances and bonds which make it so hard to leave college itself for many undergraduates. Or it can be hard because the person leaves out of tired annoyance, or beginning despair, "...I've just had enough, filled up to the teeth with arrests and foul-mouthed crowds and dirty looks from storekeepers..."

Since many of these storekeepers are bowing to the pressures of the students, the students very much continue and by and large without despair or depression. Perhaps more of a problem now for them is the inevitable consequence of their various successes. Like any gathering of human beings who are trying to do things together, they have to come to some settlement with the nature of themselves as a group or organization. In 1960 when 4 of them went into a store in Greensboro that was not a problem. It still isn't in the many spontaneous instances where a group of high school or college students simply decide to take on a specific job, like a movie house in their town. But if a systematic assault is to be made through direct protest, and if considerable resistance is met, requiring planning and more time and effort than originally estimated, there must be distribution of work and energy and direction and such complications of human intercourse ~~which~~ AS will reflect the complications of the society under attack. Living in a fairly organized society, fairly highly-organized, the students learn that it will not necessarily fall under an attack of the moment. And so they pool efforts, and communicate, and since there are many colleges, and many cities and many states, they come together and meet, and talk and argue, and try to regulate themselves, and belong to different organizations and call themselves by different names. They find, in the continuing irony of human existence, that adversity has its own joys and success its own trials. They worry about losing their freedom and spontaneity in a mass of constitutions and by laws and regulations. They worry about exhausting themselves in bureaucratic tangles, in endless appeals for money. They fear the absorption, the futile absorption of stamp machines, mimeograph machines, and filing cabinets even as they know how they are needed. They struggle with these new and petty tyrannies, trying for the needed balance of personal action and staff action. This struggle may be harder, in the very long run, than even that for the rights of the Negro. Wherever there are men, there are rivalries, envies, competing needs for power. Wherever there are men there are also possibilities of great and decisive things done, ideas conceived. They are struggling for the right to be human, to be men in the many senses of that word, and so this, too, will mark their progress; when they can wrangle with the fruits of their labor like all other free men.

Their harvest becomes a harvest for all; and also a source of challenge to many. Those who are interested in how people do things to change things about them will study these students. The various social scientists will consider their case. Certainly they offer interesting challenges to psychiatrists. We are asked today to help the courts decide not only whether a person knows the difference between right and wrong, but whether he is so constituted by personality that he can adhere to this understood difference. We have urged considering motives and impulses as well as facts and strict rationality. We have urged changes in laws where we have felt them to be unfair or harsh or not in accordance with our view of the nature of the human mind and its development. We urge understanding of people, and help for people who do not feel well in mood or thought. Finally, we are asked not only to do our healing and our research and teaching, but to advise, as well as the courts, the general public on the widest variety of subjects. We are consulted about the nature of delinquency, what it is, who they are, and what can be done. We venture more and more into prisons to work with prisoners, on the good premise that people impelled to crime have some disorder of impulse as well as record of wrongdoing, and should be treated with more than custodial reckoning. We are asked about problems in schools and colleges, problems of learning, of behavior, of suitability for certain programs. We are consulted by many professions, to help them choose candidates for the ministry or screen applicants for crucial places in business or the government. Presumably, then, our capacity to evaluate human beings and their behavior is considered by others and by ourselves of some practical as well as theoretical value. Presumably, also, our knowledge is felt to extend beyond the mental hospitals and consultation rooms and into the life of the community.

The lives of many of our communities today are endangered by the troubles that groups of people have in getting along with one another. Large numbers of people gather themselves around certain names which describe religions or nations or sections of nations or races, or combinations of these. They declare themselves apart by rituals or flags or color or customs or locations. In their behavior with one another these multitudes are often like individuals: they get along, or they fight, they help one another or they try to control one another. It has been this way for a long time. New collections of people emerge and old ones may die as new bonds and ties appear and old sources of allegiance seem less compelling. It has been and still is a part of growing up in most of the world to find out about oneself and many of these associations, national, sectional, racial, help in this and contribute to it through traditions, customs, knowledge, security. Perhaps when people know themselves fairly well, and are not too afraid of themselves, and are fairly easy with themselves, they do not have to escape from themselves and lose themselves in overworked assertions of themselves as members of particular groups rather than as persons. Perhaps if people are discovered on other planets, we can then use our own as a new way of gathering together, in distinction to them. Until then, we struggle with man's nature, his limitations, and some possibilities in him which are yet to be exhausted. Certainly these students have shown that American youth can look around and see things that are hurtful to themselves and to others, and venture forth to change them. Certainly their work is important; and certainly it should be evaluated if we are concerned with changing life in our community. As psychiatrists we have this concern, and our society asks this concern of us. Our challenge with the challenge of these students is, as always, to gather observations and descriptions; then attempt to sort them out and come to some estimate, always tentative, of what their behavior means and what it may portend. To do this may be easier than to reconcile some of our own professional problems. But, in a stimulating fashion, the behavior of these students may help clarify some of our professional problems.

Not the least of our problems is that elusive word "normal". We wonder what it is and how to use it; we wonder whether it exists and we are struck by the curious obsession which it inspires in many around us. Not the least of our problems is deciding what is "sick", and what is "healthy". Two more words which plague us. Since we are doctors, well they should; but well that we should use them very carefully. Then, we have to decide at times who can best take on a particular job, or perform well in a certain situation. We then start evaluating "creative" and "destructive" parts of the person. And find them often entangled enough to blur their separate meanings. We also have to worry about our own values, our own hopes and ideas of what is desirable for man, what helps him grow, and what is crippling and harmful. Nor can we remove ourselves or our patients from the world around us. At times we debate this, but the very debate reflects a kind of world which tolerates or encourages discussion and dissent.

How, then, do we comprehend these protesting students who break laws and go to jail and are sent to detention centers as delinquents or to mental hoppitals for suspected insanity? How do we evaluate their departure from college, their radical departure from established customs and habits; their defiance of law and order; their public display of themselves and its resultant public uproar? How do we evaluate their desire to do things even though they know they will be insulted, attacked, injured? How do we evaluate this stubborn, sly, systematic assault upon the laws and conventions of our society by these youths of both races? Casting a glance elsewhere, we can ask some other questions. How do we comprehend those students who don't participate in these demonstrations? How do we evaluate their attitude toward themselves if they are Negro, or to others if they are white? How do we evaluate their willingness to endure or see endured by others these restrictions and deprivations of person, property and dignity? How do we look at them in school, or in their obedience to laws which curb and isolate them or others? Finally, do we dare look at our society and ourselves in it with any questions? What in laws and customs will help people be secure or maintain health, and what is injurious? What do we mean when we use the words "well-adjusted"? Or, "poorly-adjusted"? We certainly use them. Can a boy who has been arrested 25 times and in jail 18 times and charged by his society with criminal anarchy be called "well-adjusted", "delinquent," "anti-social", or "creative"? Does he have a "problem with authority", and, if he does, why don't more people have it? Should we call it a problem? A problem for whom? So many adjectives are around us and come from us in conferences and in our journals, but students like these challenge their unrestrained application. When we talk about masochism and hear the words "acting-out" we are challenged in our nouns, too, by these students. Are they "acting-out", are they masochistic, are they troublesome deviants? Or are they other words we use, like well-integrated (they are, of course!) or "mature", with "good defenses" and highly developed sublimations? Finally, what do we do about applying what we know about people, what is healthy and sickly in them, to these problems? These students are denounced and praised. Should we, can we, evaluate their actions with some sense and fairness? Or do we find such problems too prickly, too dangerous to our positions in society, too risky for involvement? Perhaps these students challenge us and make us troubled about our concepts and language, about our present ability to answer many problems, about some of our limitations of service for society despite some of its importunate requests and some of our indiscreet replies. If so, they will have given us a measure of humility. This would be a large gift. With humility, we need not apologize for some of our present ignorance. Ignorance, for man, is a challenge, and it is a high honor to engage with it. We lose honor only when we see victory when there is still a long struggle ahead. Perhaps these students of social change and we students of human nature can meet in that struggle.

For, there can be no doubt that many of their problems are with us, too. Daily they show us how they must refuse the arbitrary and absurd confinements of skin color. Each of them is an individual, and they hope that some day they will be known to their fellows by themselves, by who they are and what they do. Pigment seems to them, to those who are white as well as black, a frivolous and tragic standard for human knowledge of one another, an irrelevant distinction, indeed. It is, then, the meaningless word, the hollow hurtful evocation which bothers them. Similarly with us do categories and labels of soothing certainty abound. We have no little ability or wish to add to these terms and to these conceptual separations of the mind within a person and of people from one another. Our peril is that, driven by the need to find out about ourselves, we may find ourselves more puzzled than ever by our own thinking and the conflicting faiths which may adhere to our thoughts. We must challenge our concepts and categories just as the non-violent youth of our South challenge those of others. If our terms fail to describe what is happening in the world of people and their lives, they must leave us. If they are contradictory, inadequate, misleading, they must go. If they fail to account for human effort and courage and man's deeds toward a more decent world, if they fail to envision and honor the reality of the heroic in the smallest quietest assertion of a deeply ethical youth at a Southern lunch counter or in a Southern jail, they must depart. What we may need now very much is some rope from our ideas about people to these same people, walking in a world in which we seem so very prominent today. If these students can help us with some of that cord, their efforts will be our gain.

Dear Leslie,

Thanks for your letter. I plead guilty; of being a vagabond doctor;of leaving my patients arbitrarily and capriciously; and of some of my equivocations in the enclosed report.

I don't know what to say about it...It is fairly clear, I hope, that I am trying to present some observations without getting involved in defense or attack of positions. I have tried to write fairly, and to tone down charged words. I always get depressed after I write, and so, right now, I feel failure with this. I thought of enumerating recommendations, but then I have trouble with that, and would much rather suggest in a narrative, and let people come to their own conclusions, hoping that I have led them there . Also, I thought it wise to hold off for a while until "the study ends", and I've had time to decide myself whether, in fact, I want to get embroiled in haggling about what to do under what situation, and such things as preoccupy the damn profession of educational psychology, or whatever.

Any way, this is a first try. If you want changes, corrections, or want the whole thing scrapped and rewritten, let me know , and I'll oblige. Jane, and a shrewd old Shady Hill teacher friend of hers (not Katharine Taylor) like the thing...but I, frankly, have a bad headache, and have been having one every page of the way, because I keep on writing with people like Letsonx and his ilk in small towns in Alabama in my mind...hoping to persuade them, when I'm basically happier shouting. In any case, my head is better, and I'm starting a very strong drink, now. I hope you had a good time in North Carolina. Maybe I'll call you next week. We'll be leaving soon.I"chickened out " on the profligate trip to Atlanta, coward and puritan that I am..... Best from Jane and me,

Bob

Dear Leslie,

Here is an article which will appear in a book in mid winter, I think. I don't know what to say. I fluctuate. It will be in a book on Youth, of all things! I like the idea of youth, and of keeping it, but, beyondthat, it's really very treacherous going. There will be chapters on this and that, and they tell me that Labor Secretary Goldberg is writing on Industrial Youth and some one on the Peace Corps, and all such manner of things. Erik Erikson, editor of the book, went into a wild fit of glee and delight over this, which 1.) amused me, 2.) made me feel very good and proud of myself, and 3.) by the way he talked, persuaded me that he doesn't know what's going on in the South....and made me worry whether I do, either, since ignorance has a way of communicating itself in most beguiling ways...even amongst those beleagured with pretty sentences and words.

Let me know , very candidly, what you think. I mean every word of the footnote, so let me know.

I may come down there one of these days. I mean, we'll be coming back , soon, but I may come down there , anyway, on various and sundry missions.

I hav e written some more things, which I'll inflict on you later. The last thing to write about is the Report for SRC. I'm debating whether to finish it now, or wait for a few weeks in September, after I've seen how things go this year. I've got an outline, and filled a lot of it in...we'll see.

Anyway...my best to all of you.

SOUTHERN CHILDREN UNDER DESEGREGATION*

ROBERT COLES, M. D.

INTRODUCTION

Confronting certain children in the South today are the tasks of getting an education under unusual conditions of social stress. These children, their families and teachers, have happened upon a moment in historical change, and their behavior in such circumstances deserves our attention. For nearly ten years now the deep South has faced increasing national pressure upon its avowedly segregated system of public education, and slowly, with stated reluctance, it has been forced to begin to permit the entry of a few Negroes into its colleges first, its high and elementary schools later.

We need not doubt the highly charged and symbolic meaning of desegregation for many people in the cities of the South. The mere approach of one six-year old colored child toward a white school could arouse so old and sophisticated a city as New Orleans for weeks, bringing in its wake unease all over the city, with mobs, vandalism, and international notice as expressions and consequences. Atlanta spared herself what other cities had experienced in this regard only through the most careful and determined planning of an alerted police force thoroughly supported by the local political leadership and the newspapers.

What has happened again and again is the explosion of words of hate and deeds of violence by certain white people, these in turn prompted by fears and anxieties. Public disorder, organized scorn, or, under conditions of order, carefully patrolled calm, such are the external conditions somhow faced and managed by those scatterings of Negro children who continue to press their admission and attendance upon formerly all white schools; and these dark children are received by their waiting white classmates in various ways. As psychiatrists, we must look further, trying to find out how these several groups of people think and feel, looking at their responses under tension, evaluating their survival and manner of accommodation with new realities daily urged upon them. In any crisis of society are the individuals who enact it, seeking it, caught in it, attempting to flee it. This particular struggle has many roots in our history and culture, many implications in our current political and economic life, all of them beyond the present concerns of this paper, which must be with the individual child and his psychological development and adjustment. We may only emphasize that such distinctions are arbitary if necessary. No child can be separated from the history of his people, from their lot and their condition. This is not the place to chronicle the fate of the Negro in America, nor to trace the development of the white man's attitudes in the South, or North likewise, toward him. Such has been done by historians, (1-4), sociologists (5), psychologists (6-8), and psychiatrists (9-14), and, as we take up our work here we are forced merely to mention these facts of "culture" or "environment", or "socio-economic context." It must be obvious, however, that at every moment in the life of these children, such facts are firm realities for them.

Nature of This Study

Our Negro children have been selected by others, by themselves and their parents by virtue of application, by federal judges by virtue of decision, by school boards by virtue of compliance and permission. Our white children have been those who attended class with these Negroes, in the beginning simply living their normal lives of growing and being schooled; suddenly finding themselves with new questions of attitude and behavior. Finally, the parents of all these children, white and colored, and their teachers, all of them white, have been a part of our study, supplying valuable observations about their children and students, talking a good deal about their own problems in what is for many of them, of both races, a critical adjustment in habit and thought.

We have tried for lengthy acquaintance with children of several ages. They have been as young as five and as old as eighteen. In New Orleans they were the little ones, entering first grade, attending second and third grades. They included the four Negro girls, who at age six, first entered two white schools in 1961, and four of their classmates; the six additional Negro children who entered the same and other schools the next year, and seven of their white classmates. In Atlanta they were the ten Negro children who were selected for that city's first year of desegregation, five to enter the twelfth grade and five the eleventh of four high schools, and ten of their white classmates.

All of these children have been followed for two full school years. We have seen the children in Atlanta at least once a week, often twice weekly, depending upon the child and the circumstances at work in his personal and school life. We have visited the children in New Orleans every month, seeing them two or three times in a period of a week's stay. With the teen-agers and their parents we have come to their homes and talked with them; with younger children we have come supplied with toys, crayons, and paints. Though regular home visitors, we have also been to their schools, talked with their teachers separately and in groups. We have known many of them months before schools opened, watched them enter on their first day, and graduate or be promoted on their last. Among white children we have aimed at diverse opinions on segregation. In both cities we have children from families actively in favor of desegregation and very earnestly opposed. In Atlanta one family is connected with the Klan, two others militantly segregationist; in New Orleans four families of like mind.

In brisker fashion we have journeyed to other cities, other Southern regions where desegregation has begun, hoping in a few interviews with children, parents, teachers for comparative information on adjustment and progress. Little Rock in Arkansas, Clinton and Oak Ridge in Tennessee, Burnsville, Asheville, and Charlotte in North Carolina, have offered rural and urban contrasts, and information from a more northerly South than Georgia and Louisiana.

Observations and Discussion

Our chief concerns have been what color means to a child, how these children, Negro and white, see themselves and respond to one another, how they handle the strains of desegregation, the shock of one another's presence, the anxiety and anger on the streets or the fear inside their homes; finally, how their attitudes and feelings change or persist over the months of these eventful and unusual school years. It would be fatuous indeed to ignore the separate nature of existence for the black and white child in the South. We must therefore, tell their fate and our findings separately, starting, in each case, with the young and moving on to the older child.

Negro Children

We may note, initially, that there are no obvious social or economic ways to distinguish these families whose children participated in the first years of desegregation. These children have come from all classes, the very poor to the comfortable, the educated to the barely literate, long time city dwellers and recent arrivals from fast disappearing farms, and a wide variety of motives have pressed upon them or their parents, most especially the desire for better education, and the advancement of their people's struggle for equality. In no case were they cajoled, rewarded, or even asked to apply.[1] In both Atlanta and New Orleans many were eager, but only very few chosen. Selection was based in both cities upon the declared regard of school officials for seeking children able and capable of surviving an obviously special and possibly traumatic experience. In both cities and in others over the South, psychological tests were given, personal interviews held. Four in New Orleans, ten in Atlanta, survived these for first year desegregation. These children represent, therefore, a residue deemed by educators fit and superior to other aspirants.

---

[1]One of the most common beliefs I have met in the South, held not only by segregationsits, but by many people very sympathetic to desegregation, often by many kind teachers, is that the NAACP in some way recruits these children, then rewards them, pays them, bribes them, the verb depending on the attitudes of the particular person. I have yet to see evidence of this with any of our children.

We have seen, and we must emphasize, heavy and hard, that each of these Negro children must learn and has learned how to manage in the white world of the South. From their first years they must be taught, and, slowly begin to realize fully for themselves, what they may do, where they may go, how they must behave. These dusky children of six, their yet smaller brothers and sisters of three or four, are fast learning such facts of social life, and their older kind in Atlanta have already mastered these childhood lessons quite well.

Drawings of these young children reveal their emerging sense of shame and worthlessness, their feelings of weakness before white skin and their envy of it. While all children have their troubles with many of these emotions, early sorrows, frights, rivalries and angers, for the Negro child, in contrast with the white child's experience, they have a real basis in the world outside the home, regardless of the pleasure and happiness within.

For instance, a six year old boy, several months at a heavily boycotted but desegregated New Orleans school, draws his view of himself and one of his few white classmates, and, in another picture, sketches his idea of his place in school. Another child, a girl of seven, having faced daily mobs, draws her school and herself. The boy leaves some white on his right arm and leg, draws himself smaller, more bound and animal-like than his blond classmate, who, in reality, is smaller and much less active and darting. He puts himself in one part of his school, his white schoolmates in another, although, he assures me, in actual fact they are together in classes. ("They say we're not supposed to, but we are.") The girl pictures herself a lonely blackbird, cautiously winging her way toward the school, hesitant, fragile before white mankind as birds generally are before people, a host of her black kin segregated in distant knots of black upon a blue sky. Another of the four girls, one who saw a whole school empty in the face of her admission, draws her school with bright flowers on one of its sides, a stealthy brown squirrel on another. Again, she draws a white girl friend as large, smiling and blooming with cheer, while a colored child ("it's not me," she hastens to tell me with no prodding) appears in a corner of the paper, dour and droopy, lips puckered, legs looking lamed.

In these homes I have seen white dolls kept separated from colored ones, called, in two instances, King and Queen. On the other hand I have seen our same children eventually feel free enough to hit, crush, or shatter these small white worlds of dolls and toys, looking at first fearfully or guiltily at me, later able to talk rather clearly about their deep feelings of resentment and hurt. ("If the white hits the colored, the colored has to hit him back." Or, "The white people call us bad, but they are the real bad and we never get bad enough to be bad like them, so I'm just fooling." He had just been rather merciless with a white boy in a coloring book, crossing him out with giant strokes of his black crayon.)

In her very overworked and overstated affection for whites in paper and in play a five year old girl shows other, contrary attitudes at work. She never quite felt free enough to express them directly, but their symbolic presence could not be concealed. She had always given white people features, had drawn carefully and precisely their blue eyes, had marked their fine noses by thin pink lines, had outlined their slim, curved lips, jarred only rarely by all too excessive teeth which loomed larger than the mouth which presumably contained them, and almost threatened the entire face. Negroes never had eyes, noses, mouths, only large ears. They were anonymous, and would thus not reveal their true feelings, though they were listening all the time. One day she looked furtively at me as she started drawing eyes and a nose for a colored mother and her daughter, then quickly left her crayons for the escape of skipping and dancing. We both knew why. She had always been able to talk about how white children played and felt, telling me stories to go with her drawings, telling me thereby about many of her own normal problems of growing and getting along with her mother, her father, her sister and brothers. What she feared talking about was one problem, how she felt about being a Negro, how she felt about the restrictions and prohibitions which even then she was learning, which even then were being reinforced in their power over her spontaneous urges, in busses, in stores, in movie houses, in lunch counters. At school she could play with white children and study with them, but she knew this condition was special, and precarious at that. She found attendance at a desegregated school much easier, however, than revealing her private, her family's private fears and hates, of those white children, of their parents, of their entire world. Several months later she again drew a Negro woman, again gave her eyes and a nose and lips which were surely, widely Negro. She was able to finish her work, filling in details of sky and ground, and, in reply to my hesitant question, "What does the woman see?" I heard "The dark, 'cause the sun isn't out." She laughed and pushed her paper with its nicely done picture aside; then volunteered "one more." It was an obvious witch, broom and all, under a black sky, over two buildings of red and orange brick, similar to ones she had done before of her house and her school. Halloween had passed by three months. I noted that to her. She replied, "Some witches are always alive, and this one just stayed around." This particular sorceress was brown-skinned. At this point I felt I could mention that to her, and did. She replied, "Oh, yes." I pressed with "Why?", and she eventually explained that some people, she knew it, didn't like Negroes. Here she was showing what others thought, but also what she thought, with ugliness and isolated eccentricity the image held of them by whites, but also by themselves, by herself, too; and with shrill vengeance the Negro's secret fantasy.

Positive feelings toward this white doctor, occur. Apart from an occasional doorstep visit from an insurance salesman or such, these children and their parents have never before acted as friendly host to a white guest in their home. Real trust must, therefore, be distinguished from early, anxious, fearful ingratiation, just as these must be differentiated in older children and adults, race apart, too. In three children, particularly expressive with crayons and paints, lessened distrust and fright seemed to appear with pictures of me, to which they would hastily add brown skin or coloring. First my tan or dappled complexion would be erased with a new picture started, or an apologetic remark indicating an error voiced. After a while I could be left colored, and they learned that it caused me no pain. Two asked me if I minded. No, I didn't, they found out, then tested my words and tried their freedom to make us seem more alike by embarking upon a spate of such drawings for a few months. Eventually they abandoned this game. One of them was able to tell me once that she was soiling me, for which she was very sorry. I remarked to her that she had painted a large shining sun, and that, perhaps I was being sun-tanned. Yes, she murmurred, that, too. Those children who found desegregation a happier experience than expected drew schools progressively less forbidding and impersonal, played games less hectic or guarded. Those whose school experiences had been frought with much tension expressed much of this in our games, trying, oftentimes, to make sense out of the experience by re-enacting it. One girl would imitate the crowds, the unfriendly crowds, then turn on them, disperse them in a model of police efficiency painfully in contrast with what had actually happened on the streets. "I'm better than the police," she told me once.

These angry crowds took on highly individual implications and meanings for each child. Mob reproaches are fitted into the normal problems of growing. A child who feels guilty about her wishes to hurt or eliminate her brothers and sisters can wonder whether the epithets of street walkers are not really designed to punish her for her secret, and sometimes not so hidden, fantasies. At five, six, or seven, they are very much involved in the rights and wrongs of the world, how to tell them apart, how to mediate between their evolving conscience and quick-rising wishes. One six year old boy, whose mother was pregnant, drew his large bellied mother standing near his desegregated school, a fire hose nearby, a few whites standing afar. Asked for his rationale, he explained the story he was drawing, "They're mad (whites) because we are going to their school, and they want the fire hose back, but it's ours, too." Oedipal strivings and the realities of dealing with mob dispersal are fixed neatly together here.

What the parents intuitively knew was that they must acknowledge their children's perceptions of a sullen or hostile world, all the while assuring them that there were other worlds of affection, and, even among whites, support. One mother put it this way, "I tells her that she's right and those folks don't like her nor me either just 'cause we're colored. But I say that me and her daddy went against worse in the older days, and we is going to go right through this, and, we got a lot of the whites who are helping us all the way." For many parents this was a forthright chance to talk openly with their children about their problems as Negroes. By no means is it easy for Negro families to talk with one another about such matters. Shame, self-hatred which can express itself in contempt for one another, these make such open talk hard. A father illustrates this: "Before I tried to fool them maybe a little, because I figured there'd be plenty of time for them to find out what the world is like, and, besides, I figured we'd take each situation as it comes up. Sometimes they'd try to get me to take them into a restaurant or a movie, and I'd invent all kinds of stories and try to take their attention away, divert them you might say; but I kind of knew they were too smart underneath. First they'd keep on asking, or ask questions like 'why not?' and then sometimes I'd lose my temper and tell them to shut up. Then they'd give you that look that makes you feel stupid, or maybe like crying, and I'd hear them later on, telling one another the truth .... 'because we're black' they'd say. They say you can't fool children, and I guess they is right, but can you blame a parent for trying?... Now we can relax, and it's all in the open, and it's easier with the other kids just as with her" (the girl in the desegregated school.)

Balancing outside threats and anxiety were the inside supports of the school as well as the home. While these children were applauded by their own communities, and many people all over the world, they also received help from their teachers and white classmates, few to many in number, depending upon the year and the school involved. Three of them, learning their letters in an abandoned school, had no white classmates the first year and about fifteen the second. One of them studied largely alone at first, though she always had about five, then about ten white students with her at the beginning, and later, in the second year, over one-hundred returned to school with her. Perhaps if we hear two recorded comments, from a Negro and a white mother, we will understand what happened inside these battered schools. A Negro mother told us "Ruby came home the other day and told me that a new white girl came and she came right up to Ruby and told her in the middle of the recess that she wasn't going to play with her, 'cause her mother done told her to stay clear of niggers, but Ruby said they played together right afterwards." A white mother, who kept her children in school under constant threat and intimidation commented: "Once they were in school, it was fine. Why, they practically worshipped that little girl (Negro) After all they'd never had it so good ... so few of them to a teacher, and all that excitement. They loved it. I got scared, all the calls and their faces ... but the kids kept me calmer than I kept them. They weren't afraid...they had a real school spirit... they sang songs like "Frantz School Will Survive"...they became real close together... Yes, it was like a family, and I guess the police were like their fathers, and they even joined in with the singing. I think the teachers became more determined than ever to stick it out and protect the children after they saw what those people were like. I've never heard such foul language..."

We saw evidence of anxiety, nervous loss of appetite, fretful disposition, unusually scrappy behavior with brothers and sisters, rare tearfulness before going to school, and one temporary episode of bed-wetting, but never were these crippling in length or severity, similar to the kinds of complaints which bring children to child guidance clinics. Parental anxiety could trigger a child's, but none of these parents ever seemed near collapse in their ability to cope with daily living. Subjected to curses, warnings of attack and death, job loss, these people drew close together, inside their own families, and within the shared assurance of a group. Very important, often overlooked, is the fact that theirs has been a life time of adaptation to what they know and feel to be unfair treatment. A father put it this way: "It's not new, and it won't be the last time, but now my child is closer to me than ever before, and we both are going to get through this, because at last we've got a reason for our hardship, and, Lord, that makes it easier than ever before." We heard similar sentiments over and over again, in every city visited, from our teen-aged children in Atlanta particularly, able as they were to talk for themselves.

If the young child can draw and play his sense of himself and the white world outside, draw and play his fears and tensions under desegregation, and how they fit into his problems of growing up, the older child will have a style of living, a manner of thinking and feeling and acting which do likewise. In our adolescent children we have heard over the months conscious and unconscious expressions of lessons learned earlier, now organized into patterns of behavior: meekness masking rage, anger expressing shame or anxiety, fearful guilt following expression of frustration or humiliation, and, in general, a thicket of rationalizations, apprehensive controls, and bland denials, covering sadness, bitterness, and, always with "the Man"[2] around, uncertainty and fear.

[2]Negroes often refer to the white world as "the Man" or "The Bossman." A fine coat might be called a "Boss Coat." When I went on vacation I was told several times to have a "Boss Time." Words used by whites and Negroes in the South to describe Negroes are associated with all kinds of social and cultural variables, often hard neatly to categorize. I have heard Negroes and whites use different terms to describe Negroes depending upon where they are and with whom, as well as their feelings behind the words. Poor white people generally use the word "nigger," and I have heard many Negroes do likewise, in serious and humorous self-description or derogation. Many middle-class southerners use the term "nigra," and it often emerges in quiet, honeyed fashion, with no mean intent, but simply a natural derivitive of the southern accent. Many southerners, much conscious of race relations or interested and responsive to northern custom use the word "Negro," sometimes, I feel, a little awkwardly and unnaturally, because it is not a word until recently used by most southerners to describe the Negro. I feel that the word "colored" is more often used by gentle white northerners, but I have heard it used by many Negroes in the South, and more rarely by white southerners. Of course, the "black man" the "dark people" and the "Africans" also have usages which are perhaps too specialized to discuss here.

We must emphasize, again and again, that for many of these conscious feelings of rage or intimidation to be revealed, for many dreams and fantasies to be spoken, much time and development of trust was needed. The parallel with any psychotherapy is obvious, but the contrast between these "healthy" Negroes, these "normal," even "superior" teen-agers and their white classmates in ease and freedom of social expression is startling. White children, can, and often do, say what they feel about Negroes to themselves and, often, to Negroes, say friendly things, say hurtful things. Negroes not only have no such relatively ready confidence or articulation with a white person, a fact which is obvious to many people but still denied by many more, but Negroes often are unable to talk with one another about their lot and problems as Negroes. Self hate, learned from a culture which has bound, ostracised, and proscribed them, becomes a hate for one another. The dreams, associations, comments and written remarks, drawings and paintings, and letters of these children richly illustrate such developments.

Of course, all adolescents have their problems, of quick growth and heightened awareness, of torn feelings, of doubts and dreams charged with new hormonal strength; but, again, the Negro adolescent has a special problem with the all too real social and cultural truth of his past exploitation and still curbed apartness. The whole play of the mind will be seen in these youths, their projections and introjections, their distortions and excuses, a host of justifications and remedial responses to the lessons of inferiority, well learned by them, gathered by them from the white ocean of habits, customs, its culture which surrounds them and controls them from their first years to their last moments. From tapes we can hear their words: "I'm glad I'm not white, all that worrying about losing Atlanta's reputation if a riot comes when we desegregate," or "I don't think there's any real difference between white and colored, except that we're lazier most of the time." Or, "We deserve what we get, and until we work harder, we'll just have to take it." Again, after a year and a half, "I never told you the truth, because I never trusted a white man before... Why should we?... Sometimes we hate all of them, it doesn't make any difference who they are, it's the whole race... You know, sometimes I could just kill every white man in sight, whether I knew them or not, but that's more like what you call a daydream. I'd never really do it, it's just when you get so frustrated and they treat you like an animal, that's when it comes out..." A boy who had been at a white high school for months, and seen a Negro wield a knife in the downtown section of his city remarked to us: "Negroes are uncivilized more than whites... Sometimes they behave like animals... I feel ashamed of them... Yes, I guess it makes me feel ashamed of myself, too." Finally, "The whites are scared of us. They've always been. That's why they have to try so hard to keep us down... Yes, I guess I think their fears are justified, because I think most of us do, way down, hate them... Well, it's like the cart and the horse, I mean whether they're scared of us because of the way we feel toward them, or if we were made to feel that way and then they get scared because of what they did to us." Little psychiatric interpretation is necessary here.

At fifteen, old ideas, old experiences, racially tinged admonitions from parents, racially connected epithets from the outside world, bulk larger and stronger. Negro adolescents in Atlanta met no mobs, but their age and its own burdens, as with the younger children in New Orleans, merged with the stresses of desegregation. Months before nine of them entered four high schools their names and pictures were in the local papers. While police can deter public throngs; threatening, highly abusive phone calls, similar messages by mail, pressures on employers, pressures by employers, these are less easily contained. Night after night calls came, menacing, foreboding ill, and, in the morning, special deliveries of the same kind appeared. Atlanta was determined to have law and order, but during that anxious summer before initial desegregation was under way, no one could really know what bomb and dynamite threats, what murderous innuendo, might materialize even with the most elaborate precautions. Nor was the heritage of these families, several poor and recently from farms, conducive to reassurance and thoughtful serenity.

Among the children and their parents, too, anticipatory anxiety and defenses against it were quite prominent. Especially common were the use of denial and rationalizations, such as "I'm not worried about anything," or, "What's there to worry about?" or, "They'll bother the boys" from a girl and "at least we can protect ourselves" from a boy. Frequent projective maneuvers were seen, like "I'll bet they're plenty scared (the whites) of what'll happen," and, "It's nothing for us to worry about; it's their problem, not ours." Loss of appetite, migraine headaches, insomnia were seen. One boy read a law book, versing himself on "assault and battery" sections particularly, but he "just happened to be" doing this, then. Another boned up on kerate, keeping his once slack muscles newly poised. Many, wishing for a foreseeable end to increasing tension, trapped themselves into forecasts of early ease once the first few days of school were over.

Such, sadly, was not to be the case. Long moments of history may disappear, bur not necessarily at the speed hoped by an anxious child. During the school year the trials of hard work, frequent loneliness and isolation, and occasional insult had to be met, and each child had his or her own way of dealing with these pressures. One of the original ten selected, a very bright girl of seventeen, dropped out just before school opened, she and her family unable and unwilling to bear the daily, rising tension ("We're too far out from the police, and it's too exposed here. They could shoot to kill or dynamite us, and I'm not going to take the chance," the girl admitted, guilty about her decision, but more afraid of what would happen were it not made.) Another slightly younger girl, also quite intelligent, asked to return to her old Negro high school a short while after her first report card showed two A's and three B's, the highest grades of all the Negro students, obtained in a tough academic program. A well spoken, attractive girl, from a middle-class family, of the three Negroes, probably the favorite of teachers and students alike, her withdrawal for what she called "an emotional upset" confused her city a great deal. Front page publicity, local and national, with editorials and heavy television coverage, remarks of concern by the Governor of Georgia, conflicting explanations of the cause, such attention gives some hint of the interest, hopes, the fears, and guilts attached by so many to desegregation in the South.

Having known her for six months, I had seen her respond to apprehension with heavy reliance upon detailed, increasingly burdensome rituals. She was getting little sleep, eating sporadically and excessively of sweets, and not simply studying but exhausting herself in tangled, midnight minutiae, in unrealistic and obviously hurtful anticipation of all of the next day's possible recitals. While these classrooms were, in fact, for these children, an awkward, silent, closely watched and often fearful stage, this girl could not handle her role as easily as the eight others who stayed and survived. The reasons seemed more connected with her fragile personal and familial history, frought with divorce and parental strife, than desegregation alone. A crisis had sharpened old angers and sorrows, had upset a precariously balanced relationship with her father and sister, and had found her abilities, even assisted by a relatively friendly school body, newly weakened by rigid and frail defenses.

Depressions, headaches, stomach aches, all these were seen with some frequency. Three of the five girls developed definite increase in premenstrual pain, and, thereby temporary absence from school. All three boys seemed prone to headaches and dreams of thinly disguised rage: "I dreamt I was in Little Rock,[3] and they (whites) were coming after [3]Events like Little Rock stick fast to these children. They were eleven or twelve at the time, awakening to themselves and their world. All refer to memories of Little Rock on television and identification with the Negro students there. No less than four have used that even in their dreams, to symbolize such feelings as isolation, determined resistance, anger, etc.

me... I started to run, then I found I had a gun, and I turned and it turned out to be a machine gun, so I fired away; I opened up right at them, and I think they stopped... I had another dream later that night. I dreamed I got arrested for driving too fast, and my father said I'd better go to jail because he didn't have the money to pay the fine, and then I woke up ... what a night, it was as bad as school!" This dream-pair of anger, of crime and punishment, was followed weeks later, in the same boy, with "I was running real fast, but then I looked around and no one seemed to be chasing me, so I relaxed. Then I saw a girl walking down the street. She was a white girl, so I looked the other way. You know. Then, a funny thing happened. She told me it was O. K. to look, 'cause I was white, too, and she smiled at me. I think we talked for a while or something, but suddenly she turned Negro and ran from me, and I felt bad, like I'd done something wrong. Then I woke up. I couldn't get the dream out of my mind, it was one of those that stick with you real clear all day... Mostly the feeling of doing something wrong ... I think I woke up before I could get caught or something, maybe the police were around the corner." Sexual identity, racial identity, fears, hopes, guilts, all raw and sharply summoned.

Though harassed, these children were also honored, and, just as the New Orleans parents averred, so did they, that here was a chance for purposeful stress in contrast to the arbitrary stresses of the daily rejections and exclusions encountered by the Negro in his living and working. Indeed, eight out of ten selected in Atlanta successfully finished these last one or two years of their high school education, though not without signs of tiring and of strain. As wearying as their psychological problems were their academic ones. They come from overcrowded, poorly equipped schools, from years of education in a separate school system which reflects inevitably the position of the Negro, the restricted hopes, the frequent poverty and the precarious affluence, (16) the continual fears, the lessened pace, the boredom, apathy, and that, too, the reactive rage and its impulsive, expressive violence. One says what many have said, "More kids dropped out because they had to go to work, and they didn't think they'd do much better even if they stayed and graduated. Even if they graduated from college, they might end up not any better than if they left in the 9th grade... Man, it's a white man's world all the way. You sure can see it when you get to an integrated school. These white kids have hope, I don't know how I know it, but they do, you can just feel it... I almost feel as if I've been let out of jail and let into America, like walking into one of those TV programs, you know, where people seem free and kind of happy...it's like feeling you're participating, not just always watching and peeking around."

They studied hard, curtailed social activities, graduated. Those who followed them the next year, over forty in number, less carefully picked, struggled even harder with some of these problems of academic adjustment required at so late a time as the last years of high school.

One of the most common difficulties encountered by these colored students was their own ambivalence, their pride of person and new self-respect as Negroes, their identification with changes in Africa, in Asia, in their own country; but also, along side such feelings, the results of their ancient exile from American culture, a sense of their own lowly, tainted nature, an aloof, hesitant, distrust of whites, a self-hatred appearing as suspicion of them even when they are kindly and affectionate: "I don't know what to do when they get nice. It's easier when they ignore you, at least then you're used to it, and we know what to do...when they get friendly, I feel as if they've got some angle to it, or trying to pull something... I guess I don't really believe we've got some equality now...I finally got up enough courage, and walked over and sat with them... Oh, I knew they were friendly, and they wanted me to come over...but you know how it is... But it all went good. I think they were as nervous as I was, but now when I sit with them, no one thinks anything of it." A less successful outcome, in a school less hospitable to its two Negro children, shows one way of dealing with daily rebuke and insult: "I don't care what they say, or what they think of me,..

I'm going to graduate from that school if it's the last thing I do. They can all leave if they want... Man, that's my school as much as theirs, and they don't scare me, and if I scare them, they can go... go and give me the whole school to myself.."

White Children

Since the white children mostly do not leave these schools, or, when they do, usually return after the crisis of violence or mob action subsides, they, too, have reactions to desegregation, a new and often surprising reality to them.

Born and reared in a region which has, however recently, (2) as successors to slavery, developed an elaborate array of social customs, strongly bulwarked by law, which regulate from birth to death doings, if not feelings, between the races, these children are now asked to participate in the beginning of the end of these ways. For the young white child, this ordinarily requires little effort. His age and its momentum appear to overcome even parental injunctions. I have watched them play, children from segregationist homes, urged by their mothers to keep good distance from the one or two colored children among them, yet forgetful of these ideas and pleas in the abandon of play. Teachers say as this one did: "They forget what they're told at home when they start playing. You can't expect children of this age to worry about skin color when they want to play a game or jump rope... I suppose if their parents scare them to death about it (skin color) they'll remember, but it'll take work to prevent children from being friendly one minute and nasty the next regardless of what color they are."

Two such children and their parents showed us how dark skin can, in fact, become an object of anxious avoidance, a focus for emotions communicated from parents to child by daily example, by daily intimacy of phrase and example. Their parents were not simply voting segregationists, but preoccupied segregationists, fervently involved believers in distance between the races, in Negro inferiority and harmfulness. Their mothers' associations, culled from many interviews, indicate that for them, the Negro is dirty, diseased, promiscuous, a source of contamination, and that all these thoughts, held by many others in a casual or quiet fashion, are of strong, constant concern to them. Joining together the words of one mother from several tapes, we must emphasize the urgency and passion of her delivery: "They're dragging us down, and you know why? Because they're made lower and they're born with less intelligence than we have. Just look at them...[4] they're more animal than spiritual, and the Bible tells us not to mix the two if we can help it...They have their place, and it's not anywhere near us...they're dirty, they're drunks, and they slash one another with razor blades and flood Chairty Hospital with their V. D. and illegitimate children... I don't think they know what family life is, and now they want us to catch it from them, get all our children sick, and start them off with little nigger kids in school. I sent him back there (Frantz School) because I figure there's only one or two, and we can get by if he stays away from them, but what about our grandchildren, when they flood us in twenty years?...I get sick near them, because they smell and I almost want to vomit..."

[4]There is no absence of curiosity in people like her, albeit from a distance.

She had felt sick in the past, with nausea, cold sweats, loss of appetite, in a northern restaurant, seeing them nearby. She and her husband and two children had hastily left. She avoided them, particularly any chance of touching them or being touched, and she had taught this to her young girl and boy. In turn, her son, aged six, could draw a desegregated school under dark clouds, brown colored with black smoke emerging from its chimney. In one of its corners, encircled by a black line, the thinnest skeletal outlines of a Negro child could be seen. He drew another picture of his school, the same school, but of orange brick under a blue sky and full sun, scarcely any brown there but the land (dirt) under the flowers and grass. The two separate drawings had come about through the following conversation: (Dr.) "Would you want to draw a picture of your school now?" Nodding, "Should I draw the whole school?" Hesitating a moment, (Dr.) "As much as you want to." He sketched one, then another picture, telling me it was a big school, "except it still isn't filled up again." (The boycott by whites had collapsed, and he, like other white children, had not been allowed to attend.) He was a sturdy and tidy boy, well mannered, rather close to his mother, bright and a good talker, a good artist, too. He wanted to be a doctor, had so for about a year. Doctors, he told me once, had to be clean, and had to scrub their hands very hard before they cut into people. We had embarked on that line of thought after a small discussion of the little Negro girl in his school. "I don't go near her, because I don't like her looks and she's a bad girl... My best friend is Jimmie and he said he wouldn't play with her either because she'd ruin the game, but I don't like her around anyways." He did indeed stay away from her, and sought friends who did likewise, or simply were doing likewise not in any exclusiveness, but in the natural order of play. His mother, affectionate toward him and truly confident of his loyalty, felt that his assurances to her that he remained clear from the Negro child were unnecessary. "Sometimes he tells me he hasn't gone near her when he comes home, but I know he hasn't regardless." He hasn't, but he is not without a silent interest, a certain preoccupation. He will draw the colored child, then cross her out, he will wipe her out in play and shoot her, but not fail to mention her, bring her into his assertive, frolicsome games.

Other children seem less anxious to draw the Negro into our talk and play. Their parents may have welcomed desegregation, and there is no issue for them, though several of them are very much aware at five or six what it means in our country to be a Negro. One girl at school and in class with a little Negro girl informed me that "most white people don't like them, but I don't mind them." Their parents may not have welcomed desegregation at all, but may place little emotional store in its slow onset. A mother told me she did not want her children at desegregated schools, but she wanted them attending school, and there seemed little alternative but certain private schools, which, she felt, were not the best choice, educationally, for her children. "If I had a lot of money, I'd send them to real good private schools; this way, I figure it's best to keep them in school even with the two nigras... I tell them (her two children involved) to keep away from them and never to play with the,...Well, maybe they do, in the yard sometime, but I don't think that'll cause any trouble. I'm not against young children playing, I mean nigras and whites. I'm against giving them equality in schools and restaurants and things like that, because I don't think they're equal, to be truthful. I just don't believe any fair minded person can look at them and the way they live and believe they are. I just don't." Attitudes like this, long held and deeply, honestly believed, are less likely to kindle a young child's resolute fear and horror. This woman states her opposition, but her capacity to weigh other values and concerns in determining her position. Unlike several of our parents, she will not march out on any street in agitated demonstration. Her children, therefore, duly understand her views, and adopt them as their own, but her daughter occasionally will acknowledge a rope game with the little Negro girl in her class, and one day, settled the entire problem for herself by telling me she'd let one Negro girl into her doll house, but no others, "I mean all the others will have to be maids, but she (the one) can have a cup of tea with us." (She loved serving tea in her doll house, and was a most gracious hostess.)

With adolescence, old ideas, stored but forgotten in games, emerge newly influential. In Atlanta, the problem of white boys and girls, now fast growing, struggling with problems of identify, of belief and career, were aptly summarized for me by a high school senior who found a Negro in several of his classes, and felt torn by old traditions and perceptions and new realities: "It's a shock to us, I'll have to say that. I mean, I'm not against Lawrence. I've grown to respect him; but it's like this...they were slaves here and we had them in bondage. We fought a war over the thing and got beat, but even so, we've all grown up with them living one way, and us another...they've worked in our kitchens and taken care of us, and suddenly you wake up and find them in your schools sitting across from you... It's not the way we've ever lived with them before, and you can't expect us not to find it hard for a while."

Attitudes varied from immediate sympathy through indifference to marked hostility. One form of hostility was the direction of overworked attention and conversation to the Negroes with a paternal attitude which they could scarcely not notice and frequently describe: "I'd rather have them swear at us than all that fake sympathy she gives out. She thinks she's big-time roylaty, doing us a favor with her friendship. She tells us how much she likes us, but how does she know if she does, when she doesn't know us at all?" Others, less impelled by unconsciously wrought reaction-formations, developed slow sympathy with these children, often identifying with them in their loneliness or suffering. One adolescent boy of fifteen, in so many ways reminiscent of Anna Freud's (15) description of the teen-aged youth in all his ambivalent turmoil, remarked feelingly, "I know what it is to be alone... they must be boiling underneath, but I guess they know how to keep up a good front. I think I was against desegregation, and I still am in a way, but I really feel for those two kids, and I've got to admit I like both of them in spite of what I thought I'd feel...you know, you've got to hand it to them... sometimes I see them just sitting at the table, and I say to myself, we're rotten animals, us human beings are just mean all over. Then I want to go up and sit and talk with them, but I don't dare...you know why, I'll have to be honest, it would just make it too hard for me. I'd have to take more than they do, I think."

Slowly, as the months go along, many of these white students, less and less afraid of social ostracism, have made overtures to their Negro schoolmates, words, a smile, a question, a nod. Desegregation has then moved from its legal and physical reality to its emotional onset.

Others feel and continue to feel differently: "They're no damn good, and never will be...just look at Africa...All they do is sit and drink...They live like animals and they sure look like them, too. Have you ever smelled them, real close? They make me sick just to go near them!" Strong are the words and feelings these young men and women have and much the notice they are willing to give the Negro: "Most kids ignore us, and a few are really nice, but there are three or four who won't leave us alone. They just stare all day long... I think they've got a kind of 'thing' about us, and it won't let them alone, so how can they let us alone?"

Three of these young people, two boys and a girl, have never felt unwilling or unable to describe their anger and scorn for the two Negroes at school with them. Listening to their words, and feelings underneath those words, one finds, however, sensitivity and guilt as well as rage, revealing them, unconsciously, troubled and conscience stricken by the very harm they would so freely cause. One would describe with apparent pleasure the isolation and fear experienced by a Negro girl in his class, then wish, always after telling of her painful moments, that she go to Africa, surely an escape as well as an exile. Another talked quietly about his segregationist views, becoming loudly, angrily, critical when he described a bullying word or deed toward a Negro in which he shared. He always had to fend off his own sense of right and wrong in these specific situations by such excesses of rationalized pique. One rather bright and athletic boy, with no significant medical or psychiatric history, revealed the clashes and contradictions of sympathy, fear, and hate within himself: "I don't hate Martha. Fact is, I feel sorry for her, and for the other one, too. She's pathetic, the way she just sits there all alone, smiling at you if you look at her, and working away all the time, trying to prove something, I guess. It's the NAACP and the professional nigger lovers I'm against, because they're taking advantage of Martha just like the rest of us to cause trouble between the races... We've had a lot more use for the nigger here than up North... I've gone up there and I know how they live there... Here, we've got respect for one another, and most niggers will tell you they don't want to be with us any more than we want to be with them...This is an insult to them as much as to us, and I think Martha is a dupe, and even if I feel sorry for her, I can't forgive her for letting herself be used."

Our Negro and white children, regardless of their differing views and hopes, all agreed on the interesting point that most white children, despite their declared opinions, in practice were indifferent to the Negroes who entered their schools. Over and over from the Negroes we heard, "They couldn't care less." Time and again we heard from white children, "I've got more on my mind than a couple of niggers... my work and basketball are what I think of all day...who cares? I mean, they're here, and we didn't want it, but what difference does it make, now? I don't think any in your everyday life."

Changes in feelings are reported and observable, too. Several of our high school juniors and seniors have noted changes in sentiments from mild antipathy or disinterest to respect or even affection, often to their own surprise. The unpredictable nature of human behavior, the accumulative effects of conscious and unconscious guilt and atonement, of changed perceptions and newly developing social customs, are all perhaps summarized in the experience of a Negro girl who went through a year of silence and sometimes much worse, only to be herself surprised in her last day of school at the requests of eighteen white classmates to autograph her yearbook. Their messages, from "best wishes" to "I am sorry for my silence, but you will understand why," from "I know you have had an unpleasant time, but we have all had a difficult year, and we have come through it successfully" to "you have proven yourself a fine person, and I have been sorry we could not know you better," speak for themselves, self-evident examples of changing emotions, slowly incubating amid the complicated silence of an unusual school year.

Parents and Teachers

We may only briefly here refer to the parents and teachers of these children. It is a commonplace that these children are much affected by the attitudes of both. We have been particularly interested to note, in city after city of the South, that teachers may have felt tension between their roles as teachers and their private feelings. In the two battered schools of New Orleans, in Central High School in Little Rock, in the unharassed but tensely protected (some police scruntiny all year long) high schools of Atlanta, we have heard teachers reflect what their society obviously faces, the anxieties and mixed feelings of social and cultural change. One teacher put it very well, speaking to me in a group of several teachers meeting to discuss their observations of how desegregation was proceeding: "We felt betwixt and between our traditions as southerners and the Law. I wouldn't disobey my school board, because I know I have responsibilities as a teacher, but I had my private opinions about this, of course. You know, we were as nervous as the students were... you could hear a pin drop... I think I've learned as much this year as my students, and maybe a little more... You can't change a whole way of living without a little trouble here and there, but I'm right proud of our children here in Atlanta."

Parents, of course, will vary, and teach their young children what they themselves feel, from kindness to fear. Many children in Atlanta obviously reflect their parents' views. Many don't, however. A white boy, son of a militant segregationist father, found friendliness toward Negroes, spoken and acted, a means of teen-aged rebellion. Several young students differentiated most precisely their views from those of their parents. "We're from another generation," a refrain as old as man himself, was not absent among these youths. Nor do Negro students heed their parents so resolutely. Often their parents, all too aware of past hurts, all to fearful and suspicious, had opposed letting their children transfer to white schools. Family splits, mother approving, father dissenting, or vice-versa, were not rare, with younger and older children alike. Once under the crisis of actual participation, however, these splits seemed to be welded together in the common familial need for mutual support against an outside world potentially harmful.

The Psychiatrist's Roles and Reactions

We can only mention in passing at this time some of the problems encountered by a psychiatrist working in the midst of active social and political crisis, though this subject deserves to be pursued further. For a white psychiatrist to go to Negro homes in the deep South, regularly and over a two-year period of time, was, in itself, as unusual as desegregation. We met apprehension and fright; their expression in suspicion, in ingratiation or withdrawal, in awe or in ire, and slowly, in testing and teasing. We found that the more freely these people felt they could talk with us, the more honestly they could express their feelings, their fears, angers, sorrows, and the more frankly they could acknowledge their initial, conscious deceptions. In several instances, as in individual psychotherapy, long standing grievances were slowly mentioned, and attitudes of docility, followed by those of resentment and deeply felt hostility appeared and yielded slowly to a sustained relationship coupled with discussion of these very feelings, for these Negroes the first time they had such an opportunity with a white person. Well over a year after we had started our visits, we began to hear in many homes remarks like "now we're telling youwhat we really think," or "we just didn't know at first what to say, and to be honest, we just don't trust any white people to be really truthful to them..." Increasing involvement between these children and their parents and me allowed them to forego many of their stylized maneuvers of dealing with what they most often feel to be the alien white lord. They felt free to share their phrases, their humor, their bitterness and sadness at their fate, and they felt able to talk about how they mask these feelings, summoning constant energy in conscious guile, bluff, and falsehood: "Tell them what they want to hear," or "Smile and hope they die on the spot." Such searing wrath demands constant vivilance lest it escape in open violence, sometimes against whites, though this is made hard by the very nature of the society which legally, socially, politically, enconomically subordinates them, more often against themselves, in quick fury, in long self-hatred and despair.

As with any group of people, different types of relationships developed, depending upon the child and his or her family, and the investigator. This was a study to determine attitudes, reactions, adjustment in a crisis for presumably "normal" people, but the therapeutic quality in the work soon appeared. For Negroes under stress to talk with a white psychiatrist about their feelings, their trials and hopes and tensions, over a long enough period of time for a firm relationship to develop is obviously of some value for them as well as for the psychiatrist. Briefer contacts in several southern cities helped us obtain information and make observations less intimately related to the child's life history, but more pertinent to his every day experiences and adaptations. An effort was made to achieve both, general information about daily psychological phenomena, and the deeper, longer investigation of the individual personality and life history.

With white families, particularly segregationists, we had a different order of problems, not racial, but idiosyncratic, our initial reception varying from the friendly to the suspicious and guarded. We had expected difficulty talking with segregationist, but soon learned that those strongly moved and agitated by this issue wanted very much to talk about it, indeed, need to do just that. Changes among white children both did and did not occur, and do and do not occur in those children untouched by studies like this. Several of our children attribute new feelings to talks with us: "I think just thinking about all these things when you come makes you see more of what's going on... I've wondered how I'd feel about them if I hadn't talked to you this year." We have met children in small rural towns, in larger cities, who have come to new ideas and responses to the Negro children beside them by themselves, through their own experiences and thinking, through discussions with friends and relatives, out of their own life history with its development of conscience, awareness, available intelligence, vitality and quiet of mind.

The psychiatrist, as always, must learn from his own anxieties, his own affection, angers, and depressions, as they arise in his work with other people. In a study such as this, these feelings are sure to be met, telling us, all along, about the range and intensity of the emotional forces hugging racial attitudes hard; showing us, surely, how such forces derive much of their powerful and persuasive momentum from sources deep within the individual's emotional life.

Conclusions

From our work, we would venture the following impressions:

1. Negro children, young and old, in most cases, endure the stresses of initial desegregation in Southern cities without evidence of significant psychiatric illness. In order to understand why this occurs, the general problems of adjustment required of the Negro in his daily life, from birth to death, must be considered. Many of the strains met by these children and their families are similar to those often encountered elsewhere. In order to cope with such conditions, these children must learn, must be also taught, a variety of psychological maneuvers, and these will serve in desegregated schools as well as on busses, outside theatres, and restaurants. These defenses described in this paper agains anxiety, fear, retaliatory anger, shame, and guilt, develop slowly, require constant emotional energy, the continual vigilance of a precarious position in our society. For these children, therefore, desegregation is an opportunity, a kind of trouble which, in contrast, to other experiences, makes sense and offers hope of a better life with less hurt in the future. So long as their home life is reasonably satisfactory, so long as they do not have serious personality disorders stemming from their personal psychological development, they seem able to withstand mobs, and the variety of pressures arising from their entry into white schools. We have tried to document some of these pressures and responses to these pressures, and we have seen that the trials of desegregation fit into the other problems of the growing child, reflecting them, increasing them, or serving their expression.

2. For the white child, desegregation will have a variety of meanings, depending on his family, his age, and his own nature, needs, and wishes. Compassion, lack of interest, annoyance, strong aversion, all these reactions have been seen, and their roots traced in individual children and their parents. We can clinically distinguish between those families where segregation is a consumming, highly charged interest, a passionate expression of other problems, and those where it is less integrated in earlier, more basic emotional troubles; thus more changeable as a social habit or custom, strongly and long held, but slowly dispensable when opposed by other wishes or customs. Even among the poorest and most insecure, of our families, socially and economically, these differences obtain.

3. Some of the meanings of color, of black and white, to children have been explored. Deeply present in our culture, they indicate the developing sources of later attitudes and behavior in both whites and Negroes. We have attempted to convey the feelings of these children toward one another, helped by their actual words, their dreams and drawings, their play. We have also tried to indicate some of the ways their parents and teachers choose to behave, how they, too, get along in these tense situations. Finally, we have indicated some of the hurdles along the path of such study of active social and political crises by a psychiatrist.

4. We have seen changes in these southern children, in Negroes toward less doubt and more trust, in whites toward less hostility and more freedom to see another person as a person, regardless of skin color. We have also seen hardening of suspicion, congealing of hatreds. Since we are dealing with a problem in human development, in stress and response to stress, in early anxieties, rivalries and strains within the family becoming reflected and expressed in later social and economic realities, there is every reason for both hope and despair. Genes do not present an ineradicable barrier, grounded in biochemistry, against easing conflicts or or harsh legal and social inequalities among individuals and groups; but the fatal and reciprocally stimulating engagement of private disorders, personal anxieties, fears, and frustrated hopes, with publicly sanctioned expressions for them, solidified in history, allowed by law, encouraged by communities for their various reasons, is not easily broken. These children have shown us both possibilities, of growth and of continuing affliction.

CHAPTER 1: INTRODUCTION

The American Negroes commit more than their share of crimes.

However, this does not eliminate the need for further study of the relationship between Negroes and crime. At least, two fundamental questions remain:

To what degree do Negroes surpass whites in the perpetration of crimes?

Why do the Negroes commit more than their share of crime?

As we shall see, criminal statistics are insufficient to give a precise comparison of the races. The data are not complete in coverage of all crimes. They do not afford the basis of a valid sample of all factors involved in the relationship between race and crime. Criminal statistics can reflect general trends, but their efficiency deteriorates when the study of a sub-group (such as Negroes) requires more exact control of factors extraneous to the specific relationship under scrutiny.

This does not mean that use of statistics is merely an evasion of research responsibility and a rationalization. The difficulties of the statistician are inherent in the problems of seeking objective answers in the highly subjective area of human behavior. Actually, the statistics are a valuable tool in revealing the superficiality of demands for snap answers to complex, multi-factor problems. They offer a means of moving nearer the truth.

Chapter 2 offers a description of crime among Negroes on the basis of the best statistical sources available. Chapter 3 reviews and briefly assesses the major explanations offered for the patterns revealed by the description.

CRIME AND SOCIAL CONTROL

Let us pause to consider the place of criminal law within the broad structure of social control. The significance of Negro crime rates is that they reflect the deviation of individual Negroes from these standards. The rates also reflect the decisions of authorities as to the propriety of this behavior in relation to standards furnished by laws.

To answer our two fundamental questions, we must realize the reason for the standards which are the basis for labeling certain kinds of behavior as crime

~~CHAPTER I: INTRODUCTION~~

~~The American Negro commits more than his share of crimes.~~

~~To let the matter rest with this bald statement would deny the complexity and significance of the causes behind this high crime rate. The difficulty and fascination of criminology stem from its vast scope. Anything affecting human behavior is pertinent to the study of crime and the criminal. The Negro and his place in American society are major research areas in themselves. Therefore, these few pages will survey only the general aspects of the relationship between the Negro and crime.~~

~~To understand this relationship, we should consider the social meaning of crime.~~ Strange as it may seem, crime exists because man has a conscience. We differ from other creatures in that we have a sense of right and wrong. Every human society has norms which are "measuring sticks" against which its members are expected to judge objects and behavior as desirable or unfit, admirable or despicable, moral or immoral, legitimate or illegitimate.[1] Our consciences use these "measuring sticks" to make us proud or ashamed of our behavior.

Words like "murder," "rape", and "theft" reflect violations of norms in our culture. Most of us are trained in childhood to consider such violations to be too heinous to be attempted by the "decent" people we conceive ourselves to be. We become our own policemen. If we are tempted to risk the lash of our own conscience, the fear of losing the respect of neighbors and friends serves as an effective policeman.

What if a person does not act as his own policeman? Then formal controls must backstop the conscience. Some authority outside the person steps in to enforce rules which often have been written down. The employer fires the disobedient worker. The principal expels the rowdy pupil. More to our purpose, the policeman arrests, ~~the judge and~~ the judge sentences, jury convicts, and the prison guard clangs the gates behind the culprit.

Do the formal controls of law enforcement, courts and prisons bear on all types of misbehavior? No, the society, through its legislative bodies, enacts laws which apply to those forms of misbehavior most injurious to the orderly functioning of human groups. The selection of subjects for laws depends on the nature of the society. Embezzlement, theft, fraud, and counterfeiting are dangerous threats to the concepts of private property and credit so vital to our capitalism. Rape, incest, and other sexual offenses imperil the foundations of our family life.

Do all societies use these formal controls to the same extent? No. Our urban-industrial society has such large population clusters and such intricate social arrangements that we can not depend on the ridicule and gossip of kinsmen and neighbors to keep all of us in line. Because of the sheer number of people about him, the urbanite knows few of those he encounters. He can escape censure by allowing himself to be swallowed up in the crowd. Often the apartment-dweller knows next to nothing about the fellow next door. He minds his "own business." This permits him to escape largely the subtle controls experienced by the rural and village person. This means that urban life must depend more on the policeman for social control of the deviant person. Urban-industrial life has made it necessary to regulate such matters as public sanitation, traffic, factory safety, and commercialized vice. Such problems have expanded the scope of legalized control of behavior because the persausion of tradition and individual conscience is not sufficient to maintain the group discipline essential to the social order.

~~This raises the interesting point that our increasing crime rate may reflect the greater complexity of our way of life. Probably, the average citizen is no more dishonest or immoral inherently than his grandfather in spite of the dismal comparisons suggested by crime rates.~~

Crime is a cultural phenomenon. ~~This means that~~ It is defined by the given society as behavior which threatens the fundamental norms serving as the basis for social cooperation. These norms are communicated down through the generations to serve as the raw materials for the development of conscience in the course of personality development. When voluntary compliance with these internalized norms is not enough to assure social discipline, we turn to written laws as enforced by the policeman, judge, and prison warden.

SIGNIFICANCE OF NORMS TO CRIMES AMONG NEGROES

As the basis for the application of formal control, criminal law is a creation and part of culture. It differs from the other aspects of our normative order in that its punishment of violators is in the hands of an organized and recognized body of official administrators with a more or less consistent system of procedures. This has important implications for our subject. Is there something about the position of the Negro in his social environment and in the larger community which creates excessive criminality? Are the norms applied to Negroes by these administrators in some special manner? Is there an inherent biological quality which makes the Negro less likely to conform to legal norms?

Another point: Because it is defined by law, crime can vary from place to place and from time to time to the extent that such variations in the law occur. Comparison of jurisdictions reveals wide variations in the definition of crimes and their penalties within American society.[2] Any explanation for crime must account for this variation. The failure to meet this challenge is a major defect of the simple biological explanation.

CHAPTER 2: PATTERNS OF CRIME AMONG NEGROES

Although the American Negro commits more than his share of crime, we cannot be certain how much more. Later [redacted] this chapter [redacted] will mention ~~shall~~ comment briefly ~~on~~ the difficulties of obtaining reliable and valid statistics. When the circumstances behind the higher crime rate are considered, some readers will wonder that the difference between the races is not even greater. The next chapter will review these circumstances. Crime rates reflect arrest policies which select out only a fraction of all offenders who are candidates for arrest. Therefore, differences in crime rates are not a perfect image of relative criminality. But the fact remains that Negroes do commit more crimes than their relative proportion of the total population would cause one to expect.

EVIDENCE OFFERED BY ARREST STATISTICS

Arrest statistics gathered by the Federal Bureau of Investigation are our best source of data. Because the information is gathered from local police departments on a voluntary basis, this data must be viewed as the best approximation, rather than a perfectly reliable and valid [redacted] description of American crime. Areas failing to report information to the FBI are found to the greatest extent in the South and in rural areas. Therefore, the description is strongly influenced by the patterns of urban crime in the North and West. The affects of recent heavy Negro migrations to the North and West are emphasized. Similarly, the affects of rural life in inhibiting criminal behavior favor the whites more than the Negroes because the rural Negro is largely a phenomonon of the South.

The arrests of Negroes are greater than their share of the total population would indicate, but this difference is greater for urban areas than for rural areas.

Of the city arrests reported to the FBI in 1960, the racial distribution was 66.3% white, 30.4% Negro, 2.1% American Indian, 0.2% Chinese and Japanese, and 1.0% all other races. Similar percentages for rural arrests were white 83.4%, Negro 13.6%, American Indian 2.1%, and all other races 0.9%. The 1960 Census reports the total [redacted] urban population was 88.2% white and 11.0% Negro. The total rural population was 89.5% white and 9.4% Negro.

(b) Base of rate is computed by estimating racial distribution of reporting areas' total population from 1960 Census reports for total U.S. population.

Table A offers more specific comparisons. In the cities, there were 2,988 arrests for every 100,000 urban whites and 10,786 arrests for every 100,000 urban Negroes. In rural areas, there were 1,120 arrests for every 100,000 rural whites and 1,786 arrests for every 100,000 rural Negroes. The urban Negro rate is 3.7 times greater than that of urban whites. The rural Negro rate is only 1.6 times greater than that of rural whites.

The Negro arrest rate is increasing more rapidly than that of the whites. Negroes represented 23.5% of all reported urban arrests in 1941, 29.8% in 1958, and 30.4% in 1960. Some of this gain represents improved reporting. Migration is removing Negroes from police jurisdictions with inferior statistical reporting to jurisdictions likely to have better reporting procedures.

Because urban crime reports are more complete, Table B limits analysis of specific crimes to urban areas. Two statistical tools are employed. For each race, the percentage distribution by type of crime tells how the races compare in relative chances of arrest for certain kinds of misbehavior. Another tool is used to cancel out the confusion resulting from the differences between the races in the size of total population who could have committed a crime to become eligible for inclusion in the criminal population of that race. Because there are more whites, there are more white criminals without indicating a higher degree of white criminality. The crime rate relates the number of arrests of a racial group to the total population of that group.

Offenses symptomatic of personal disorganization compose the bulk of crimes for both races. These are law violations which stem from the individual's failure to organize his life effectively within the scheme of social norms basic to a moral order. In seeking our own purposes, each of us must fit our behavior to our society's code of right and wrong if we are to have a place in that society. These crimes are symptomatic of the offender's failure to organize his life within the cultural restrictions which forbid vices and require responsibility in work and family roles. The dominance of these offenses for both races demonstrates the dependence of urban society on formal law to control personal pathology.

(a) Uniform Crime Reports for United States, 1960, op. cit., Table 20. These crime categories were omitted: All Other Offenses and Suspicion.

Arrests for drunkenness, vagrancy, and for sex crimes other than rape compose a greater share of white arrests than of Negro arrests. Several explanations are possible. The lower average socio-economic status of the Negro encourages police to consider such misbehavior as typical of the Negro. This relative status makes it a simpler matter to arrest the Negro on a more serious charge when temporary holding of a suspect is deemed necessary. Drunkenness and vagrancy are charges most likely to be applied against members of the lowest classes. Therefore, the white arrest rates probably reflect the actual incidence of such crimes more completely than do the white rates for other less serious crimes.

Arrests for disorderly conduct and gambling are more characteristic of the Negro offenders. Disorderly conduct is a catchall term covering a variety of modes of breaching the peace for a variety of motives ranging from rebellion against one's lot in life to ignorance of the ways of an unfamiliar urban culture. Frequently, this charge is used for action against female sexual offenses. Gambling is an important Negro recreation, especially for young adults in an urban slum.

Although only 11% of all urban arrests were of females, 73% of arrests for prostitutions and commercialized vice were of women. The use of sex for illicit gainful purposes is more typical of females, especially those with inferior economic opportunities otherwise.

Although the arrest rate is low, Negroes have a higher rate for unlawful possession, sale, or use of narcotic drugs. These crimes are largely concentrated in the major cities. Drug addicts tend to come from deteriorated areas where narcotic usage is more prevalent.

Nonsupport, neglect, desertion, or abuse of family and children represent almost the same proportion of arrests for both races.

Negroes are more likely to commit crimes against persons than is the white. Of the total arrests of Negroes, 9.8% were for murder, manslaughter, assault, and forcible rape. Of the total arrests of whites, 4.7% were for these crimes. The combined rates of Negro arrests surpasses that of the whites more than seven-fold.

Murder and nonnegligent manslaughter make up only a small proportion of total crimes among Negroes, but the Negro arrest rate surpasses the white rate to a degree second only to gambling. Forcible rape and assault also show very high ratios. The relatively greater importance of manslaughter by negligence among whites suggests a combination of two factors. The reduction of murder and manslaughter charges to manslaughter by negligence occurs more often among whites. The situations encountered in daily life by members of the two races differ sufficiently to give less chance that a Negro will behave in the specific manners described by the charge of manslaughter by negligence.

The crimes against persons by Negroes are directed largely against members of their own race. For example, of 108 Negroes admitted to North Carolina prisons for first degree murder between 1950 and 1960, 96 had been convicted of slaying another Negro.

For both races, crimes against property were 15% of total crimes. Robbery, which has elements of aggression against persons, shows the greatest difference between the races. The relatively low rates for forgery, counterfeiting, embezzlement, and fraud reflect less opportunity for Negroes to commit white collar crimes because few Negroes hold white collar jobs. The relatively smaller importance of automobile theft among crimes of Negroes reflects the greater likelihood of the white to define the automobile as a prestige symbol within his peer group.[1]

Driving intoxicated is a crime more characteristic of whites. The Negro is less likely to be able to own an automobile. The middle and upper class white is more likely to be arrested for this offense than for many others.

PATTERNS OF PRISON ADMISSIONS

Another type of criminological data is prison commitments collected by the Federal Bureau of Prisons from various adult correctional systems. The most recent report shows that Negroes make up 31% of the male commitments and 41% of the female commitments.[2] Of every 100,000 Negro males 15 years of age or more in the nation, 304 entered prison in 1950 compared with a similar rate of 67 for whites. For females, the equivalent rates were 16 for Negroes and 2.3 for whites. Compared with whites, the Negro male is four and one-half times more likely to be imprisoned and the Negro female seven times more likely. The difference between the sexes is inconsistent with a simple biological explanation of the high Negro crime rates.

Why do the female imprisonment rates by race differ more than do the male imprisonment rates? Racial discrimination deprives the Negro female offender of some of the protection given the woman by the chivalrous attitudes expected of the man in our culture. Victims are reluctant to report her transgressions. Police are hesitant to arrest her and juries to convict her. Apparently, such reluctance does not protect the Negro woman as much as the white woman.

The passive and dependent roles assigned the females in our culture gives them opportunities to commit crimes in the privacy of the home or tends to cause them to have accessory roles in the perpetration of crimes. On both scores, the female crimes are often more difficult to detect and prosecute. These advantages for the female offender protect the whites more than the Negroes because of the affects of greater family disorganization and inferior socio-economic status. The Negro female is more likely to have to leave the home and role of housewife to support herself and her dependents. Her greater entrance into the job market, the greater Negro family disorganization, and inferior racial status has given the Negro female greater freedom than the white female, on the average. The same chivalry which protects the white female offender places the white female in the role of dependent. Therefore, the denial of the full protection of such chivalry also increases the opportunity of the Negro female to commit those crimes open to the Negro male. The inhibitions against aggressive crimes against persons are reduced. Much of Negro female employment is in domestic service which has special vulnerability for sexual delinquency and which creates the opportunity for frustrations stemming from comparison between her level of living and that of her employer.[3]

Since the South has the largest share of Negroes, it is not surprising that the absolute number of prison admissions of Negroes is concentrated in the South to a greater extent than of whites. Of all felons received by state prisons in 1950, 35.3% of the white males and 60.1% of the Negro males entered southern institutions. Southern prisons received 27.4% of the white female felons and 54.2% of the Negro female felons. However, more careful analysis shows the chances of a Negro going to prison to be least in the South of all regions.

To cancel out the affects of regional differences in size of total Negro population, the number of Negro male offenders received by the prisons of each region is divided by the number of male Negroes ages 15 years or more. These rates reveal the South has the lowest Negro prison admission rate among the regions, although it is second only to the West in white prison admission rates. For white female commitments the regions have little differences in rates, but again the South has the lowest rate for Negroes.

The Negro prison admission rate surpasses the white prison admission rate in all regions. In which region is this difference the greatest? When the Negro admission rate is divided by the white admission rate, these answers for males are obtained: Northeast 7.8, North Central 6.1, South 3.1, and West 3.1. The similar ratios for females are Northeast 10.0, North Central 7.8, South 5.3, and West 11.7. The difference is the largest in the Northeast for males and in the West for females. For both sexes, the South has the least difference between the races in relative chances of imprisonment.

Of the total increase of male felony admissions between 1950 and 1956, southern prisons received 74% of the gain in white admissions and 49% of the gain in Negro admissions. Similarly for females, the South had 69% of the gain in white admissions and 51% of the Negro increase. Although the South had a larger share of total white male and female admissions in 1956 and in 1950, the proportion of Negro female admissions declined slightly and of Negro male admissions held constant.[4]

@ Number of admissions per 100,000 population of given race and sex in region in age group 15 years and over.

The Negro felon serves a longer time in prison on the average than the white felon.[5] Nationally, this is true for all major crimes except for murder and sex offenses other than rape. This is true generally for all regions. Exceptions are automobile theft and weapons in the South, escape and sex offenses other than rape in the West, and murder in the Northeast and North Central. The South imposes the shortest period of imprisonment for vittually every offense and for both races. Southern Negroes serve longer average sentences than southern whites except for automobile theft and weapons. However, Southern Negroes spend less time behind bars on the average than Negro felons of other regions with the single exception of rapists in North Central.

The time spent in prison depends on both the length of sentence imposed by the court and a host of factors affecting the proportion of the sentence actually served. Comparisons of sentences imposed by several judges for the same crimes have demonstrated important differences. Sellin notes that the judge is subject to many social psychological influences when the offender stands forth for sentencing. As a person he represents a class or group in society toward which the judge may have feelings of approval or disapproval. Racial stereotypes can be one of the aspects.[6] Good conduct and extraordinary work effort can earn the prisoner "gained time" rewards toward earlier release. Racial discrimination may be a latent factor by affecting the vocational experience necessary to be eligible for work tasks qualifying for such rewards.

PROBATION AND PAROLE

The Negro offender is less likely to receive probation or parole.[7] The significance of this statement is difficult to determine because of the inadequacy of the limited data available. Omitting race as an administrative criterion contributes to the spirit of racial equality, but it handicaps evaluation of efforts to achieve such equality.

The fundamental difficulty, however, is the problem of capturing the unique and personal qualities of each decision on granting of probation or parole. Because of the complexity of personality, such decisions involve risk in choosing a reasonable compromise between protection of society from further crimes and the necessity to place trust in the convicted offender if he is to play his vital part in the rehabilitative process. The decision-maker must be free to use his discretion within broad principles. Racial prejudice may play a latent and unconscious factor in such discretion. It is more likely that racial discrimination has affected the personality and vocational qualifications of the Negro which, in turn, are legitimate criteria for probation and parole selection.

On the other hand, race is only one of the characteristics of the offender. Racial discrimination affects the socio-economic status, job opportunities, general environment for social activities, and status in the total community. Because these and similar factors are appropriate criteria for evaluating eligibility for probation and parole, racial discrimination largely is an indirect factor. The offender is stigmatized to some degree, especially if he serves a prison sentence. The white offender, therefore, shares the experience of discrimination. It may be that his previous lack of such experience may make this stigmatization a more telling blow than for the Negro offender. In this narrow sense, racial prejudice may be a relatively minor matter in probation and parole, if the comparison is made in terms of the difference in experiences before and after conviction for a crime. Because the Negro generally has less opportunity for top-notch jobs, the Negro offender is more likely to be able to obtain and be willing to accept the lower level jobs which the prisoner would be able to obtain [redacted] to qualify for parole. Louisiana firms were found to be only slightly more favorable toward hiring white than Negro ex-prisoners.[8]

The several states and the jurisdictions within the states vary greatly in the degree of use of probation. The states vary similarly in their use of parole. In Vermont, only 9.5% of the releases from prison are by parole, while New Hampshire paroles 95.9% of its prisoners. Similar percentages for the regions are 76.3% for Northeast, 69.4% for North Central, 36.9% for South, and 78.1% for the West.[9] The lower degree of probation and parole for the Negro is explained partially by the location of the bulk of the Negro population in states where treatment programs are available to a [redacted] limited degree to all races.

DOWN THAT LAST, LONG MILE

Capital punishment falls with greater impact on the Negro than his share of the total population would indicate. If we ignore the 82 members of other races who have been executed since 1930, 54% of the capital offenders executed by states through 1960 were Negro.[10] The races were executed for murder in about the same number, but 90% of the executed rapists were Negro. Except for seven executions in Missouri, all executions of rapists were in the South.

The deterrent and eugenic arguments in favor of capital punishment rest on a consistent and certain application according to carefully formulated principles. Such consistency, certainty, and principles are lacking. The study of death row data in North Carolina reveals the racial differences are narrowing.[11] Furthermore, in keeping with the nation trend, the absolute number of executions has decreased drastically in the last decade.

Among the regions, the South continues to have the largest number of executions for both races and to have the greatest proportion of Negroes among executed offenders. However, these regional differences are narrowing. In the last ten years, 77.0% of all executed Negroes were in the South, compared with 81.3% in the 1930-1952 period. The equivalent percentages for other regions are 11.4% and 8.0% for the Northeast, 6.5% and 7.1% for the North Central, and 5.1%and 3.6% for the West. In contrast, the South has increased its share of white executions. In the 1930-1950 period, 36.7% of the executed whites were in the South, compared with 38.0% for the 1951-1960 period.

Executed Negroes tend to be younger than executed whites in all regions. Because executions for rape are almost exclusively limited to the South, the regional comparisons by age are largely for murderers. For executed murderers, the age difference between the races is greatest in the Northeast and least in the North Central. The average age of executed Negroes appears to be increasing, but in the South the increase is greater for whites than for Negroes. The concentration of Negroes in the younger age groups partially explains this pattern.

CRITIQUE OF STATISTICS ON CRIME

Can we trust the statistical evidence offered on the relationship between race and crime? A simple "yes" or "no" would conceal the difficulties and using criminal statistics.

Although very useful, criminal statistics must be employed with caution not realized by the person who is impressed by the mere citation of numbers. On the other hand, constructive criticism does not imply denial of the value of statistics intelligently applied and interpreted.

The perfect statistical "yardstick" would include all law violators. Unfortunately, "offenses known to the police," the most inclusive of such yardsticks, does not meet such a standard of perfection. The police do not arrest every violator when they know of a crime. Some arrested persons do not end up in court. Some defendents are not convicted, and it is probable that some of the guilty ones are found innocent. Some convicted persons avoid imprisonment. Each of these stages takes us farther from the description of all crime.[12]

At each of these stages, there is a selective process which alters the quality of the persons who are defined as criminals. Assuming that we could put all law violators in a big room, we would permit certain persons to ~~xxxxxxxx~~ leave the room to indicate that they would not be included in the group representing "crimes known to the police." If we [redacted] were clever enough to excuse only those persons who are not criminals, the "crimes known to the police" would give us a better approximation of the "true criminals" than we had [redacted] initially. But what if we excuse some of the criminals and retain some of the non-criminals. What if we do our selecting on the basis of behavior or personality qualities which have very little to do with crime? What if we keep the loud and obscene talkers and excuse the quiet persons? After our selection, the type of people in the room will be different than the type before we began our work. But we will have succeeded in isolating out the true criminals only to the extent that quiet persons are non-criminals and the loud and profane persons are criminals? Since this is only accidentally true, we should expect that we will be lucky if we have not turned all the criminals loose and kept only the innocents.

Actually, the police and courts do a better job of selection than this example suggests. But some unknown proportion of crime is never reported. The chance of being reported increases with the difficulty of concealing the crime, with the seriousness with which society regards the particular anti-social act, and with the lesser degree of possible embarassment to the victim. Automobile theft and murder are more likely to be reported to the police. Blackmail, confidence games, and some sexual offenses are less likely to be revealed by the victim. On the other hand, sometimes crimes are reported falsely. A misplaced article is reported as stolen. An unfaithful wife cries "rape" when found out. Even when accurately reported, some kinds of crime are more difficult to solve than others.

An unknown number of individuals are arrested more than once during the year, thereby causing the crime rates to exaggerate the number of persons who are offenders. Do the races differ in multiple arrests. In 1960, 560 per 100,000 urban Negroes and 124 per 100,000 urban whites were arrested on "suspicion." This means arrests for no specific offense and released wihtout formal charges being placed. This suggests Negroes are more likely to be subject to multiple arrests, thereby exaggerating their crime rate.

For minor crimes, arrest policies vary among jurisdictions and from time to time. A drive against speeders or an increase in patrol cars can increase arrests without a rise in actual offenses. The patrolman has a margin of discretion in choosing between a "ticket" or a reprimand. The arrest policy, the regional culture, and the officer's attitudes influence the degree of discretion and its application to various socio-economic-racial groups.

Similar selection affects other stages of the process of dealing with offenders. Alternatives are fines, suspension of sentence, probation, imprisonment, and, later, parole. Qualities of the offender affect such selection, including his financial status and his personality. The background and personality of the decision-makers and the treatment resources available also enter the picture.

The lack of comparable data among jurisdictions handicaps criminology. States, and even jurisdictions within a state, differ in their definition of crimes and the possible penalities attached. For example, 18 states make it possible to be executed for rape; yet it is possible in New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Vermont to receive only a monetary fine. Statutory rape varies even within a state on the basis of age of victim. Delaware sets the age of consent as low as seven, while Tennessee defines 21 as the minimum age of consent.[13]

The affect of variation in definition of crimes and penalties is suggested by the complexities of a hypothetical attempt to compare the work efficiency of a bus driver and an airplane pilot solely on the number of miles covered per hour of work. Apart from his own efforts and skill, the pilot will cover more miles because of the qualities of his vehicle. Similarly, apart from the criminality of its population, the state which defines a given social act as a felony will have more criminals of that type in its prisons than the state which considers that act as a misdemeanor.

Statistics are only as valid and reliable as the skill and conscientiousness of the persons who collect and record them. Assume there are 15 thieves. If the governmental agency has little interest in criminal statistics and the data collection is prefunctory, the reports (if they exist at all) may indicate there are 5, 13, 15, or 17 thieves. Such incidents have created "increases" and "decreases" in crime rates without any change in actual crimes.[14] This is one of the reasons for the FBI's remarkable comment in Uniform Crime Reports: "In publishing the data sent in by chiefs of police in different cities, the FBI does not vouch for their accuracy."

~~Although these comments apply to all criminal statistics, our major interest has been crime rates.~~

Statistics on crime use a frenzy and unscientific conception of race. They Census and criminal statistics are based on the popular [redacted] classification of a person as Negro if there is any degree of known Negro ancestry. On the basis of Herskovits' estimates of the mixture of races in the general American population, almost 40% of the "Negro" offenders are either half or more than half white.[15] Adjustment of crime rates in line with anthropological concepts of race would transfer a considerable proportion of "Negro" population to white statistics. We can only guess the results. It may be that racial marginality creates additional frustrations which would increase the probability of crime by hybrids. Acceptance for membership in the dominant white group might decrease such frustrations from the experiences of socio-economic discrimination and not cause them to contribute unduly to white crimes. However, as "Negroes," the hybrids now may be pushed towards crime [redacted] by the additional frustrations of their marginal status.

In general, the [redacted] crimes among negroes tend to be concentrated in offenses against persons to a greater degree than do white crimes. Although crimes against property make up more than 90% of all crimes reported to the police each year, such crimes have the lowest percentage cleared by arrest of the person or persons responsible. In 1960, the percentages were 25.7 for automobile theft, 20.1 for larceny-theft, and 29.5 for burglary and breaking and entering.[16] Crimes against persons had these percentages cleared by arrest: murder and nonnegligent manslaughter 92.3, manslaughter by negligence 83.3, forcible rape 72.5, and aggravated assault 75.8. ~~For those crimes most character-istic of the Negro,~~ The likelihood of arrest is greatest for crimes for which the negroes have the highest rates. To a modest degree, this causes the gross crime rate to exaggerate the differences between the races when arrest statistics are used.

Probably the major latent defect in unqualified comparison of white and Negro crime rates is the failure to adjust for differences in economic, educational, and other characteristics influences exposure to the risk of crime. Objective and reliable criminal statistics await the creation of opportunities to compare white and Negro criminal behavior on the basis of similar backgrounds and environments. Such research probably would reveal that alleged differences between the races is at least as much a product of underprosecution of white crime as it is the demonstration of unusual degree of criminality among Negroes.

Chapter 3: CAUSES OF CRIME AMONG NEGROES

The reasons for the higher crime rates among Negroes interest us from two points of view. Naturally, we are curious about prospects for the future. But there is the possibility that the higher rates reflect factors other than criminality in and of itself. Are the crimes among Negroes symptoms of something inherent in the Negro or do they reflect something which the Negro experiences in a special way or to an unusual degree. Therefore, we seek explanations for the greater incidence of crime among Negroes.

IS "RACE" THE FUNDAMENTAL CAUSE?

Can the relationship between the Negro and crime be explained as a simple and direct biological one? No.

Race, as a biological concept, is a plastic and relative term. Migrations and other contacts between peoples have eliminated pure races and complicated the problems of physical anthropology. In fact, Herskovits has described the American Negro as a new racial type.[1] A case can be made that race is more myth than scientific fact.[2] However, the fact remains that color causes the Negro to be treated as a separate social entity.

Therefore, the fundamental question is posed: do the higher crime rates of Negroes reflect a correlation between their biological qualities as a race and criminal behavior? Let us list the requirements to prove such a correlation.

First, it would be necessary to demonstrate that the Negro exists as a single personality type. Even casual examination reveals vast differences among Negroes. There is no single "criminal type." But, if there were, he would be only one type found among many kinds of Negroes or any other racial group.

Secondly, to compare the criminal tendencies of several races, it is necessary to rule out the influence of factors other than race. Objective proof of criminality as a Negro racial trait awaits comparison with whites of the same economic, educational, familial, and other characteristics. There would have to be equal chance of arrest, conviction, and imprisonment before assurance could be felt that differences in criminal rates reflect racial differences.

Thirdly, it would be necessary to rule out personality tendencies directly related to minority-group status, rather than coming from innate racial qualities. As a way of adjusting to discrimination, the Negro may bow and scrape, or he may show his resentment in ways which minimize personal peril. The loud, high-pitched cackle has been sterotyped as the "Negro laugh." Pretense of stupidity is a familiar technique of subordinates to avoid difficulties with paternalistic superiors. The Negro habit of lying has been explained as an accommodative technique whereby the insecure Negro tells the white man what the white man will accept.[3] Such habitual responses may result from the inferior place of the racial minority, rather than reflecting personality qualities stemming from a racial heredity.

Fourthly, since criminal and other anti-social behavior may come from social forces which create such behavior in all races exposed to them, it would be necessary to disprove such influences on other races. The rural Southern Negro who migrates to the Northern city may become criminal because, as a ruralite, he finds adjustment to an unfamiliar environment to be difficult. It is the migrant, not the Negro, who turns criminal.

Fifthly, it would be necessary to cancel out social class differences which are only thinly concealed in racial comparisons. Since law tends to reflect middle-class norms, the lower class person may be defined as an offender because his experiences have not taught him to behave the way the law prescribes. The higher crime rates of the Negro may reflect his greater chances of being a member of the lower socio-economic classes than his white equivalent.

Sixthly, objective standards must be developed for defining "inferior" behavior. If tall people define stature as the mark of "superiority," it is inevitable that short people will be "inferior" by this standard. Negro behavior often is judged relative to white middle-class norms of thrift, ambition, abstinence, and sexual behavior. Because white lower classes are likely to deviate from these norms as much as Negro lower classes, such "inferiority" is not proof of racial [redacted] factors. More importantly, however, such lack of social acceptability is not proof of criminality.

Seventhly, the assumption of innate Negro criminality requires the demonstration of traits impervious to environmental changes. Biological factors influence personality, but the influence does not vary with race to any important degree. Under conditions of population and cultural change, personality characteristics of minority groups have been altered. The Germans, Irish, Italians, and other ethnic groups have been labeled as inherently criminalistic as they have successively occupied northern urban slum areas. As they have moved up the economic ladder and out of the slums, they have merged into the total community and lost this criminal label. Unchangeable criminalistic traits of a given population group can not be demonstrated.

In conclusion, if the relationship between Negroes and crime is a simple, direct, biological one, it would be necessary for race to demonstrate the capacity for change with the differences in the definition of crime over time and space. Racial changes are accomplished through mutation and amalgamation, processes which are relatively slow. Furthermore, crime is only a segment of nonconforming behavior and an even smaller segment of total behavior. Montague has pointed out that mind is created through social organization of previously unorganized nervous tissue, and behavior is the expression of that nervous tissue according to the cultural pattern of that social organization.[4] Therefore, biology provides only the cellular elements from which the cultural organization creates mind. Since race as a biological concept cannot explain total behavior, it can hardly explain the specifics of criminal behavior which is only a fraction of non-conforming behavior and which varies in time and place.

IS CRIME THE RESULT OF A "NEGRO CULTURE"?

The cultural hypothesis would have us believe that crimes among Negroes stem from unique personality traits to be traced to special social and family traditions brought from Africa and nurtured by the institution of slavery. It is contended that unique Negro patterns of thought have been handed down through the generations to make Negroes more emotional, less provident, and more inclined toward violence and unrestrained sexual behavior.

Contrary to these contentions, slavery stripped the American Negro of his African heritage, although many African traditions were perpetuated in the West Indies. Frazier has documented several pertinent points.[5] The disproportionate number of males in the early slave population broke the continuity of family life so vital to transmission of culture. The fundamental social distinction between field hands and house servants caused a conflict among slaves through a difference in degree of assimilation of white culture. The scattering of slaves widely among the relatively small plantations broke up kinship groups.

The Negroes' acceptance of American culture has been evidenced by their recent efforts to gain the socio-economic privileges esteemed in that culture. A study of a southern piedmont community ~~found~~ finds the significant values and goals of its Negroes to be essentially those of the American culture.[6] Lewis reports that the local Negro ~~is~~ not disposed to hold to Negro ways and values as such but rather regards them with shame. There ~~is~~ are a major split between "non-respectables" and "respectables." The former has a reputation for excessive drinking, nonconventional family life, sexual promiscuity, an arrest record, and habitual frequency of "piccolo joints." The relative amount of respectability ~~is~~ found to increase as education and economic status increases, but a significant number ~~o~~ at each socio-economic level chose respectability. The "non-respectable"

Negro suffers little social stigma from imprisonment. The "respectables" see local government and law as part of a system of white dominance and adjust by exaggerated avoidance of the law and its agents. Therefore, Lewis sees the general attitude of Negroes toward law enforcement as more of a response to white dominance than an expression of a unique Negro culture.

LOW SOCIO-ECONOMIC STATUS AS AN EXPLANATION

This is consistent with Myrdal's assessment of Negro crime as the affects of inferior socio-economic status.[7] He reports the upper and middle classes among Negroes to be at least as law abiding as their white equivalents. In part this is the result of a conscious effort to demonstrate non-identification with racial stereotypes associated with Negro lower classes.

Deviancy patterns, associated with criminality on the basis of superficial examination, are to be found in lower class Negro life. Lewis describes the Negro recreational patterns of hanging around "piccolo joints" and idling which are created by the caste status assigned. Crap shooting, razor carrying, and use of violence in settling disputes are to be observed. Toland finds the Negro alcoholic offender to be less likely to face ostracism from his kindred group because of his drinking or imprisonment than the white alcoholic offender.[8] He believes that lower class urban Negro life encourages excessive use of alcohol.

Since similar patterns are to be found in lower class white life, a biological or unique cultural hypothesis is inappropriate. Race is a factor in defining socio-economic class status, thereby isolating a racial minority from the main stream of everyday life. Social meanings attached to race create problems for all Negroes in accommodating themselves to the social situations that result. Qualities of impulsiveness, irresponsibility, and laziness exist as personal traits among racial minorities, but they are also to be found among lower class whites. Furthermore, such personal traits and the behavior stemming from them are not necessarily criminal.

MIGRATION AND URBAN DISORGANIZATION

Since World War II American Negroes have shaken loose to an unprecedented degree from previous localism to migrate to cities and to the North and West. The movement has reduced the proportion of Negroes living in the South from 92% in 1860 to 63% in 1950.

Certain types of persons are more likely to migrate. It takes a more individuated, less rooted, and, perhaps, more discontented personality to accept the major changes in one's life and the uncertainties of an unfamiliar land. These personal qualities tend to be found more often among offenders than among social conformists. The age groups 20 to 45 years generally have a greater tendency to migrate. These are the ages which include the bulk of offenders. Therefore, factors which favor migration also favor criminality.

Studies of the northward migration of the southern Negro have indicated an increase in Negro crime because of the maladjustment of strangers with a rural background to the complex urban culture.[9] Frazier finds personal disorganization highest in areas of recent Negro settlement and lowest in areas where Negro residents had adjusted to northern urban life.[10] The assimilation of the migrant rests in part on his acceptance by the host community. The American Negro migrant is a special problem for assimilation because his obvious racial characteristics mark him as a social stranger.

As a stranger marked by his racial characteristics to be of inferior status, the Negro migrant risks unwarranted arrest. Without the social and economic resources for protecting his interests during the various stages from arrest to conviction, he faces the greater risks of conviction and imprisonment which are the lot of the underprivileged. Racial discrimination may make his risks greater than that of his white counterpart. The rarity of Negro officers, judges, lawyers, or jurymen may be contributing factors. Johnson cites the police custom of arresting Negroes on slight suspicion or of staging mass roundups of Negroes.[11] This partially is the result of the inferior capacity of the Negro to exert pressure against such abuses.

The adjustment to the urban North and West is a greater challenge to the southern rural Negro than his white equivlanent because the southern rural racial caste system handles informally many of the vices to be found in the lower class Negro groups. One study asserts that it is not unknown for rural justice to advise planters to whip Negroes for theft rather than to bring them into court.[12] Therefore, the minor Negro offender would face the adjustment to formal police reaction to his transgressions in addition to the more obvious problem of adjusting to urban life.

The possible affects of migration on Negro crime rates are intertwined with urbanization. In general, the number of serious crimes in proportion to population tends to increase with size of community.[13] It has been contended that this is the result of greater migration of persons most likely to commit crimes. However, this explanation is not sufficient.

Migration and urbanization are twin forces behind social changes which create social disorganization and reduce the influence of informal social controls on the individual. Sociologists cite the heterogeneity of urban population and the shallowness of urban social contacts. The lack of moral consensus falls with greater impact on the deteriorated areas where the low rents of substandard housing attracts the migrant because of his inferior economic means. These areas are characterized by economic insecurity, poor housing, [redacted] low standards of living, family disintegration, racial and ethnic heterogenity, high residential mobility, truancy, and cultural conflict. Here environmental factors encourage any personal tendencies toward crime. These influences are not limited to Negroes, but racial [redacted] discrimination increases the likelihood that the Negro migrant will be thrust into such areas.

~~A study of Negro juvenile delinquency in Chicago reveals a resemblance to white delinquency in its patterns of geographical distribution, in the pattern of decline with distance from the central "Loop" district, in the importance of juvenile gangs as a contributing factor, and in the variation of the pattern of delinquencies between areas. Moses finds that, of the total~~

Wolfgang finds that Philadelphia Negroes committed twice the murders in the 1948-1952 period that would be expected if the Birmingham, Alabama, Negro homicide rate were used as a standard. He suggests that [redacted] killings by Negroes should be assessed with the context of the regional cultural environment which affects all races and which affects the status and motivations of the Negro. In the latter sense, he refers to the convergent result of discrimination, restricted interclass mobility, and conflicting moral norms. His Philadelphia data suggest a subculture of violence exists among a certain portion of the lower socio-economic group, including [redacted] Negroes but not limited to them. The social controls of the larger community are weakened in this sub-cultural milieu.[14]

A study of Negro juvenile delinquency in Chicago reveals a resemblance to white delinquency in its patterns of geographical distribution, in the pattern of [redacted] decline with distance from the central "Loop" district, in the importance of juvenile gangs as a contributing factor, and in the variation of the nature of delinquencies between areas.[15] Moses finds that, of the total

Negro delinquents appearing before the Juvenile Court, 77.2% were born in the South and more than a fourth were born in Mississippi. These migrants did not become delinquent immediately upon arrival in Chicago, but, after they were settled, they assumed the behavior patterns pre-existing in their slum area.

To afford a basis for assessing the probable future course of Negro crime in urban areas, let us consider the implication of several facts about the relationship between earlier immigration and crime.

1. Studies in Chicago have found that areas of high delinquency rates in 1900 also had high rates in 1930, but the type of population had changed in the interim. Successive waves of German, Swedish, Polish, Italian, and other nationality groups had occupied these areas near the center of the city. Nevertheless, the juvenile delinquency rates remained about the same.[16]

2. Studies of the criminal records of the American-born children of immigrants have found them with crime rates markedly higher than those of the native-born of native parentage. This has been explained by the vulnerability of the immigrants' child to cultural conflict. The old-world social norms taught by the immigrants clash with the behavior patterns his children experience in their contacts with their own age group among natives of the area.[17]

3. Immigrant groups tend to emphasize the types of crime which are characteristic of their home country. The second generation generally change to the crimes characteristic of the native born.[18]

4. The isolation of immigrants from the total community protected many of them against crime. The relatively homogeneous culture of immigrant ghet tos enabled them to maintain the ways of their native culture and to assimilate American ways more gradually. This gradual assimilation has been cited as an important barrier to the development of criminality.[19]

The entrance of the Negro into new residential and occupational areas involves a "re-education" program of greater scope than converting the alien ways of the ethnic stranger into the familiar behavior and dress of the native son. Additional complexities are the social visibility of racial characteristics and the heritage of racial discrimination which he brings with him to the urban slums. The Negro migrant is a sociological stranger in his own land, facing obstacles poses by the traditions which assign him an inferior status. Therefore, assimilation to the culture of the host community requires modification of the attitudes of his hosts to a greater extent for the Negro migrant than for the ethnic immigrant. Although the assimilation of the immigrant is not the exact precedent for the problem of assimilating the Negro migrant, general similarities can be seen.

The Negro crime rates are high in residential areas where the crime rates of previous migrants were high. This suggests that the Negro migrant is a criminal because he is a Negro migrant, not because he is a biologically member of a certain social group. The precedent suggests that the crimes of urban Negroes will become more numerous as the children of Negro migrants become the equivalent of second-generation immigrants. However, the stimulus will be growing impatience with the disparity between democratic ideals and the realities of assigned inferior status, rather than cultural conflict between generations.

Initially, the type of crimes of urban Negro migrants will resemble those of rural Negroes, with the increased resort to law enforcement masking the difference between rural and urban crimes of Negroes.[20] With attainment of fuller socio-economic opportunity, the crimes of urban Negroes will become more similar in quality to those of urban whites. The rate of increase in Negro crime rates will depend on the pace and effectiveness of integration of the Negro into the host community. The internalization of the informal controls of the host culture probably will lag behind the gaining of socio-economic opportunity. The abolishment of racial segregation, unfortunately, will contribute to the social and personal maladjustments which contribute to criminality during the interim before the Negro is assimilated in terms of a new role and status consistent with the responsibilities and privileges of full citizenship.

FAMILY DISORGANIZATION AND POVERTY

Family disorganization probably has been a more important contributor to crimes of Negroes than of whites. Since the family is the cradle of personality and a primary vehicle for the learning of socially approved adjustments to the problems of life, it is not surprising that studies have found a high proportion of offenders come from disorganized families. Family disorganization among Negroes has stemmed from slavery, its influences on the contemporary racial caste system, the effects of the southern plantation and sharecropper economy, the instability deriving from emancipation and migration, and the low average socio-economic status.

Under slavery, the mother was the pivot of the Negro family, with the role of the father rather casual and easily interrupted. The survival of the matriarchal family is shown by the larger proportion of families with a female head among Negroes than among whites. However, the matriarchal family is not characteristic of all Negroes. In fact a variety of family types is present. The small patriarchal family is found particularly among middle class Negroes with father assuming economic responsibility and authority. The extended family, encompassing four generations, exists among many families in the South, partially because of its economic value for farm labor. The upper and middle class Negroes have accepted the equilitarian family.

The effect of family disorganization on Negro crime rates appears to be no different than those of whites. The uniqueness of the relationship for Negroes is the greater impact of socio-economic influences, past and present, on family life. Increased mobility has exerted new pressures on family stability and has exposed Negro families disproportionately to the disorganizing effects of defective community life.

Statistics on arrests, convictions, and prison commitments show a heavy concentration of offenders in the lower socio-economic classes. Warner and Lunt found that 90% of the arrests were of members of the two lower economic classes which constituted only 57% of the population of a Massachusetts community.[21] However, this is not a simple and direct relationship between [redacted] poverty and crime.

Poverty affects the quality of family life, educational opportunity, and physical and mental health. It means segregation in urban low-rent areas where social status is low and possibility of contact with criminal influences high. It limits social and economic participation. However, [redacted] poverty is a relative matter. Its psychological impact can not be measured purely in terms of a given individual's material possessions. Many underprivileged persons abstain from crime while others more fortunate do not abstain. The degree of discrepancy between aspiration and economic resources is the crucial factor. Even the economically "well-to-do" may feel "poor" because he sees himself as the victim of such a discrepancy. The apparently poverty-stricken person may not feel "poor" in terms of his own values.

The importance of such self-conceptions is demonstrated by successful efforts to reduce delinquency and crime without change of economic status. There are cases where parole, probation , and prisoner rehabilitation programs have succeeded. The Chicago Area Project used neighborhood councils to have similar affects in urban deteriorated areas.[22]

For the Negro, the burden of racial discrimination supplements the affects of poverty in creating objective conditions which enhance the possibility of an individual turning to crime because of a discrepancy between his own aspirations and his resources for attaining them. Compared with whites, a greater proportion of Negroes live in dilapidated houses or houses lacking facilities, are unemployed, have less job security, hold low-paying jobs, and have low incomes.[23]

Average educational attainment of Negroes is lower than that of whites.[24] However, recent progress of Negro education is indicated by the decline of such inferiority with age of person. Since education is a resource for promoting the social adjustment of those with the capacity and will to join in the educative process, the inferior educational opportunities of the Negro are related to crime. Although one can not contend that inferior formal educational level is a direct cause of crime, schooling does promote social graces, vocational skill, factual knowledge, and intellectual [illegible] [illegible] to the social [illegible].

~~Age is an important factor for studies of crime.~~ Arrests tend to be concentrated in the younger ages to a greater extent than the proportion of these age groups in the total population would cause one to expect. The coneentration of offenders in the younger ages is even more marked in prison admissions. Because of a greater death rate among Negroes than whites, Negroes are concentrated in the younger ages in greater proportions than the whites. The difference in the age distribution of the two races is especially great in age group 20 to 25 years which contributes the greatest number of felony prisoners. Age as a demographic characteristic is a factor in explaining the higher crime rates among Negroes.

~~PRISON AS A TREATMENT EXPEDIENT~~ COMPETITION FOR TREATMENT RESOURCES

The higher prison commitment rates of Negroes reflect in part the inferior community facilities and specialized institutions for those Negroes who personify social problems not usually included within the scope of crime. The prison serves as a dumping ground [redacted] as a prelude to the process of recognizing and meeting social problems previously ignored. Increased urbanism has required the community to take formal action to deal with the mentally defective, the sexually deviant, the alcoholic, the irresponsible parent, and the psychotic. When there is no specialized institution to deal with such deviants [redacted] under a treatment philosophy and the informal [redacted] techniques of rural days no longer suffice, the community must develop such institutions for effective action. When such institutions are lacking and the deviant qualifies as a law violator in any respect, the jail or prison is pressed into service as an expedient.

The socially and economically underprivileged are more likely to be subjected to such action because their families lack resources for undertaking an alternative on their own. Even after specialized institutions are developed, any discrepancy between need and treatment resources will cause the underprivileged to be defined as criminals as an expedient to a relatively greater degree than the persons who are more fortunate [redacted] economically and socially. Since a greater proportion are underprivileged, Negroes are more likely than whites to be defined as prisoners rather than patients.

In a study of 300 institutionalized delinquents, Axelrad found Negro juvenile inmates to be younger on the average, to have been institutionalized after a smaller number of court appearances, to have had less exposure to probation, and to have had more of their number committed for less serious offenses.[25]

Chapter 4: SUMMARY AND CONCLUSIONS

Compared with whites, the [redacted] status of being Negro means a greater risk of involvement with the law. The difficulties of obtaining complete and reliable information prevent a conclusive decision on the precise degree of additional risk and on the [redacted] subtleties of the reasons for it.

The higher crime rate among Negroes suggests three possibilities. First, the higher crime rates reflect accurately a real difference between the races in terms of the responses of some of their members to the norms of society. The second possibility is that the status of the Negro exposes him unduely to being included in the various [redacted] statistics used to measure crime to a greater degree than his actual behavior would justify. The third alternative is that the first possibility is further exaggerated by the second possibility.

The third alternative appears the most acceptable. Distortions in statistical reporting exaggerate crimes of Negroes. Racial prejudice has similar effects. But allowance for these factors, if such could be made, probably would not cancel out the first possibility.

Racial prejudice has conflicting results. It contributes to excessive arrests, but it also is the basis for acceptance of social pathology as "natural" to a minority assumed to be inferior. Racial prejudice acts in a less direct manner. It tends to deny the Negro offender the alternatives to full implementation of formal sanctions which cause underprosecution of the white. The inferior status of the Negroes exposes them [redacted] disproportinately to the socio-economic conditions favoring the development of criminality. Earlier pages have documented this. Taft has pointed out that Negroes are asked to be virtuous without the chief reward of virtue--the grant of appropriate social status.[1]

Crime among Negroes appears to be a product of [redacted] a host of factors related to the inferior socio-economic status assigned disproportionately to this racial minority. This is the nub of the matter, rather than any unique biological or cultural predilection to crime.

It is likely that further increases of crime will come. The continuation of Negro migration to cities and to the North and West is to be expected. Social disorganization will continue to result from the demographic, social, and economic changes incidental to a mass movement of a population unfamiliar with the urban environment, possessing ways alien to the host community, and having inferior economic resources. If socio-economic inequalities between the races are narrowed, this may cause temporary increases in crime rates among Negroes. For example, opportunities to commit white collar crimes will come. This narrowing of qualitative differences between the races in specific crime rates probably will precede the reduction of the present high rates for crimes of personal disorganization and against persons among Negroes. The reduction of these latter rates requires the creation of a new psychology which motivates conduct consistent with the roles of full and responsible citizenship. Unfortunately, the internalization of new norms is a process even more difficult than the winning of the privileges of full citizenship. The loss of the influence of the racial caste system will not be quickly supplanted by another informal control system. The increased use of formal controls in the interim will increase arrest rates, especially for the offenses of personal disorganization.

To an important degree, the future course of crime rates depends on the success of various efforts to meet problems fundamental to the administration of justice. Judicial and correctional procedures should be correlated more effectively with advances in the understanding of human misbehavior. Increased use of probation and parole would reduce reliance on prisons. In some prison systems, there is a significant trend away from a philosophy of custody as an end in itself. It is probable that these changes will affect the Negro offender more tardily than the white, creating an exaggeration of relative Negro criminality.

Crime among Negroes increasingly is a national problem as migration and urbanization of Negroes reduce the degree of concentration of this race in the rural South. Description of crime among Negroes as the exclusive product and burden of the South is untenable.

A COMPARISON OF MEDICAL AND HOSPITAL SERVICES AND OPPORTUNITIES FOR NEGROES AND WHITES IN THE SOUTH

This is a proposal for a study which will indicate in concrete terms the discrepancies still to be overcome between medical services for whites and Negroes in the South. The proposal includes a request for financial assistance. The estimated duration of the project is one year.

In proposing a study of medical services and opportunities for Negro and white Southerners, the Southern Regional Council is mindful of certain criteria which have always guided its work. First, the subject - medical care - is a basic practical concern. Second, it is a major factor affecting the growth and welfare of the South. Third, satisfactory health care for the people of the South cannot be attained if it is unequally available to sections of the population. And fourth, there is a realistic prospect that a description of the existing conditions will, in the present climate of opinion, motivate improvements.

Health services in all their forms have been surveyed in the United States for many years and on many occasions. The particular situation in the South has been likewise investigated and documented by frequent studies. This continuing scrutiny of American health services has been a principal force in their progress. Perhaps in no other social or economic field has there been greater receptivity for searching, informed analysis of inadequacies.

Studies of the medical care generally available to Negroes have now culminated in Dietrich C. Reitzes's Negroes and Medicine (Harvard, 1958). Professor Reitzes's book, which was assisted by a grant from the Rockefeller Foundation, provides an analysis which will be, for some time, an authoritative examination of the medical education available for Negroes. The book's principal object, however, is a survey of medical care for Negroes in 14 cities, including three of the South (Atlanta, Nashville, New Orleans). The two factors chiefly dealt with are hospital facilities, and the situation of Negro physicians. The survey of the cities was based on interviews, most of which seem to have been completed before 1957; in Atlantaand Nashville the largest number of interviewees were Negro physicians, and in New Orleans 19 of 32 interviewees were informed, non-medical persons. The result is an impressionistic but highly rewarding picture of the 14 cities studied. The survey "had as its primary objective the identification and analysis of the specific processes which brought about or blocked integration in medicine."

The findings of the Southern portion of the study are "the futility of attempting to develop first-class medical care for and by Negroes within a rigid system of segregation" in Atlanta and New Orleans; and the existence of "opportunities for the professional advancement of young Negro physicians and for status and recognition of the established Negro physicians" in Nashville. Except as regards medical education, the Reitzes study is primarily a report on conditions as seen by Negro physicians and lay spokesmen. This results in a certain tentativeness and even disagreement in the description. Moreover, it does not permit specification of what exactly are the elements of "first-class medical care" which are lacking (the Nashville chapter of the study treats almost exclusively of the professional status and problems of Negro physicians). This is not said in deprecation, but to note that there is still a need for a factual survey of the specific adequacies and shortcomings of the medical care available to Negroes in the South. Furthermore, the three cities of the Reitzes study are commonly regarded as among the most progressive in the South. An analysis, especially if it is intended to be a basis for action, should go beyond these three locations in order to be definitive.

Our aim is, therefore, not to duplicate the Reitzes study, but to further the knowledge of Negro medical services and opportunities in several ways.

First, it would be our intent to measure the existing inequalities as exactly as possible. To this end, the study would, instead of surveying facilities, focus exclusively on the individual Negro patient and physician, and the services and opportunities open to them, compared with those open to white persons in similar situations. The plan for doing so is outlined below, and we hope by it to get findings which permit explicit and indisputable conclusions. This approach does not directly raise the issue of integration; but by delineating inequalities the logic of integrated facilities can be made clear. Moreover, we believe that there is in the South now, because of a general defensiveness on the schools problem, a prevalent mood in favor of eliminating inequalities where they are pointed out.

Second, we propose to cover in our study a representative selection of Southern cities and non-metropolitan areas . The study is motivated by a concern for practical reform, and it is our experience that a fact-finding venture must have a wide base if Southerners generally are to regard it as pertinent to their local situation.

Third, we propose to give careful, thorough attention to presentation and distribution of the study, using a portion of the funds allotted to the project for free distribution to pivotal persons and organizations. The presentation will be in pamphlet form, and we contemplate two or perhaps three publications.

The Southern Regional Council has had long experience in fact-finding studies and the presentation of their results. Methodological skills of research, writing, and distribution have been built up. The Council's publications have achieved a reputation for objectivity and for striking a balance between popularization and technical presentation. The Council has always been able to enlist for its fact-finding projects qualified specialists from Southern campuses and other sources. Its bi-racial composition gives it access to the confidence and cooperation of a wide range of Southerners.

General Plan of the Study

The first object of the study will be the individual Negro patient, and his opportunity to obtain medical and hospital care equal to that available to whites. The general level of services will not be evaluated nor studied except incidentally in relation to the question of discrimination. The study will not be concerned with the adequacy of any health programs, public or private. It will, instead, focus on the question whether Negro and white patients, in similar economic circumstances, can get equal treatment.

The second object will be the individual Negro pursuing a physicians career. Again, there will be no concern with the general adequacy of medical education or practice. The study, instead, will be devoted to Negroes's opportunities for beginning and following the career, as compared with opportunities available to whites.

Topical Outline

A. Comparison of medical services (non-hospital) for Negroes and whites at two economic levels.

1. The purpose will be to describe the respective situations of individual patients who differ only in race, and to do this in a number of representative Southern localities. Two general economic categories will be used: the indigent patient, and the self-supporting. For greater precision, the study will be limited to selected types of cases, such as accident and other emergency; pediatric; venereal; mentally ill; cardiac.
2. Typical of the information to be sought will be:
   - the access of Negroes to specialists;
   - waiting room practices;
   - house call practices.
3. It is realized that reliable information on patient-doctor relations is exceedingly difficult to obtain. These are often not matters of record. If information is sought from interviews, widely varying impressions will be encountered. If case studies are used, there can be no positive assurance that they are typical. It is at the same time true that for the majority of persons, doctor care is the crux of their medical needs; no survey and appraisal of medical care which omits it is complete.
4. For this reason, the questions indicated above in (2) have been limited to those which are susceptible to clear-cut fact-finding. If in the course of the study other practices (e.g. fees for office visits, or differences in pre- and post-operative attention for Negro and white patients) can be submitted to objective comparison in some localities, that will be done. But the three questions shown in (2) would yield significant results: the availability of specialists is certainly, for example, a key determinant of the adequacy of modern medical service.

5. By thus limiting the information sought, objective data should be obtainable through interviews with informed persons in the localities, such as Negro and white physicians, social workers, Negro leaders, hospital administrators and public health officials.

6. The scope of the study will include:

- at least six principal cities. Atlanta, Nashville, and New Orleans should be included, in order not to waste the opportunity of gaining depth for our survey by building on the Reitzes work. The other three cities would be selected from (in order of preference),

  Birmingham,
  Houston (or Dallas),
  Jackson,
  Norfolk (or Richmond),
  Jacksonville (or Miami),
  Durham (or Winston-Salem),
  Columbia;

- three non-metropolitan counties with a principal city in the 25,000 population range;

- three non-metropolitan counties with a principal city in the 5,000 population range.

7. The types of cases will include at least one whose treatment is heavily supported by philanthropy.

B. Comparison of hospital services for Negroes and whites at two economic levels.

1. The same localities will be studied, and the same types of patients and illnesses.

2. Typical of the information to be sought will be:

- facilities and beds available;
- ambulance service;
- nursing arrangements;
- admission to specialty clinics and wards;
- free choice of physician.

3. Objective data can be and will be systematically gathered, and be supplemented by interviews.

4. An analysis of the hospitalization insurance situation in the locality will be separately made to determine if insurance is readily available through non-commercial plans (e.g. Blue Cross-Blue Shield), and the extent of coverage of Negroes as compared with whites.*

5. As a corrolary subject, the use of Negro patients for clinical instructions and experimentation will be explored, and findings included in the study if they warrant it.

C. Comparison of opportunities and rewards for Negro and white physicians.

1. Again, the intent will be to describe the situation and prospects confronting the individual Negro in comparison with those of the white person in the profession. It is believed that the factual data in Negroes and Medicine on medical education will not need up-dating. One topic concerned with medical education will be explored in some additional detail; i.e., the role and accomplishments of the Southern Regional Education Board. Other than this, the study will be devoted to the physician after graduation. The same localities will be used as in A and B.

* When O. W. Anderson took a random sample of Blue Cross/Blue Shield "standard" contract subscribers in Birmingham for his study, Voluntary Health Insurance in Two Cities (Harvard, 1957), it turned out to be only 14% Negro, in a city whose population is about 40% Negro.

2. Typical of the information to be sought will be:
   - availability of internships for Negroes (a) in the localities; or (b) if there are none or but few for whites or Negroes in the particular localities, the opportunities elsewhere;
   - opportunities for continuing education;
   - membership in local and state medical associations;
   - staff and courtesy privileges in hospitals (here an item of specific interest will be the policies of Hill-Burton and other federally-aided hospitals);
   - opportunities for specialty practice.
3. Objective data will be supplemented by interviews.

Personnel

A. The Southern Regional Council's Research staff will administer the study in all phases, will prepare the interviewers' questionnaires in order that they be uniform, will assemble the findings and prepare the reports, and will plan their distribution. It will be necessary to secure part-time professional assistance for these administrative and editorial functions.

B. An advisory panel of recognized experts will be formed to review the soundness of the conclusions.

C. For each city of the survey, a chief reporter and at least one other reporter will be recruited; in each non-metropolitan county, at least one reporter will be appointed.

To whatever extent possible, persons with previous experience in this sort of study will be selected.

D. The hospitalization insurance analysis will be contracted to a firm of economic consultants, or to an appropriate academic researcher.

E. The role of the S.R.E.B. will be studied by an outside consultant.

Subject: Outline for Revision of Integration North and South

INTRODUCTION.

This project has its origin in a publication entitled, Integration North and South, by David Loth and Harold Fleming. Issued in 1956 under the imprint of the Fund for the Republic, this document is now out of print. It is proposed that a complete revision of this document be undertaken. The publication, as conceived, will provide within a single framework a factual summary of the major civil rights gains affecting the Negro for the period 1954-1962. A document such as the one proposed seeks to meet the demand for an authoritative progress memorandum in civil rights for use both in the United States and abroad.

SCOPE.

The South, for the purposes of this report, is geographically defined as the following 17 states: Alabama, Arkansas, Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Mississippi, Missouri, North Carolina, Oklahoma, South Carolina, Tennessee, Virginia, and West Virginia. Serious efforts will be made to draw upon already collected data from as wide a range of reliable sources as feasible in terms of time and expense. No special studies or surveys are contemplated for the express purpose of inclusion in this report; however, field sources will be used as needed to verify or complete data from SRC files and published materials.

METHOD.

The section on the South will include:

1. a brief historical discussion on the background of civil rights developments in the South,

METHOD (cont'd)

2. a description of recent events that directly bear upon the direction, pace and areas of racial change in the South,

3. a profile for each state pointing up the status of civil rights within the state in 1954, civil rights changes since 1954, methods used in effecting change and areas of civil rights still unaffected by change, and

4. special attention to change in such fields as education, voting, employment, public accommodations, and medical care.

SOURCES OF DATA.

Press clips, organizations' reports, federal and local government reports, and SRC surveys and reports.

TIME.

March 1 - August 1, 1962

COST.

Expenses involved will include a full-time research worker for the duration of the project, clerical costs, and a small charge for SRC overhead. We estimate $2,500. We ask, however, that this figure be regarded as an estimate, subject to adjustment up or down after a final accounting.

Dear Dr. Cobb:

We have recently received at least three requests for information from southern communities seeking to desegregate their hospital facilities. Our research staff, here at the Council, views as a responsibility and privilege, the ability to make available to members of the communities, both Negro and white, information that may serve to facilitate positive racial changes in the South. We are confronted, however, with a paucity of information on community activities in hospital desegregation, particularly in the South.

Dr. Albert Dent, President of Dillard University, and a member of our Board, has suggested writing you for information on methods and approaches to hospital desegregation in both the North and the South where it has occurred. If you wish we would be very pleased to follow up any published references and other sources which you might suggest to us.

The current interest in this subject prompts us to urge as early a reply as may be convenient for you.

Very truly yours,

James A. Moss

Dear Doctor Moss:

In reply to your letter of March 7, may I begin by extending a most cordial invitation to you and any members of your staff or Board who would be concerned, to attend the Sixth Imhotep National Conference on Hospital Integration, which will be held at the 15th Street Presbyterian Church here in Washington, D.C., May 25-26, 1962. There you will be able to gather first hand a comprehensive perspective on all that is afoot in this area.

Under separate cover I am sending you a copy of the Proceedings of our First Imhotep Conference in 1957, a leaflet describing this Conference and marked copies of the recent issues of our Journal, which carry relevant information on the subject.

I do not know whether you have copies of two pamphlets of mine, "Medical Care and the Plight of the Negro," and "Progress and Portents for the Negro in Medicine," published in 1947 and 1948, respectively. These might have some value as background material for your work in which we naturally have the deepest interest.

With all good wishes,

Sincerely yours,

FACT SHEET

1. Available Hospital Facilities
   - total number of hospital beds in Atlanta: 4000*
   - of which 638 are for Negroes
     - 457 at Grady and Hughes Spalding
     - 135 at private Negro hospitals
     - 16 at DeKalb General Hospital
     - 30 at Aidmore Hospital for Crippled Children (admits Negroes under 15 years of age).

   TOTAL 638 beds

Therefore 1 private hospital and 2 public hospitals in Atlanta accept Negro patients.

2. Need For Expanded Medical Care
   - Negro death rate is higher (11.7) than that of whites (8.3)
     - for every 8 out of 1000 whites who die, almost 12 Negroes die.
   - Although better than 1 out of 5 (27%) persons in Atlanta is Negro, only 1 out of 7 hospital beds is available to him, and these, for the most part, are concentrated in a single hospital (457 at Grady and Spalding).
   - Yet Negroes are more likely to suffer sicknesses requiring hospitilization than whites.

Diseases	Deaths	White	Non-white
Heart	1608	1089	519
Vascular Lesions	733	384	349
Cancer	716	463	253
Infant Deaths	404	166	238
Influenza and Pnuemonia	226	100	126
Accidents other than motor vehicles	171	105	66
Birth Injuries	91	42	49

   - Although Negroes comprise 1/5 of the population in Atlanta, they account for ½ and upwards of deaths from more serious illnesses.

---

* Information about hospital beds is taken from a fact sheet of the Greater Atlanta Council On Human Relations, October 18, 1961, except for the information about DeKalb General Hospital and Aidmore Hospital which was received through telephone conversations with hospital personnel.

The death rate was found in A Second Look published by the Atlanta Committee For Cooperative Action, January, 1960. The number of deaths from various diseases was gotten in a telephone conversation with the Health Department of Fulton County.

- Per capita income for Negroes in Fulton and DeKalb counties is between $700 - $800 as compared with $1800 - $2400 for whites
  - this reflects an expanding need of Negroes for hospital facilities and care, particularly among lower-income groups.
- In addition to the shortage of space for medical care, Negro patients suffer an acute shortage of trained professional personnel to service their needs:
  - while there is 1 white doctor for every 469 white patients in Atlanta,
    - there is 1 Negro doctor for every 4500 Negro patients, and,
  - while there is 1 white dentist for every 1708 white patients,
    - there is 1 Negro dentist for every 12526 Negro patients.
- This situation is aggravated by the fact that:
  - there are no facilities for the training of Negro doctors or dentists in Georgia although there is both a medical and dental school for whites at Emory University in Atlanta,
  - only 1 Negro doctor has been accorded visiting privileges in a public hospital in Atlanta, and that is in a hospital that has approximately 500 white doctors and dentists who have the same privileges,
  - both Negro doctors and dentists are denied full membership in their respective professional societies
    - these limitations seriously restrict and hamper the Negro physician's professional career.
- The employment of Negroes as technicians and technologists in public hospitals is extremely limited:
  - 1 Negro tissue technician at Grady*
  - 2 Negro laboratory technicians at Spalding
  - 2 X-Ray technicians at Spalding.

The per capita income was arrived at by finding the average median family income for all the census tracts that were predominantly white or Negro and dividing this by the average number of people in a family. Data was obtained from the Atlanta Region Metropolitan Planning Commission and the Atlanta Chamber of Commerce.

64 hospitals in 26 cities

This survey included every hospital in 12 southern states (Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Maryland, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, and Virginia) that was affiliated with a medical school. The original request for the research came from an organization in Atlanta that was interested primarily in opportunities for Negro interns, therefore Atlanta hospitals and any hospitals affiliated with a medical school through a nursing program only was not included. The 64 hospitals were located in 26 cities.

S.C.; Tenn.; Miss.; Ga. and Ala.

The states surveyed can be ranked into three categories: border states, Deep South ~~"Progressive" states and Deep South "Traditional" states. The border states are Kentucky~~ and Maryland, "Progressive" states are Arkansas, Florida, North Carolina, Texas and Virginia ~~and the "Traditional" states are the remaining ones. This division is based on the records~~ of medical schools withing the states and their admittance and attempts to get ~~Negro students. In Maryland and Kentucky we sent questionnaires to 7 hospitals located in~~ Baltimore and Louisville. Six were returned, three from each city. In Arkansas, North Carolina, Florida, Texas, and Virginia we sent questionnaires to 36 hospitals in 15 cities. We received 18 (a little less than 50%) replies. In the states we sent out 25 questionnaires to 10 cities and received eight answers. The willingness to reply seems to be directly correlated withthe amount of integration of Negro professional personnel ~~that has been~~ achieved the state.

Every hospital replying from Baltimore and Louisville reported complete integration of all training opportunities, personnel ~~and bed space~~.

In the "Progressive" states there was a widely varying pattern. At least one hospital in every large city either admits Negro interns, residences or nurses to training, or has Negro doctors on the staff. Many hospitals, including those maintained by religious denominations and those for children, have not ~~a single~~ Negro professional person or ~~a single~~ bed for Negroes.

In Texas, where 5 cities - Austin, Dallas, Galveston, Houston, San Antonio, were surveyed, ~~at least one hospital in every city except Austin answered. Of the 8 answering hospitals only~~ two (one in Galveston and one in San Antonio) admitted Negroes into training as interns, residents or nurses ~~and only two hospitals (in the same two cities)~~ had Negro doctors on the staff. All but one hospital employed Negro nurses. But of these none indicated that they had Negro nurses as supervisors.

In Florida the only hospitals to answer were those in Miami and Miami Beach. We sent out questionnaires to 6 hospitals in three cities and got three replies. One hospital said it's policy was not to admit Negroes into training. It employed two Negro nurses. Another hospital said it had no statement on the race of staff or trainees but has had Negro doctors on the staff for 10 years. The third hospital has also been admitting Negroes into training for 10 years but has none at present.

In North Carolina we sent out 5 questionnaires to three cities and got 3 replies. From the North Carolina Commission on Civil Rights report we found there are only 2 hospitals within the state that have approved intern and residency programs open to Negroes, and these are in Surgery. From our replies we didn't learn much else. One hospital didn't indicate the number of Negroes on the staff or in training, one has no Negroes in any capacity, and the third was a predominantly Negro hospital.

In Arkansas the Univ. of Ark. Medical Center, as female interns and nurses go, is integrated in training personnel

In Virginia we received three questionnaires back from the 6 we sent out. In Richmond one hospital trained Negro interns and nurses and employed Negro nurses. The other hospital did not have any Negroes in it at all, unless he was as a janitor or maid. A third hospital, which was a state hospital for Negroes, employed 70 Negro nurses. It has no training program for Negro interns and nurses.

train Negro interns and nurses. It is not indicated whether such training is conducted under integrated circumstances

In the "traditional" statesput of 24 questionnaires we ~~got~~ received 4 answers. Two were from Tennessee, one from Mississippi, one from Alabama and none from Louisiana, Georgia or South Carolina. The City of Memphis Hospitals said it could not answer as to interns or any residents since they were appointed by the medical school. They did say they employed Negro nurses. The Vanderbilt Hospital trains and employs Negro nurses. Negro doctors are permitted to use the hospital facilities - the medical library, staff meetings, etc. In the Miss. hospital, ~~although they only~~ replied for the Negro ~~part~~ patients, there ~~xxxxxx~~ was no nursing or intern training program. They had one MD and 3 duty nurses as the rest of the Negro personnel. In the Children's Hospital of Birmingham there are 2 Negro practical nurses employed.

The ~~comments were very interesting~~ comments. 9 hospitals said they had no limitations as to the use of Negro professional personnel. ~~xxxxxx~~ Four of these hospitals had no traing programs of any kind for Negroes, 3 ~~and~~ not employ Negro doctors for their staff. These hospitals had 5274 beds for Negroes in both integrated and segregated wards and employed only 25 Negro R.N.'s.

Dear Les:

This is merely to confirm our discussion by telephone of a possible updating of Integration North and South. The main points are these:

(1) I hope that Potomac can secure the funds and serve as sponsor and publisher of the survey. At a meeting last week, Stephen Currier and Lloyd Garrison reacted favorably to the idea, but reserved decision until we have an estimate of the cost.

(2) The original survey covered May 1954 - May 1956; the proposed survey would cover April 1, 1956 to some appropriate cut-off date in the near future. In view of the longer time period and the much greater number of developments, we might need to limit the scope or modify the methods of the second survey.

(3) According to Morris Ernst, David Loth would be interested in undertaking the survey of Northern desegregation again. I have written Loth, asking for his views and estimated costs.

(4) We would expect the booklet to have wide international, as well as domestic distribution, and would try to persuade appropriate Federal agencies to order it in quantity.

(5) I very much hope SRC can undertake the Southern survey if we can get the money to finance the project. If you feel you can, please let me have your notions about scope, method, and estimated cost of the project. If the project pans out, the sooner we get started, the better.

All the best.

Harold

Memo from JAMES A. MOSS

October 26, 1961

I know this is a monster, but I am so rigid that I insisted that Dotty spell out the job in all its gory details. If you will look over the outline and include any items which you think are missing and perhaps delete some which you feel could well be eliminated, then I shall reduce this working outline to its barest essentials and incorporate it into a research memorandum. We will be in a position at that time to estimate costs involved.

I believe that we can do the job on the South as well if not better than anyone else. If the job is to be done in less than a year, I know that we will need the services of either a part-time or whole-time person in research. If the South can be done in a year, we may be able to do it with existing staff.

For the North, I feel this ought to be dne by somebody else. I think that Frances Levinson of the National Committee Against Discrimination in Housing might be willing to do this or June Shagaloff of the NAACP staff.

Well, let's get started!

October 31, 1961

Mr. Harold C. Fleming
The Potomac Institute
1501 Eighteenth Street, N.W.
Washington, D. C.

Dear Harold:

We think we can undertake the up-dating of Integration North and South, if you decide to go ahead with it and can find someone to do the northern part.

I think we would need $2,500.00. The biggest expense to us will be the salary of a research worker. Our thinking is that there is about three months full time work involved. We cannot squeeze an assignment like this out of anyone's regular duties.

If our estimating is anywhere near to the fact we should be able to do the job within three months of finding a researcher.

I think you were right in your letter of October 9 when you suggested that, because of the longer span and the more rapid developments, the up-dating might have to be done according to methods other than those of the first book. After we get this moving I think you would want to have the north and the south do some joint planning in the interest of uniformity of approach. I might mention that there seems to be sentiment here for reversing the form, and instead of treating states under topics, to treat topics under states. Part of the reason is that, for the South at least, each state section might begin with a brief description or characterization of where the state stood in 1956.

Let me know what you would like for us to do next and when.

Sincerely yours,

Leslie W. Dunbar
Executive Director

Dear Dave:

At last, further word about the proposed up-dating of Integration North & South.

Les Dunbar and his research director are planning to be here for a meeting of the Southern Interagency Conference (to be held at the Potomac Institute) on January 11 & 12. It is his hope and mine that you might arrange to be here, preferably on the morning of the 11, so that we can talk out a workable plan for the survey. Of course, the Potomac Institute would pay your expenses.

Would this be possible for you?

Sincerely,

HCF

Dec. 19.

Dear Harold,

Yes, I can be in Washington on Jan. 11 and will be very glad to. I delayed writing you because I have been retained as an expert witness in a Federal obscenity trial in New Hampshire which was set for Jan. 8, and I wanted to be sure they would be through with me in a day or two. I just got a call from the lawyers that they have won a postponement until March, so I have no problem.

I have talked a little bit with Morris Ernst about the project, and he seems to think that there is a considerable interest in the government, especially by Senator Humphrey. I suppose you will know all about that.

Anyway, I will be prepared to be in Washington on Jan. 11, and meantime I hope you have a very happy holiday season.

I write on this stationery because I do some part time work for this college, and am here at the moment, but my South Nyack address is still the one to use.

Sincerely,

Dave

SUMMARY OF 1960 AND 1961

STATE ANTI-DISCRIMINATION LAWS

Progress against racial and religious discrimination was made during 1961 in every significant area -- employment, education, housing and public accommodations -- by state legislatures in all parts of the country outside the Deep South. No less than 39 laws were enacted in 21 states. Figured either by the number of states, the number of laws or the breadth of their scope, 1961 set records for state civil rights legislation not achieved in any preceding year.

It cannot be said that any of the 1961 laws blazed new trails. Yet they show a very significant development. It is clear that legislatures throughout the country have observed the enactment of civil rights laws in other states; they have satisfied themselves that the laws work; and they have decided to follow suit. Thus, we may conclude that anti-discrimination laws have proved their value. They have not brought about the calamities their opponents have predicted.

Since enactment of the first fair employment laws in 1945 and particularly since the report of President Truman's Committee on Civil Rights in 1947, the fact of continued inequality has not been allowed to lapse from the consciousness or conscience of the American people. Steady progress has been made during that period in breaking down long-existing barriers. The wide success of legislative campaigns in the states this year shows that the civil rights movement is still growing in strength.

This report covers not only the laws enacted in 1961 but also five laws enacted in three states during 1960. Too few state legislatures meet in even-numbered years to warrant a separate report on their actions on civil rights. To make our biennial reports complete we include mention of the laws enacted in the off years.

The principal legislative advances of 1961 may be summarized briefly.

(1) Illinois, Kansas and Missouri enacted fair employment legislation fully enforceable through the administrative process that has proved so successful in other states. This process includes establishment of a state commission empowered to study discrimination, to carry on educational campaigns, to receive complaints, to attempt to conciliate them and, where conciliation fails, to hold hearings, and issue formal orders that are enforceable in court. The Missouri law is particularly significant because it was the first such law in a border state. (It should also be noted that another border state, Delaware, in 1960 adopted a law prohibiting discrimination in employment and providing for its enforcement through criminal penalties.)

(2) Five states, Minnesota, New Jersey, New York, Pennsylvania and New Hampshire, passed laws prohibiting discrimination in significant portions of the housing market and Connecticut and Massachusetts strengthened the fair housing laws they adopted in 1959.

(3) Idaho, New Hampshire, North Dakota and Wyoming were added to the long list of states that have prohibited discrimination in places of public accommodation, such as hotels, railroads, theatres and bathing beaches. At the same time, Pennsylvania and Ohio strengthened their laws in this area by providing for enforcement through the administrative process already in effect for their fair employment laws.

(4) Pennsylvania passed broad legislation prohibiting discrimination by colleges, universities and other educational institutions.

As a result of the actions of the 1961 state legislatures, a very impressive number of state anti-discrimination laws are now in effect. The principal statutes may be summarized as follows: Nineteen states now have fair employment laws enforceable by an administrative agency using the well-tested method of conciliation, backed by the power to issue administrative orders enforceable in the courts (Alaska, Calif., Colo., Conn., Ill., Kansas, Mass., Mich., Minn., Mo., N.J., N. Mex., N.Y., Ohio, Ore., Pa., R.I., Wash., Wisc.). Two states have laws prohibiting employment discrimination, enforceable by criminal penalties (Del., Idaho). One state has a law condemning discrimination but without enforcement provisions (Ind.). Five states have laws broadly prohibiting discrimination in education, enforced by administrative agencies (Mass., N.J., N.Y., Pa., Wash.), while a number of others have more limited legislation in that area. Nine states have prohibited discrimination in a substantial portion of the general housing market (Colo., Conn., Mass., Minn., N.H., N.J., N.Y., Ore., Pa.) and a number of states have more limited statutes applying to public and publicly-assisted housing. Twenty-eight states and the District of Columbia have prohibited discrimination in places of public accommodation (Alaska, Calif., Colo., Conn., D.C., Idaho, Ill., Ind., Iowa, Kansas, Maine, Mass., Mich., Minn., Mont., Nebr., N.H., N.J., N. Mex., N.Y., N. Dak., Ohio, Ore., Pa., R.I., Vt., Wash., Wisc., Wyo.). Ten of these have provided for administrative enforcement (Colo., Conn., Mass., N.J., N.Y., Ohio, Ore., Pa., R.I., Wash.).

In the following pages, the various laws enacted during 1960 and 1961 are described.

EMPLOYMENT

Eight states enacted laws in 1961 and two in 1960 dealing with discrimination in employment because of race, religion or national origin. Kansas, which had adopted a fair employment law without enforcement provisions in 1953, this year added such provisions. Illinois and Missouri adopted new fair employment legislation providing for enforcement through the administrative process. The addition of these three states brought the number of fair employment laws with full administrative enforcement procedures up to 19. In addition, Delaware, in 1960, and Idaho in 1961, adopted fair employment laws containing penal rather than administrative sanctions. Maryland prohibited discrimination by government agencies and public contractors. New Jersey in 1960 and Oregon in 1961 made minor procedural improvements in their anti-discrimination laws. Indiana revised its existing "voluntary" fair employment law. Washington prohibited discrimination because of age.*

All three of the administrative fair employment laws adopted this year are on the conservative side as compared with others adopted in recent years. The Missouri law applies only to employers of 50 or more employees. In Illinois, an employer is not covered unless he has at least 100 employees but this number will drop to 75 in 1963 and to 50 in 1965. (However, it should be noted that a separate provision imposes a non-discrimination requirement on government contractors, regardless of the number of employees.) The Kansas law is broader, applying to employers of eight or more.

All the laws contain the usual prohibitions of discrimination by employers and unions in hiring, discharging, terms of employment and union membership. The Illinois law prohibits discrimination by employment agencies. It also contains effective provisions barring discrimination by employers, unions and employment agencies in apprentice training programs. The Kansas and Missouri laws contain the customary provisions prohibiting discriminatory questions, application blanks and advertising by employers, unions and employment agencies. This is the only provision in these two laws specifically referring to employment agencies. Hence, it might appear that the actual practice of discrimination by such agencies is not barred. However, the parallel provisions in the New York law, from which these were undoubtedly copied, have been construed as barring such discrimination and the Kansas Commission has already indicated that it is interpreting its law in the same way. The absence from the Illinois law of any provision on discriminatory questions or advertising is unusual.

* California also adopted legislation prohibiting job discrimination based on age, but in separate legislation rather than by amendment of its 1959 fair employment law. The two laws will be administered by different agencies.

The three laws will be administered by unsalaried commissions. In Missouri, the agency will be the 11-member, non-paid Commission on Human Rights established in 1959. The Illinois law establishes a bi-partisan Fair Employment Practices Commission of five members, who are to be reimbursed for actual expenses. Under the Kansas law, the agency that administered the "voluntary" fair employment law becomes the Commission on Civil Rights, consisting of two representatives of industry, two of labor and one of the public. In addition to expenses, they receive $15.00 per diem while performing their duty as commissioners.

Under the Illinois law, the right to file a complaint initiating formal proceedings is carefully limited to "any individual charging on his own behalf to have been personally aggrieved." (Most other states permit the commission or some state official such as the attorney general to file complaints and a few have provisions making it possible for civic organizations to do so.) Under the Kansas law, complaints can be filed by an aggrieved party or the attorney general. A similar provision appears in the Missouri law. That law, however, has an additional provision apparently empowering the Commission to initiate complaints.

A majority of the state fair employment laws follow customary administrative practice by providing that the enforcement agency need not adhere to the strict rules of evidence. None of the three 1961 laws contains so broad a provision. The Missouri law is silent on this point, which may leave the agency free to develop its own rules. The Kansas statute specifically declares that the Commission shall be bound by the rules "prevailing in courts of law or equity, and only relevant evidence of reasonable probative value shall be received." The Illinois law makes the proceeding "subject to the same rules of evidence which apply in courts of record."

The provisions in the three laws governing formal proceedings on complaints vary substantially. Worth noting is the Illinois statute which provides for a hearing before one commissioner or a hearing examiner, followed by review before the full Commission at which time the Commission may take additional evidence or even direct the holding of a new hearing.

With respect to court review and enforcement of commission orders, all three statutes show departures from the tested provisions of earlier fair employment laws. Under the Illinois law, any complainant or respondent may apply to the courts for review of a commission order -- and the commission may apply for an order of enforcement -- under the provisions of the state's Administrative Review Act, which contains customary provisions for judicial review of administrative agency rulings. A separate section provides that, when a commission order is violated, the Commission shall commence an action in court for a court order requiring compliance with the commission order. These two provisions appear to overlap.

The Kansas law provides that, at the "request" of the Commission, the Attorney General or a county attorney "may" seek enforcement in court. (Note that this appears to mean that a Commission order will not be enforced unless the Attorney General or a county attorney decides that enforcement should be sought.) In addition, the Attorney General, county attorney or a person aggrieved by an order may seek judicial review. The court will then hear the case "with or without jury" and may, in its discretion, take additional evidence.

The Missouri law provides that an aggrieved party can seek court review within 30 days of a commission order and that "the case shall be tried de novo" like other civil actions but that the court may bar evidence not introduced before the Commission. The record before the Commission may be offered in evidence. Finally, any party can demand "trial of the issues by a jury." If no petition for review is filed in 30 days, the Commission may ask the court to enforce its order. The statute does not spell out how the court is to proceed with such a petition.

These provisions concerning jury trial are a source of concern. It should be noted that the Minnesota fair housing law described below, which is in the form of a series of amendments to the state's fair employment law of 1955, also inserted a jury trial provision which applies to proceedings under the fair employment as well as the fair housing law. Up to now, employers in fair employment states have tended to comply with the law, at least when the enforcement agency starts an investigation of a complaint against them. Very few cases have reached the stage of a commission order and court review. In the three states providing for jury trial, recalcitrant employers may decide to resist commission efforts at conciliation or even to ignore them entirely, relying on the hope of getting at least a split jury when the case gets to court.

One other unusual feature of these laws requires mention. The Kansas law states that the act shall not apply to adherents of "a religious creed whose tenets or practices include a refusal to recognize the flag of the United States of America or a refusal to serve in the armed forces of the United States of America." The validity of this provision under the federal constitutional guarantee of freedom of religion is open to question.

The fair employment law enacted by Delaware in 1960 was originally introduce and passed by the State Senate as a bill to prohibit employment discrimination based on age. The lower House amended it to cover discrimination based on race, religion and national origin and the bill as so amended was passed by the Senate and signed by the Governor. The law prohibits discrimination by employers, unions and employment agencies in hiring, discharging, terms of employment and union membership. Use of discriminatory questions on application blanks and advertising is also barred. Violators may be fined up to $200 for the first offense and may be fined up to $500 or imprisoned up to 90 days for a second offense. The law establishes a Division Against Discrimination in the state's Labor Commission, to have "jurisdiction over the subject of employment practices" made illegal by the act. However, aside from empowering the Division to adopt rules and regulations, the act does not spell out its powers and duties.

The new Idaho law covers both employment and places of public accommodation, as noted below. As to employment, it declares that: "The right to obtain and hold employment without discrimination" is to be "a civil right." It then provides simply that it shall be a misdemeanor for any person to deny any other person, because of his race, religion or national origin, the right to work by refusing to hire, discharging, or discriminating in the terms of employment.

Maryland adopted two bills, one prohibiting employment discrimination by government agencies and the other dealing with state contractors. The first prohibits discrimination by any officer or employee of a state agency. Violators will be liable to a fine of not more than $500. The other bill requires non-discrimination clauses in all state contracts and sub-contracts "for any construction work." The clause requires the contractors to post notices describing its terms.

If a contract fails to contain the clause, or if it is breached, the state may cancel the contract and pay only the reasonable value of the services rendered (rather than the agreed contract price).

In Indiana, which enacted a fair employment law without enforcement provisions in 1945, an effort to add effective sanctions was defeated. However, the 1945 law was overhauled and a number of changes made. Perhaps the most important is a provision requiring a non-discrimination clause in all contracts by the state or any of its political subdivisions (counties, cities, etc.). Such clauses must also be included in "franchises granted to public utilities." The new law establishes a five-man, non-paid, bi-partisan Fair Employment Practices Commission. While not empowered to issue enforceable orders, the Commission can hold public hearings, subpoena witnesses and make its findings public. The threat to hold a public hearing and to subpoena witnesses is likely to be useful in bringing about compliance in some cases.

Two states made procedural changes in their general anti-discrimination laws, originally enacted as fair employment laws. In Oregon, the changes were in the provisions dealing with procedures before the Commission and the reviewing courts. A number of these provisions were repealed and replaced by making the act subject to the state's general statute on administrative proceedings. This is not likely to cause any substantial change in the functioning of the commission.

In New Jersey, three minor changes in the general anti-discrimination law (applicable to employment, education, housing, and public accommodations), were made in a bill enacted in 1960: (1) the Division Against Discrimination, which administers the laws, became the Division on Civil Rights; (2) the Commissioner of Education, who is ultimately responsible for decisions of the Division, was given power to appoint hearing examiners to hear cases in his place; and (3) most important, the Commission was given power to initiate formal proceedings without waiting for complaints to be filed by an aggrieved party or by the Attorney General or Commissioner of Labor.*

In Washington, the fair employment law originally enacted in 1949 was amended so as to prohibit discrimination based on age as well as on race, religion and national origin.

EDUCATION

Three states adopted laws affecting discrimination in schools and universities in 1961. Pennsylvania passed two broad fair education acts. Idaho prohibited discrimination in some schools. Illinois tightened its law as to public schools.

The Pennsylvania legislature first adopted the comprehensive law on housing and places of public accommodation described in detail below. The broad definition in that law of what constitutes a public accommodation includes kindergartens, primary and secondary schools, colleges, universities and all educational institutions under the supervision of the Commonwealth. However, it does not spell out the prohibited practices in the detail that is customary in bills specifically applying to education.

That shortcoming was remedied in the second law, which is specifically a "Fair Educational Practices Act." This act applies to all post-secondary schools and secondary or post-secondary secretarial, business, vocational and trade schools that are subject to supervision by the Department of Public

* The Ohio law which provided for administrative enforcement of the state's existing law against discrimination in places of public accommodation made a few changes in the enforcement of the state fair employment law. In addition, New York made some changes in its anti-discrimination laws, described in the section on Public Accommodations below, which affect the administration of its fair employment law.

Instruction. It is made an unfair practice to discriminate against students in admissions or otherwise, to ask discriminatory questions, written or oral, or to fail to preserve records of admissions for three years. Religious institutions are permitted to favor members of their own faiths. (However, another provision creates the possibility that religious institutions are excluded altogether from the provisions of the act.) A last minute amendment reserved the right of any institution to accept and administer gifts upon any terms and conditions laid down by the donor.

The act is to be administered by the Pennsylvania Human Relations Commission, which also administers the other Pennsylvania anti-discrimination laws. The Commission is given broad powers of visitation and can make recommendations designed to curb discrimination. Complaints may be filed by aggrieved persons or by the Commission, which can then process them through the usual administrative stages, including issuance of an order enforceable in the courts.

In Idaho, the new law prohibiting discrimination in places of public accommodation, described below, applies to all educational institutions financed in whole or in part by public funds and also to "schools of special instruction" and "nursery schools."

Illinois adopted an amendment to its statutes governing state financing of public schools. It provides that local districts applying for state aid must certify that they are not practicing discrimination in the selection or assignment of staff.

HOUSING

Nine states adopted laws affecting discrimination in housing in 1961. Minnesota, New Jersey, New York and Pennsylvania amended their existing anti-discrimination laws to add various forms of private (that is, not publicly assisted) housing. New Hampshire prohibited discrimination in some private housing in a law enforceable by a civil suit for penalty. Connecticut broadened its 1959 fair housing law in a number of respects. Massachusetts adopted two bills tightening its 1959 law and a third applicable to real estate brokers. Indiana prohibited discrimination in public housing. California enacted five bills, two dealing with urban renewal, two with restrictive covenants and one with veterans' housing.

Of the four new fair housing laws in Minnesota, New Jersey, New York and Pennsylvania, the broadest is that of Minnesota. It applies to all housing except the rental of an apartment in an owner-occupied two-family home and the sale or rental of an owner-occupied one-family home. The Pennsylvania law excludes all owner-occupied one and two-family homes. The New York and New Jersey laws apply to all buildings with three or more apartments (unless the owner occupies one of these) and to one and two-family homes in developments of ten or more.

The Minnesota and New Jersey laws apply to all real property and thus cover vacant land and commercial space. The New York State law applies to commercial space.

The various laws have provisions dealing with discrimination by real estate agents and financial institutions, limited to the kind of housing covered by the basic prohibitions. However, the New York law goes further and bars discrimination in mortgage financing as to all housing, regardless of the limitations described above.

Each of the laws will be enforced through the usual administrative process by the agencies originally established to administer the state fair employment law. Only one unusual feature need be mentioned. The Minnesota law was amended, as part of a compromise to get it through, to provide that, when a proceeding is brought in court to review or enforce a commission order, the proceeding "shall be de novo and the person complained against shall be entitled at his request to a trial by jury." As noted above, this amendment applies also to the state's fair employment law.

Finally, it should be mentioned that the Minnesota law does not go into effect until the end of 1962.

The New Hampshire law is quite different from the four just described. It provides simply that no person shall discriminate against persons of any race, religion or national origin "in the matter of rental or occupancy of a dwelling in a building containing more than one dwelling." Violators may be fined from $10 to $100. As its terms indicate, the law does not apply to a one-family building. Also it may be open to the construction that it applies to rentals but not to sales.

Connecticut, which adopted a fair housing law in 1959, amended it this year in a number of respects. First, the 1959 law applied to owners of five or more housing accommodations located on contiguous land. The 1961 bill lowered this to three housing accommodations. Second, a court had held that the 1959 law did not apply where no housing had yet been constructed on the lots controlled by the owner. This was met by making the law applicable to the owner of three or more housing accommodations or building lots on which housing is to be constructed. Third, the law was made applicable if the owner controlled three or more housing accommodations or lots within a year prior to the discriminatory act. Also, the definition of "control" was tightened.

Massachusetts enacted three separate bills affecting housing. The most important was one which amended the state's 1959 fair housing law to deal with a procedural problem that has arisen under many of the fair housing laws. Agencies enforcing these laws have often found that they cannot give effective relief because the unit in question is rented or sold by the time a complaint is processed. The Massachusetts law now provides that, after the commission has investigated a complaint and decided that there is probable cause to credit its allegations, it may ask a court to enjoin the sale or rental of the housing unit pending final determination of the proceedings. The court is to grant whatever relief it deems "just and proper."

A second bill in Massachusetts makes it clear that the 1959 law applies to sales as well as rentals.

In the third bill, Massachusetts amended the law dealing with the licensing of real estate brokers by providing that failure to comply with a final order of the Commission Against Discrimination shall be a ground for revoking or suspending a broker's license.

Indiana added public housing to the list of places covered by its law against discrimination in places of public accommodation, discussed below. Although discrimination and segregation in public housing is prohibited by the Constitution, adding public housing to this statute provides the additional sanctions of civil and criminal penalties.

California adopted five laws affecting discrimination in housing. One amended its 1959 law prohibiting discrimination in publicly assisted housing to eliminate an exemption for housing built under the state's veterans' loan program.

Two additional bills supplemented the provisions of the 1959 law with respect to community redevelopment areas. One provides that there shall be no discrimination "in the undertaking or operation" of the law. The other provides in detail for inclusion of non-discrimination clauses in leases and deeds disposing of property acquired in redevelopment or urban renewal projects. These two laws supplement the 1959 law prohibiting discrimination in publicly-assisted housing.

The other two bills both declare racial restrictive covenants void. While these bills overlap to a large extent, the second is more detailed. It invalidates not only restrictions on the use and occupancy of land by particular racial, religious or ethnic groups but also limitations on financing. In view of the United States Supreme Court's decision in 1948 holding that state courts cannot enforce racial restrictive covenants, these new laws do not cause any far-reaching change in the patterns of discrimination in housing.

PUBLIC ACCOMMODATIONS

Eleven states took action in the area of discrimination in places of public accommodation during 1961 and one in 1960. Idaho, New Hampshire, North Dakota and Wyoming adopted new laws prohibiting such discrimination. Ohio and Pennsylvania provided for administrative enforcement of their existing laws. California, Indiana, Oregon and Washington broadened the scope of their existing laws and Illinois increased its penalties. New York, in 1960, adopted three minor bills designed to improve its procedures.

The four laws adopted in Idaho, New Hampshire, North Dakota and Wyoming are all of the "old-fashioned" type of "civil rights law," similar to those adopted in many northern and eastern states, starting with Massachusetts in 1865. They prohibit discrimination in various types of places of public accommodation such as hotels, railroads and theatres and provide for criminal or civil penalties or both.

The new Wyoming law uses very broad language prohibiting discrimination by "all places or agencies which are public in future, or which invite the patronage of the public," without any list of specific types of places. The definition of the places covered in the Idaho law is extremely broad, including stores, medical care centers, elevators and washrooms in public buildings and, as already noted, some educational institutions. The North Dakota statute is more restricted, applying only to a specified list of types of enterprises, including public conveyances, theatres, hotels and restaurants.

The New Hampshire law is an amendment to a law adopted in 1919 prohibiting discriminatory advertising by public resorts. The new law substitutes a prohibition of discrimination itself, retaining the old provision defining the scope of the provision. This is limited to a "place of public accommodation" which is defined to "include" hotels, restaurants, public conveyances and theatres.

As to penalties, the Idaho law makes any violation a misdemeanor, punishable in criminal proceedings. The Wyoming law similarly makes any violation a misdemeanor, specifying the penalty at a fine of up to $100 or imprisonment up to 90 days or both. The North Dakota law is identical except that it limits the jail sentence to 30 days.

The early New Hampshire law dealing with discriminatory advertising provided a criminal penalty of $10 to $100 fine or 30 to 90 days in jail. The New Hampshire legislature, while adding the new provisions on descrimination in public accommodations and also in housing, struck out the provision for jail sentences. Hence, the only sanction under the new law is the $10 to $100 fine.

Two states were added to the list of eight that have provided for administrative enforcement of their laws against discrimination in places of public accommodation.

In Pennsylvania, the Fair Employment Practice Commission, established in 1955, was given jurisdiction over housing, as already noted, and also over public accommodations. Its name was changed to the Human Relations Commission.

The definition of public accommodations in the new law is very broad. It applies to "any place which is open to, accepts or solicits the patronage of the general public," and includes a long, detailed list of types of enterprises. The law prohibits discrimination and discriminatory advertising.

The Ohio Civil Rights Commission, established in 1959, with enforcement jurisdiction only over employment was also given authority over places of public accommodation. The new law uses the same definition of that term as is used in the previously existing law, which is enforceable by civil or criminal penalties. Thus it applies to any "place of public accommodation or amusement where the ... facilities ... are available to the public," including inns, restaurants, public conveyances, theatres and stores. However, in two respects, the new law goes beyond the existing law. First, it prohibits discrimination based on religion, national origin and ancestry, as well as race and color. Second, it applies to discrimination against all persons, while the older statute applies only to "citizens." (This formulation withheld protection from the more than 1,000 foreign students attending universities in Ohio.)

The new law prohibits discrimination but does not expressly include discriminatory advertising. However, resorts are not likely to engage in that practice in view of the basic prohibition.

The 1959 law gave the Ohio Commission power to initiate proceedings to curb discrimination in employment without waiting for complaints by aggrieved individuals. As part of the process of compromise to get the 1961 bill through, a provision was added withholding this power from the Commission in the case of public accommodations.

Efforts to amend the 1885 public accommodations law in Indiana made substantial progress, though the legislature rejected a proposal for administrative enforcement. The law was greatly broadened in scope. The specific limited list of places covered in the old law was replaced by a broad phrase covering "any establishment, which caters or offers its services or facilities or goods to the general public ...."

The law previously provided for civil suits for up to $100 and criminal penalties up to $100 or 30 days in jail. The new law places a minimum of $25 on both the criminal penalty and the civil award. A provision was also added giving court costs to the successful plaintiff in a civil suit.

Independently of the bill just described, the amendment of the Indiana fair employment law, described above, gave any person discriminated against at a place of public accommodation the right to file a complaint with the Fair Employment Practices Commission. The Commission will have power to investigate but will not be able to take any steps to enforce the law if it finds a violation.

Four states adopted simple bills broadening or strengthening their existing laws in this area. Oregon added "any place offering to the public goods or services." This would appear to bring in all stores and a vast variety of service establishments. Washington added cemeteries to its already broad law. It also amended its law which grants tax exemption to cemeteries to limit the exemption to those who do not discriminate. California, like Ohio, amended its law to extend its benefits to "all persons" rather than "all citizens." (This law had been amended in 1959 so as to make it applicable to a very large class of enterprises.) Illinois amended its law by raising the maximum fine from $500 to $1,000, and consolidated and clarified the sections of its laws dealing with court actions to halt violations.

New York adopted three bills in 1960 amending its laws against discrimination in minor respects. It corrected an ambiguity resulting from the 1952 statute giving the State Commission Against Discrimination jurisdiction over places of public accommodation. The law prohibited discrimination in any "place of public accommodation, resort or amusement" and then set forth a list of places included in that term. The 1960 bill makes it clear that the Commission is not limited to the types of places in that list but may deal with any enterprise that comes within the broad expression.

Another of these bills provided that the Attorney General must be notified whenever a criminal or civil action is started in court under various state civil rights laws. This will apply primarily to complaints of discrimination in public accommodations which a complainant decides to bring to the courts under the old civil rights law rather than to the State Commission under the 1952 law. Its purpose is to make sure that the Attorney General can keep track of all pending civil rights actions so that he can take any action appropriate under the powers of his office.

The third bill is connected with the power of the Attorney General to initiate complaints before the State Commission Against Discrimination, a power little used up to now. The bill gives the Attorney General authority to subpoena witnesses in the course of any investigation he may conduct to determine whether he should file such a complaint.

HUMAN RIGHTS COMMISSIONS

Nevada and West Virginia established statutory human rights commissions with broad powers to study and investigate discrimination based on race, religion and national origin and California empowered Los Angeles County to do so.

The West Virginia statute, which is more detailed than that of Nevada, creates a nine-man, bi-partisan, unpaid Human Rights Commission directed to bring about "mutual understanding and respect" among groups in the state and to "strive to eliminate all discrimination in employment and places of public accommodation." The Commission is directed to employ a full-time executive director and such additional staff as its appropriation permits. It is given the usual broad powers of study, cooperation with other groups, education and the like. Specifically as to employment and public accommodations, it may receive complaints and undertake studies of intergroup tension and may act as conciliator in specific situations, "but no decision of the Commission shall be binding upon any parties to the conciliation." The Commission is given power to hold public and private hearings, administer oaths, make recommendations to the governor and the legislature and publish reports. It is not given power to subpoena witnesses.

The Nevada law states that its purpose is "to foster the right of all persons reasonably to seek, obtain and hold employment and housing accommodations." However, it does not prohibit any impairment of that right. It creates a five-man, non-paid Commission on Equal Rights of Citizens. The Commission is directed to foster mutual understanding, to investigate and study problems of discrimination in all areas and to carry out programs of education. It is specifically authorized to investigate complaints of discrimination and to hold hearings on such complaints or on its own initiative. Since it is given power to subpoena witnesses, it could use the holding of hearings as an effective device to curb discriminatory practices. However, the Commission is not authorized to hire staff and is given an appropriation of only $2,500 a year. Thus, it seems unlikely that it will be able to carry on a large program.

California empowered counties of more than two million population (which means only Los Angeles county) to establish human relations commissions to engage in research and education and to develop and administer programs to lessen prejudice and promote mutual understanding.

MISCELLANEOUS

Absentee Voting

Illinois amended its absentee voting law to permit absentee voting in special, general and primary elections, by any person who, because of "the tenets of his religion in the observance of a religious holiday," will "be unable to be present at the polls." This measure was in response to a situation which had occurred several times when primary elections fell at the time of Jewish holidays.

Insurance

California prohibited discrimination in the issuance, circulation, rates or other terms of motor vehicle liability insurance policies.

Marriage Licenses

In 1959, California repealed its anti-miscegenation law (prohibiting interracial marriages) which had been declared unconstitutional by the State Supreme Court in 1948. At that time, it also struck out a provision requiring that the race of the parties be stated on the certificate attached to the marriage license by the person who performed the marriage. This year, the legislature repealed the provision in a separate law requiring a statement as to race or color in the certificate of registry of marriage. It also expressly provided that applicants for a marriage license shall not be required, for any purpose, to state their race or color.

Indian Affairs

California also established a State Advisory Commission on Indian Affairs, to study the problems of Indians in California and to report its findings and recommendations to the Governor and legislature.

Firearms

Oregon brought its statute concerning the possession of firearms up to date with respect to the kinds of weapon permitted (omitting, for example, possession of a "yager or musket"). In the process, it extended the right to bear arms to all citizens, eliminating the restriction to "white male" citizens.

Southern Regional Council

Subject: Outline for Revision of Integration North and South

INTRODUCTION.

This project has its origin in a publication entitled, Integration North and South, by David Loth and Harold Fleming. Issued in 1956 under the imprint of the Fund for the Republic, this document is now out of print. It is proposed that a complete revision of this document be undertaken. The publication, as conceived, will provide within a single framework a factual summary of the major civil rights gains affecting the Negro for the period 1954-1962. A document such as the one proposed seeks to meet the demand for an authoritative progress memorandum in civil rights for use both in the United States and abroad.

SCOPE.

The South, for the purposes of this report, is geographically defined as the following 17 states: Alabama, Arkansas, Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Mississippi, Missouri, North Carolina, Oklahoma, South Carolina, Tennessee, Virginia, and West Virginia. Serious efforts will be made to draw upon already collected data from as wide a range of reliable sources as feasible in terms of time and expense. No special studies or surveys are contemplated for the express purpose of inclusion in this report; however, field sources will be used as needed to verify or complete data from SRC files and published materials.

METHOD.

The section on the South will include:

1. a brief historical discussion on the background of civil rights developments in the South,

METHOD (cont'd)

2. a description of recent events that directly bear upon the direction, pace and areas of racial change in the South,

3. a profile for each state pointing up the status of civil rights within the state in 1954, civil rights changes since 1954, methods used in effecting change and areas of civil rights still unaffected by change, and

4. special attention to change in such fields as education, voting, employment, public accommodations, and medical care.

SOURCES OF DATA.

Press clips, organizations' reports, federal and local government reports, and SRC surveys and reports.

TIME.

March 1 - August 1, 1962

COST.

Expenses involved will include a full-time research worker for the duration of the project, clerical costs, and a small charge for SRC overhead. We estimate $2,500. We ask, however, that this figure be regarded as an estimate, subject to adjustment up or down after a final accounting.

Memo from DOROTHY MILLER

The way I see it, there are several ways of approaching this magnum opus. I offer them for consideration:

1. Divide North and South into two different volumes, still retaining all the fields of inquiry

2. Take three fields of inquiry, e.g., housing, employment, and public accommodations, and do each of the 50 states

3. Make the study a series, e.g., three fields of inquiry in the North at a time, three fields of inquiry in the South at a time, etc.

My own personal preference, for what it is worth, is number 2. This way I think we can get a thorough, bang-up job which will give good comparisons for the whole country. However, my mind is open (not empty).

Re: personnel for the job. This depends largely on how or if we limit the work. If it is going to be done strictly according to the outline, I think it will need three people doing practically full-time work. I could be wrong; the only way to find out will be to plunge in and gauge the time from there. If it is limited somewhat, I think we could manage with two. But then again, we will have to jump into the water first before we see how we swim. In any case, I don't think we have enough information to do the Northern side without some interagency help from the North. I think we can handle the South from this office whether it is limited or not.

I thank you for your consideration and attention.

INTRODUCTION

A smattering of sociology and plain ordinary observation make it quite obvious that the human being is more than a tidy statistical sum of figures denoting his food, clothing, shelter and job; but he is also what he can read, and see, and talk about. The key word is "can." What then is opento him? What barriers are before him? Does he have a chance to make of himself a whole man?

And so the Negro's status in the South is more than his economic buying power, his living quarters, his employment opportunities - as important as these are; his status is also reflected in his opportunities for and his participation in our world of culture.

While citizenship embraces the right to vote, work, speak, and think, it also means these rights: to walk upright, in dignity, and see a play, a movie, a debate, a discussion, to read freely in a library, to ~~vitis~~ visit a museum or an art gallery, to relax in a park.

THE SURVEY

A survey such as this is limited in the cities surveyed and in the questions asked. No attempt has been made to record every small ballet group or lecture society in these cities, or to record cultural activities in hundreds of smaller southern towns.

Our questions were directed to 20 major cities in the South, representing 12 states: Birmingham, Ala.; Little Rock, Ark.; Jacksonville and Miami, Fla.; Atlanta and Savannah, Ga.; Louisville, Ky.; Jackson, Miss., Oklahoma City and Tulsa, Okla.; Charlotte, Durham, and Raleigh, N.C.; Columbia, S.C.; Chattanooga, Memphis, and Nashville, Tenn.; Dallas and Houston, Texas; and Richmond, Va.

The areas of question are movies, drive-in movies, municipal auditoriums, local theatre groups, summer theatre, art galleries, and libraries (some passing attention is paid to parks, zoos, and sports stadiums).

No effort has been made to assess the overall quality of culture available to both whites and Negroes in the South. However, a sample of black and white culture shows a disparity which is repeated countless times in countless places throughout the South. On March 5, 1962, a day picked at random, the following movies were available to the white public in Atlanta, Georgia:

Two Women
Tender is the Night
Light in the Piazza
Summer and Smoke
Lover Come Back

(among 25 others). Here is the entire range of movies available to the Negro public (which constitutes 35% of Atlanta's million population):

Raisin in the Sun
Twist Around the Clock
Creature Walks Among Us
Paris Blues
Goliath and the Dragon
The Mask
Imitation of Life
The Spider

This one example shows more about the cultural dearth and degradation caused by segregation than a hundred pages of statistics, but it was impossible, in this small survey, to examine movie fare in 20 cities.

MOVIES

Four of the survey cities have desegregated theatres (in downtown areas): Louisville, Nashville, Oklahoma City, and Tulsa. Recent breakthroughs in movie theatres have been noted in Chapel Hill, N.C., and Austin, Texas, though for some of these theatres stringent measures have been taken to restrict Negro patronage to students.

On the whole, movie segregation - with the four exceptions - presents a fairly solid barrier to the intellectual growth and enrichment of the average southern Negro. In some places, Negroes are able to go downtown and sit in a segregated balcony of one or more of the"first-run" houses. This lofty perch, dubbed "The Buzzard's Roost," has, in some cases, been left un-patronized since the advent of the sit-in and stand-in movements.

The statistics of these cities show a wide gap between the numbers of theatres available to whites, and those to Negroes. For example: the figures for the 18 cities collectively and for some of the 20 cities singly spell out dramatically how wide this gap is. Of a total of 283 movie houses, 216 are exclusively for whites, 5 segregate Negroes, 53 are reserved for Negroes, and only 14 are desegregated.

In Houston, Texas, of the 42 movie theatres in the city, all but seven are for whites. There are no integrated houses, and not even a segregated balcony in any of the 35 - even if Negroes did wish to climb to the Buzzard's Roost.

In Atlanta -- 30 movie houses -- five are for Negroes.

In Jacksonville -- 30 theatres -- three for Negroes.

In Little Rock -- nine movie theatres - one for Negroes. And so it goes.*

The movie barrier, as this type of segregation can be termed, is not, however, impenetrable. Negotiations with theatre owners, mayors, and responsible members of the adult and student Negro community are underway in many cities in the upper- and middle-Deep South, and may bear fruit in the near future. Stand-in protests by Negro students and adults were, at the time of this writing, taking place in Knoxville, Tenn., and Charlotte, N.C., and, since the beginning of the sit-in movement, had occurred in Knoxville, Nashville, and Chattanooga (Tenn.); Hampton, Va.; Charlotte, Greensboro, Chapel Hill, Fayetteville, Durham, Winston-Salem, and High Point (N.C.); San Antonio, Austin, Houston, Amarillo, and Dallas (Texas); Louisville (Ky.); and Tallahassee (Fla.).

When a thorough breakthrough is effected, it may be possible for some interested student of psychiatry to measure, in some way, the incalculable harm done to preceding generations of Negroes brought up on a steady diet of "The Spider."

*A complete table of the "count-down" is presented in the Appendix.

DRIVE-IN THEATRES

This category is included for two reasons: first, that drive-in theatres represent a new "automotive" culture, and second, it could ~~have been~~ be assumed that desegregation would go more easily when Negroes were in their own automobiles in a darkened lot.

Unhappily, this does not prove to be the case. Of~~A~~ total of 136 drive-in theatres, 114 are reserved for whites, 9 for Negroes; 12 admit Negroes to segregated sections and only 6 are desegregated. A sampling of conditions in individual cities follows:

In four of the survey cities - Jacksonville,* Louisville, Miami, and Tulsa - at least one drive-in movie has integrated parking. Six cities ~~had~~ have drive-in theatres for Negroes. But in twelve of the cities, there are no drive-in theatres "for" Negroes, or drive-in theatres which have even segregated parking areas. In such cases, as in Jackson, Miss., for example, the Negro populations is able to see movies at two of the 10 regular movie houses, and at none of the five drive-ins. In Memphis, the same: out of 20 movie houses, Negroes may see movies at four, and at none of the five drive-ins. Repeat this story twelve times over, and it is apparent that Negroes in these cities have recourse only to a tiny percentage of total movie offerings.

It is easy to see why, in cases where Negroes cannot go uptown or downtown, or to a drive-in, many Negro citizens have gone for periods of a year or more without seeing any motion picture at all.

One of the few incidents on record of an attempt to desegregate a drive-in theatre occurred in Columbia, S.C., and attempt which erupted into violence. Perhaps the darkness does not, after all, assure more peaceful integration.

MUNICIPAL AUDITORIUMS

In many cities in the South, municipal auditoriums offer opera, orchestras, dance groups, as well as all-night hillbilly folk songs and wrestling. Therefore, a study of facilities available to Negroes in these auditoriums is important, since in some areas the municipal auditorium presents whatever fine arts programs exist in the city. It should be noted then, that the returns of these questionnaires showed a considerable advance in the admittance of Negroes as compared with movie theatres.

In eight of the 20 cities, municipal auditoriums are open to all, and provide no special arrangements for Negroes (no separate sections in the auditorium, or balcony, no special day of the week, or other such arrangement). These are:

Oklahoma City, Okla.; Memphis, Tenn.; Durham, N.C.; Atlanta, Ga.; Charlotte, N.C.; Jacksonville, Fla.; Miami, Fla.; and Louisville, Ky.

In the other 11 cities, arrangements vary:

Auditoriums in Columbia, S.C., Little Rock, Ark.,* Raleigh, N.C., Jackson, Miss., and Richmond, Va.* have separate balcony sections for Negroes. In Chattanooga, Tenn., Negroes sit in a separate section in the auditorium. Arrangements may vary according to the lessee in Savannah, Ga., but seating, under any circumstance, is not integrated. In Houston, Negroes sit in a separate section of the balcony, and there may be special programs for them. A respondent from Dallas, Texas, replies that there are "special arrangements, but camouflaged .... never really designated, but you are seated by the ushers." Birmingham's auditorium may be one of the most rigidly segregated: Negroes occupy separate sections in the auditorium and balcony, and, as the respondent states, "at times, a show may be shown at one hour for whites and another for Negroes."

*Respondent from Little Rock, Ark., adds: "Events sponsored by Negro groups may be held in the auditorium. Some events (Arkansas Philharmonic) are "open seating.'" In Richmond, respondent notes that arrangements may vary according to the lessee.

The cities not mentioned either do not have a municipal auditorium, or had one under construction at the time of the ~~questionnaire~~ survey. Those auditoriums which do not have "special" arrangements, i.e., those which permit seating freely chosen, have not been scenes of riots or incidents, and it seems clear that the pursuit of culture obliterates the question of color from the minds of the concert goer. Furthermore, an important point to make here is that desegregation of auditorium facilities has, for the most part, been the result of voluntary agreements and not court orders, a fact which may have been ignored by a disaster-prone press.

There is a degree of irony in the "double" concerts - one for whites, and one for Negroes, often on the same day - which have been arranged in the stronghold of the militant Deep South, i.e., Birmingham. Considering the difficulty and expense of obtaining concert or theatrical tours in the first place, it would seem that such an arrangement would require an unusually strong commitment to the cause of segregation.

On June 1, 1962, an Artists Equity Ruling - that no Equity member of 54 companies which produce live shows will be allowed to act in a play in front of a segregated audience - will take effect. This may have injurious results on touring companies, who will find it difficult to secure enough desegregated audiences to make a tour worthwhile. The southern circut for these companies has, in the past, included such major stops as Atlanta, Birmingham, and New Orleans, as well as smaller cities en route. As of June 1, 1962, the only major cities in a position to offer an Equity show to a desegregated audience will be Atlanta and Charlotte.

An Equity spokesman in Jackson, Miss., pointed out that after June, 1962, no road shows of large productions ~~could~~ can be scheduled in Jackson. A new city auditorium ~~had~~ has been proposed to overcome faulty stage and acoustical conditions in the old auditorium, and now it may not be built if no productions are scheduled for it. A Jackson impressario comments, "I have 'Music Man' slated to show in Jackson this March. But after June, 1962, I will not be able to schedule anything else in Jackson." He adds that the Equity ruling will affect New Orleans and Memphis as well, and that "the only locales we will be able to book for shows after June will be Atlanta, Ga., and Charlotte, N.C."

One local actor and Equity member in Atlanta expressed the opinion that perhaps local theatre groups in several southern cities might then be forced to strengthen their own theatres, but this is a debatable projection. At any rate, that the Equity ruling will change the face of southern theatre seems clear.

LOCAL THEATRE (INCLUDING SUMMER STOCK)

The survey cities revealed a considerable number of local, and summer, theatre groups, which offer a great variety of serious and musical productions. Some of these are amateur productions, and some staffed with talented professional actors. This is a rich field of potential for culture in the South. What is the score of these cities in the admittance of Negro citizens to view theatrical productions?*

Negroes are not admitted to these productions in six of the 20 cities surveyed. In three of those cities, there is only one local theatre group, which means that Negroes are effectively denied the privilege of seeing local drama (except for whatever drama comes to the municipal auditorium, which in the case of two of the cities is desegregated) in their own home towns. Less than half of the cities report that local productions are open to Negroes and there are no special arrangements made for them. Four reported that one or more local theatres ~~were~~ are desegregated.

*See Table "Local and Summer Theatre" in Appendix.

Thirteen of the 20 ~~had~~ have summer theatre programs, in the main outdoor. Four of these ~~did~~ do not permit Negroes to attend at all, while the others had no special arrangements for Negroes.

Except for summer tours, which sometimes include visits from Broadway touring companies (and in that case, Equity), most of the staff of these programs ~~is~~ does not belong to Equity. Therefore, it does not seem that these theatre offeringswill be significantly affected by the Equity ruling. Where summer theatre has been dependent on Equity productions some obvious changes will be made.

MUSEUMS

According to the responses received ~~from questionnaires,~~ in the survey only three of the 20 cities ~~surveyed~~ ~~did~~ do not have ~~any~~ museums - Oklahoma City, Jackson, and Savannah. Most of the museums in the other 17 cities have no special arrangements for Negroes. This suggests that Negroes may visit these institutions with the same privileges as whites. In a few places, however, there ~~were~~ are qualifications:

> A respondent from Columbia, S.C., replies that, "In the childrens' division of this museum events are unsegregated. Negro citizens may view the exhibits at any time. Special lectures, etc., for members may be limited to whites."

In Atlanta, Ga., Negroes are free to visit the Atlanta Art Institute, but there ~~were~~ are no Negro members of the Institute at the time of this writing. However, applications ~~were~~ are being considered.

Negroes are able to use the facilities of two museums in Houston, but not in the third, which is in the city park. All three are privately owned.

In Dallas, the sole museum is in the State Park, and Negroes are able to view exhibits - but it depends on the lessee. In many of the survey cities, art galleries are incorporated into whatever museum facilities are available. With the exception of Birmingham, Ala., all cities with art galleries report that there are no special arrangements for Negroes. In Birmingham, a respondent observed that Negroes cannot view exhibits at either of the two art galleries in that city.

LIBRARIES

This is, of course, a key category in any survey of cultural facilities. Negroes, or any non-white or minority people, may be deprived of movies, or plays, or exhibits in museums or art galleries, and still manage to reach questioning fingers into the world of ideas and culture if they are permitted to read freely -- without having special rules to follow or special rooms reserved.

Libraries were sources of dispute during the sit-ins, and often an outgrowth of the movements which first attacked segregated seating at lunch counters. In Danville, Va., for example, libraries closed in the summer of 1960 to avoid court-ordered integration. They then re-opened on an integrated "stand-up" basis, which continued for three months, after which all facilities were integrated. Only in June, 1961, did enrollment appear to be reaching what it was prior to the integration dispute. Protests conducted by students and local ministers also occurred in Petersburg, Virginia, Jackson, Mississippi, Baton Rouge, Louisiana, Albany, Georgia, and Greenville, South Carolina, and Memphis, Tennessee, among others. In Greenville, the library opened, segregated by sex. This kind of segregation, especially, is one of the most blatant, undemocratic, and galling to the literate and intelligent Negro Southerner.

At the same time, desegregation of library facilities during the past two years has been peaceful in what normally could be described as strongholds of segregation - i.e., in Charleston, S.C., Savannah, Ga., and Memphis, Tenn. Bookmobile facilities have been desegregated in Montgomery, Ala., and in two counties in Mississippi. An updating of a Southern Regional Council Report in August, 1961, from a 1954 survey, shows that Tennessee has more desegregated library facilities than any other southern state, but there are still at least one or two in each state.

This present survey showed that 16 of the 20 cities questioned have desegregated all of their various library branches. The holdouts: Oklahoma City, Okla., Jackson, Miss., Birmingham, Ala., and Columbia, S.C.

How large a segment of the Negro population, still used to and abiding by long-standing custom, takes advantage of the desegregation is a figure impossible to calculate, but the number of Negroes who use these facilities appears to be on the increase.

PARKS, ZOOS AND SPORTS STADIUMS

Since this survey was intended primarily to examine the field of culture and not recreation, detailed questions were not asked of these 20 cities. Some indications were felt necessary in terms of the total, cultural-recreational facilities open to Negro citizens, but only to place these opportunities within a general context. In addition, the desegregation of parks in the South has inspired furious battles - through the courts and also by means of direct action - which are impossible to enumerate in a report such as this.

However, recent important developments on this issue are worth mentioning:

As of January 1, 1962, all parks and outdoor recreational facilities - 67 playgrounds, 11 community centers, 8 swimming pools, and 4 golf courses - were closed in Birmingham, Ala. This occurred despite fierce public debate in which a significant number of "respectable" groups - the Junior Chamber of Commerce, The Businessmen's Association, and most of the city's ministers, for example, went on record in favor of keeping the parks open - and desegregated. However, the city commission, spearheaded by Mayor Art Hanes and Commissioner Eugene "Bull" Conner, remained adamant in its efforts to keep untainted a segregated way of life, even if it meant that Birmingham and environs would be without parks. Since the closing, local private associations would have made tentative approaches in order to buy unused park territory. Whether this maneuver will escape legal scrutiny remains to be seen. Just as important as the closing itself was the spirited outcry of Birmingham's citizenry, an outcry yet unstilled.

Pools, a very tender spot in the heart of the white Southerner, are closed, in certain cities, to avoid desegregation. In addition to Birmingham, Ala., pools were closed last summer in Nashville, Tenn., Savannah, Ga., and Lynchburg, Va., after wade-in attempts.

The picture is somewhat brighter on golf courses. Since last year, links have been integrated in Macon, Ga., Charleston, S.C., Knoxville and Memphis Tenn., and Daytona Beach, Fla., mainly as the result of court orders. Complete park and public recreational facilities were desegregated in Jacksonville, Fla., during the summer of 1961, although there is a suit still pending concerning the golf courses which were sold by the city to avert integration.

Our survey reports different treatment accorded to Negro visitors to municipal parks. * Of the 20 cities, only the parks of Birmingham are closed at the time of this writing. Eight of the 20 were completely or partially segregated. While the remaining 11 respondents do not mention any specific restrictions, it is not definitely established that each concession or facility operating within each park is open to Negroes.

Restrictions generally applying to parks can also be extended to zoos,* which frequently operate within the confines of a particular park, and are subject to the same regulations. In this survey, all but six of the cities surveyed have zoos. Of the remaining 14, three are segregated, though again, a particular concession of a zoo might operate under a segregated policy.

*See Table "Parks and Zoos" in Appendix.

Respondents answered that, in six cities, segregation prevailed in sports stadiums - Chattanooga, Jackson, Richmond, Atlanta, Birmingham, and Houston. Two cities, Columbia, S.C., and Oklahoma City, Okla., have no stadiums. The remaining 12 are apparently open to Negroes, though it is not definitely determined that each game or event is completely desegregated. Significant progress occurred during the summer of 1961, when the Coliseum in Jacksonville, Fla., was desegregated - with no untoward incidents (a peaceful enforcement of a law suit, which affected all parks and municipal recreational facilities).

CONCLUSIONS

Like almost everything else in the South, cultural opportunities are changing. It is a slow change, to be sure, but it is a change nevertheless. A general survey such as this, though, reveals the inadequacy of the progress, considering that the minds and knowledge and taste of human beings are involved. The survey reveals a depth of cultural deprivation and stultifying narrowness forced upon Southern Negro citizens, a debt which cries out for restitution.

TEN YEARS

A Review of the Decade following the Supreme Court

Decision of May 17, 1954

Outline

I The Brown decision in its historical context.

A. In the South the Civil War and emancipation were followed by a generation of confusion and turmoil.

B. Near the end of the Nineteenth Century Southern whites seized upon disenfranchisement and segregation of the Negroes as a "solution." Peak of segregation craze about 1910. (Erroneous legend that segregation had existed for centuries.) Segregation in a measure replaced slavery as means of keeping the Negro "in his place."

C. From the late 1920's the nation as a whole moved steadily toward condemnation of segregation.

1. Negroes made remarkable progress in spite of the handicaps imposed by segregation and discrimination.
2. The theory of biological inferiority began to be repudiated by scientists generally.
3. Negroes became increasingly conscious of the incubus of segregation and developed militant leadership determined to throw it off.
4. Extent of school desegregation outside of the South by May, 1954.

D. The 1954 decision sounded the death-knell of segregation and opened the door at last for assimilation of Negroes as full-fledged citizens.

E. The Supreme Court had dealt with the race problem in three momentous decisions:

1. Its opinion in the Dred Scott case in 1857 had said that at the time of the adoption of the Constitution Negroes were regarded as "so far inferior that they had no rights which the white man was bound to respect."

2. The Plessy decision of 1897 reflected improvement in the concept of the Negro, but upheld segregation in public transportation, provided facilities were substantially equal. Justice Harlan's dissent.
3. After Plessy, the "separate-but-equal doctrine" was widely invoked in defense of segregation in the South.
   a. But only the "separate" part was rigorously observed; facilities accorded Negroes were generally greatly inferior to those for whites.
   b. The wide gap between the level of schools for Negroes and those for whites was gradually being narrowed,-but equality of physical plant was far short of achievement by 1954.

F. In its 1954 decision the Court went beyond the question of tangible factors and ruled that "separate educational facilities are inherently unequal" and constitute a denial of "equal protection of the laws," forbidden by the Fourteenth Amendment.

II The story of the litigation.

A. Origin of each of the five cases.
   1. Clarendon, 1950.
   2. Prince Edward, 1951.

B. The opposing legal talent. Participation by Attorneys General of two administrations.

C. Salient points of the argument on each side.

D. The drama of May 17, 1954.

E. Political and geographic pattern of the Court's membership -- unanimous decision.

F. Brown v. Board of Education. General application. Significant excerpts.

G. In Bolling v. Sharpe (District of Columbia) to which the Fourteenth Amendment did not apply, a separate opinion was rendered, likewise ending segregation.

H. Re-argument scheduled on manner and timing of relief.

III Favorable reaction in nation as a whole and abroad.

A. At home.

B. Abroad.

IV Issue regarded as settled and steps taken to end school segregation in a wide area, exclusive of the former Confederate states.

A. Some integration in Delaware, Maryland, Missouri, West Virginia and the District of Columbia.
1. The District of Columbia and the city of Baltimore proceeded with general desegregation.
2. Wilmington, St. Louis and Kansas City made beginnings.

B. States where optional segregation was allowed, Arizona, Kansas, New Mexico and Wyoming, indicated full compliance, but Kansas planned a 2-year desegregation program.

C. Disorders in Washington and Baltimore and in Milford, Del.

V In the South the relatively mild first reaction was followed by steadily rising hostility.

A. Significance of sharp identification of greatest resistance with area of former Confederacy.

B. Citizens Councils and similar movements launched.

C. Early legislation to avoid compliance.

D. Southern School News begins publication.

VI Acceleration of trend to equalize public school facilities in the South.

A. Calculated first to strengthen the "separate but equal" position in the litigation. After the decision it was hoped to deter Negroes from pressing for integration and to strengthen the defense of segregation in individual cases.

B. Acceleration of the equalization trend noticeable from 1951 when the Clarendon and Prince Edward cases began to attract public attention. (S.C., Ga., N.C., Miss.)

C. Post-Brown decision equalization steps.

D. Probably a quarter-billion dollars worth of new schools for Negroes were built largely as a result of the litigation and the decision.

VII Further hearings and Supreme Court decree of May 31, 1955.

A. A new Justice Harlan (grandson) had now joined the Court.

B. Question of desegregation "forthwith" vs. "effective gradual adjustment."

C. District courts delegated to supervise desegregation with "all deliberate speed."

D. Reaction in the South to the 1955 decree itself was mild but submerged in the growing hostility to the basic decision.

E. Desegregation at Oak Ridge, Tenn.

F. Florida Supreme Court supports U.S. Supreme Court ruling.

VIII Desegregation in border states.

A. West Virginia.

B. Maryland.

C. Oklahoma.

D. Missouri.

E. Kentucky.

F. Delaware.

G. Exemplary desegregation performance of Louisville and St. Louis.

(We give a rounded story here of desegregation in the border states, which are of secondary concern to us hereafter. Our attention will be focussed on the grave problem in the 11 former Confederate states.)

IX The crystallization of resistance in the former Confederate South.

A. Public expression.
1. Deterioration of interracial relations.
2. Upsurge of state rights and anti-Supreme Court sentiment.
3. First outbreaks of violence.

B. Political expression.
1. Attitude of Southern Senators, Congressmen and governors.
2. Protest on intellectual plane -- Byrnes, Eloch, Workman, etc.
3. Reckless voices of defiance.
4. Action of state legislatures.
5. Virginia's Gray Commission.
6. The Southern Manifesto.

C. Interposition.
1. Revived in Virginia.
2. Embraced by 9 states.

X The problem of enforcement of an unpopular ruling.

A. Inaction by Congress and federal executive. Proposals for Congressional action -- Collins, etc.

B. Ignored or defied by state and local authorities.

C. The NAACP becomes in effect the activating agent of a social revolution.
1. History of the NAACP.
2. Thurgood Marshall, Roy Wilkins, etc.
3. The NAACP role in Brown.
4. The NAACP in border states.
5. Early NAACP-filed suits in the former Confederate South.

D. Courage and loyalty of Southern federal judges in implementing Supreme Court ruling -- exceptions.

XI Rise of anti-Negro feeling.

A. Terms, "Southerners," "everybody," "my people," etc. excluded Negroes.

B. Necessary severing of master-servant relations before establishing relationship on basis of equal citizenship.

C. The swift contagion of race prejudice.

XII Resuscitation of Ku Klux Klan.

A. Brief history of KKK.

B. Limited range of revived organization.

XIII Spread of Citizens Council and related movements.

A. Brady, Simmons, etc.

B. "Black Monday."

C. Political power of Citizens Councils.
1. Commendation or endorsement by state legislatures.
2. In Mississippi a government within a government.

XIV Unbridled rampage of hostile leadership.

A. Fanatic agitators: Bryant Bowles, Asa Carter, John Kasper, etc. (Jail careers of these three.)

B. Language of politicians encourages violence in defiance of desegregation ruling.

XV Intimidation of Negroes.

A. Economic pressure.

B. Threats, cross-burnings and violence.

C. Hatred and harassment of NAACP. Cook's "The Ugly Truth about the NAACP."

XVI Montgomery bus boycott and emergence of a towering new Negro leader.
1. The boycott story.
2. Martin Luther King.

XVII The Orangeburg "economic war."

A. Reprisal for Negro integration effort.

B. Negroes retaliate.

C. Economic truce, but no integration.

XVIII Attitude of the press.

A. A few papers consistently liberal.

B. Others hostile to bitter end.

C. Many reflected tides of public opinion, finally counseling acceptance of the inevitable.

XIX Attitude of the clergy.

A. Support of desegregation by highest authorities of each denomination.

B. Silence or collaboration with segregationists by many local pastors.

C. Courage and tribulations of pastors who preached acceptance of desegregation.

D. Archbishop Rummel.

XX The failure of moderate leadership.

A. Complete ascendancy of segregationist element.

B. Premium on chicanery and appeal to race prejudice in public affairs.

C. Political survival, the moral problem. Many politicians reluctantly join the racist chorus, or remain silent, in order to win elections.

D. Relative moderation of Governors Folsom and Coleman.

E. Outstanding moderates.
1. Gov. Collins.
2. Gov. Hodges.
3. Mayor Hartsfield.
4. Others.

F. Outspoken liberals.
1. State Rep. Orr (Fla.)
2. State Sen. Haddock (Va.)
3. Others.

G. The silence of business leaders -- exceptions.

H. Organizations working for desegregation.

XXI Nature of the debate, the argument of segregationists.

A. Repetition of arguments presented to the Supreme Court.

B. Resolution of State Supreme Court justices.

C. Theory that Brown came too soon, that South would have desegregated in time on its own initiative.

D. That backwardness of Negroes would lower level of public education.

E. That racial incompatibility and friction would prevent efficient school operation.

F. Widespread interpretation of Brown as demanding "integration everywhere overnight."

G. Predictions of mass rebellion and bloodshed.

H. Racism.
1. Distortion of anthropology, theology and history.
2. High incidence of crime and disease among Negroes.

I. State rights.

J. Invocation of Confederate loyalties.

K. Identification of liberalism on race issue with Communism.

L. Eagerness to cite instances of race discrimination in the North.

M. Official state propaganda agencies.

XXII Complacency of President Eisenhower, silence in the face of turmoil, uncertainty as to his attitude toward Supreme Court decision.

XXIII Stifling of liberal thought and expression.

A. Informal intimidation.

B. Official pressure.

C. Reversal of values -- odium attached to tolerance, compassion and respect for law of the land. "Moderate," a "dirty word."

D. Organizations working for adjustment to decision harassed and prosecuted.

E. Liberal and moderate literature prescribed -- "The Rabbit's Wedding."

XXIV Davis Committee Hearings and Washington public schools.

A. Irregularity of proceedings.
1. Bias of Southerners dominating the subcommittee and obvious intention to elicit unfavorable evidence.
2. Condemnation of proceedings by Washington press.

B. Excellent adjustment which really took place in Washington public schools, as verified by unofficial investigations.

C. Widespread, sedulous and effective use of Davis Committee report to discourage desegregation in the South.

XXV Rebellious and explosive atmosphere of 1956-1957.

A. Tuscaloosa.

B. Clinton.

C. Sturgis and Clay.

D. Other turmoil.

E. Desegregation reaches near standstill. (May, 1957, law halts Texas desegregation.)

F. "The Deep South Says NEVER."

G. Apprehension and uncertainty: Should Southern schools be desegregated by force? Would South ever accept desegregation without bloody upheaval?

XXVI The Little Rock crisis of 1957.

A. The moderate school board plan.

B. Agitation of outsiders.

C. Orval Faubus.

D. Previous use of state troops: Clinton, Tenn.; Clay and Sturgis, Ky.; Mansfield, Texas.

E. The drama.

F. Reaction in nation and around the world.

G. Southern indignation -- political effects.

H. Realization that federal power must prevail.

XXVII Pupil Placement laws.

A. In 8 states.

B. Held valid conditionally in Shuttlesworth v. Birmingham Board of Education (1958).

XXVIII Little Rock in 1958.

A. Plea for postponement denied.

B. Four high schools close.

C. Circuit Court of Appeals rules that a federal court order must not yield to "violent and unlawful acts of individual citizens."

D. Cooper v. Aaron. Supreme Court upholds lower court and outlaws "evasive schemes."

E. Resort to private schools.

XXIX Virginia's massive resistance.

A. Its totalitarian principle called for solidarity in the South and solidarity in each state. Action by any locality to desegregate was regarded as betrayal.

B. Influence of Virginia's example on other Southern states.

C. Virginia's performance mitigated by reliance on so-called "legal means" and respect for law and order.

D. Virginia closed 9 schools under desegregation orders, locking out 12,700 pupils (1958).

XXX Collapse of Virginia's massive resistance (1959).

A. Dramatic climax.

B. Virginia begins orderly desegregation, and soon will desegregate more school districts than any other Southern state except Texas.

XXXX Distinctive characteristics of state attitudes.

A. Virginia and North Carolina.

1. Traditional rivalry and divergent policies of two states.
2. Virginia's extreme defiance; North Carolina's
3. moderate policy of minimal adjustment.
3. North Carolina's early desegregation moves stop at the point of meager token, while Virginia proceeds with extensive desegregation after collapse of massive resistance.

B. Louisiana and South Carolina.
1. Extremes of turmoil on the one hand and comparative silence on the other.
2. In Louisiana, constant integrationist pressure and fanatic resistance with some integration.
3. In South Carolina, with restraint on both sides and sedulous avoidance of the issue, public schools remained completely segregated.

C. Tennessee has moderate governors from beginning. Despite sensational violence in early stages, desegregation proceeds with relative speed.

D. Texas: Segregationist governors and legislature yield to public moderation in West Texas and federal court pressure in other sections.

E. Georgia: Defiant state administrations and rural element vs. liberalism in Atlanta.

F. Florida, steered clear of extremist policy by Gov. Collins, moves toward desegregation, beginning in relatively liberal southern portion.

G. Alabama and Mississippi: Relatively moderate governors succeeded by intransigent segregationists. Two most stubborn and recklessly resistant states.

XXXXI In 1961 and 1962 token integration moved into substantial desegregation in some localities of Florida, North Carolina, Tennessee and Virginia.

C. Richmond.

D. Elsewhere.

XXXXVIII Trend toward acceptance of inevitable.

A. Civil War Centennial let off steam of latter-day Confederates.

B. Manifest failure of all devices of resistance or evasion: interposition, armed force, school-closing.

C. Gallup polls show sharp increase in percentage of Southerners who accept desegregation as inevitable.

D. Softening of editorial protest, hedging by politicians, weariness and frustration on the part of many champions of segregation.

E. Politicians turn to other issues.

1. Race issue ceases to dominate political campaigns in Virginia, N.C., S.C., Tennessee, and Texas.
2. Candidates for governor of Tennessee appeal frankly to Negro voters.
3. Segregation not discussed at 1961 Conference of Southern Governors.

F. State legislatures recover from racist obsession.
1. Exceptions.
2. Concerted effort to prevent discussion of race issue in some legislatures.

Whites in another Virginia county resorted to private schools to escape public school integration in September 1963. In Little Surry County, where Negroes represent approximately 65 per cent of the total population of 6,200, the school board decided not to open the one white school when the state Pupil Placement Board assigned seven Negro children to it. Private classes were arranged for 431 white pupils, with their 22 former public school teachers. They used two former public school buildings which had been declared surplus two years earlier and two churches. Tuition grants from public funds covered most of the expense, but each pupil was required to pay a fee of $125 above the amount of the grant. The two public schools for the county's 1,200 Negro pupils continued to operate as usual.

During the 1963-1964 school term a total of approximately 26,000 Negro children attended school with whites in the South. In the border states the residential pattern or Negro apathy, and a few pockets of stubborn white resistance, had resulted in the survival of many segregated schools; but in these states and the District of Columbia 724, or 93 per cent of the biracial districts were now desegregated and more than half the Negro pupils were now attending classes with white children. The number of school districts initiating desegregation in the fall of 1963 in each of twelve states was: Alabama, 4; Arkansas, 1; Florida, 6; Georgia, 3; Kentucky, 20; Louisiana, 1; Maryland, 1; North Carolina, 22; South Carolina, 1; Tennessee, 15; Texas, 66; and Virginia, 23. One hundred and sixty-three school districts had been desegregated for the first time, three and a half times the number initiating desegregation in 1962.

In 143 districts the action was taken voluntarily; only twenty districts moved in response to court orders. The threat of ultimate compulsion was always present, but in the ten-year period since the Brown decision an estimated 984 school districts had been desegregated without waiting for specific federal court action. School boards had proceeded under court orders in only 167 districts. The region has 3,053 districts in which both whites and Negroes attend school.

Elsewhere in the South some of the cities in which earlier evidence of public hostility had aroused the greatest apprehensions -- such as Charleston, Savannah and Jacksonville -- accomplished the feat of enrolling Negroes in previously all-white schools without incident. Only in Alabama was serious trouble encountered.

TEN YEARS OF Brown

Chapter 1

The decision which the Supreme Court handed down on May 17, 1954, outlawing segregation by race in public schools, was one of the very great milestones in the history of the United States. For our Negro minority, still residing preponderantly in that southeastern region which we call "the South," it was a pronouncement second in importance only to the Emancipation Proclamation, by which President Lincoln abolished slavery. In the evolution of the Great Republic it may well be remembered as "the point at which the South cleared the last turning in the road to reunion...."[1] But first in the area which unforgettably was once the Confederate States of America it inaugurated a period of painful awakening, of impulsive resistance, and of tension and hysteria to the point in some instances of violent confulsion.

The race problem -- or the problem arising from the presence of Negroes, in the proportion earlier of as much as one-fifth, and now about one-tenth, of the country's population -- has been for a century and a quarter the most disruptive domestic problem with which our statesmen and our people have had to deal. It fired the controversy which tore the nation asunder from 1861 to 1865. In the defeated South after the Civil War it dominated a generation of confusion and unrest. In that prostrate region three million illiterate Negroes had been suddenly separated both from the slaveholder's dominion and from his provisinn for their daily bread, and had been thrust incongruously even into the political arena. As the Nineteenth Century drew to a close and the Twentieth Century began, an unwholesome stability was achieved by depriving nearly all Negroes, through ingenious devices, of the franchise -- and by separating the race from the mainstream of community life. The latter process and the regime which it established were called segregation.

It is appropriate to note here a common error with respect to the supposed longevity of this system of separation of the races. Segregation so completely permeated Southern life in sixty years that many came to look upon it as an "institution" which had existed from time immemorial. When it came under attack, not a few even among publicists and politicians of stature referred to segregation as a part of "the mores of three hundred years." The historian C. Vann Woodward brought the facts of the matter to the attention of an often surprised public in 1955 in his "Strange Career of Jim Crow," but even at this date it is widely true that "the national discussion over the question of how deeply rooted, how ineradicable and how amenable to change the segregation practices really are is being conducted against a background of faulty or inadequate historical information."

General segregation began only in the late Nineteenth Century. Subservience and subjection of the Negro to the white man were indeed centuries old, but not separation. Slavery was a very different relationship, and during an interval of more than thirty years after the Civil War neither slavery nor segregation, in a general sense, existed. It is true that the few and inadequate public schools in the South were usually segregated. The meager facilities provided for the newly-freed Negroes of all ages who were eager for book-learning were almost always separate from the schools for whites. The Freedmen's Bureau was concerned solely with helping Negroes, and the more than 4,000 schools set up by it were, of course, for Negroes only. But segregation as the mold for a dual society and as the popular and long-sought "solution" of the race problem was invented later.

It was in the 1890's that the segregation movement was born; it was near the end of the first decade of the twentieth century when its peak was reached. By then segregation had been extended, whether by law or by custom, to include hotels, restaurants, saloons, rest rooms, drinking fountains, libraries, churches, parks, hospitals, orphanages, prisons, asylums, all places of public assembly, all means of public transportation, nearly all fields of industrial employment, and ultimately funeral homes, morgues and cemeteries. Because the resources of the Negroes themselves and the facilities and opportunities left open to them were meager, segregation generally meant in effect exclusion. The schools provided for Negroes were still few and rudimentary in their offering; employment above the level of menial or unskilled labor was almost closed to them. Thus segregation came in a large measure to replace slavery as a means of keeping the Negro "in his place," -- which meant a subservient place in the life and economy of the South.

In a wave of racism at the turn of the century, (which was not confined to the South), segregation proceeded with general acquiescence; it was indeed accepted by the foremost Negro leader in the hope of securing by this accommodation the economic and educational opportunities of which his race stood in dire need. The Negro was again submerged. In the words of Harry S. Ashmore "the Southern Negro lapsed into the long twilight period which would continue until the New Deal years...."[2] An incipient voice of Negro protest rose, scarcely audible at first, and an interracial organization founded in 1909, known as the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, though ineffectual for a decade or more, was to become by mid-century a powerful influence in national affairs. In the meantime a number of factors operated to increase respect for the Negro and to bring segregation into disfavor in the nation as a whole. Though still vastly inferior to the educational facilities for white youth, schools and colleges for Negroes had multiplied and improved, and despite the disadvantages under which he labored, the Negro had made significant progress. An increasing number of distinguished Negro intellectuals began to stand out in refutation of the theory of innate Negro incompetence. In the late 1920's the production of racist literature, which had flourished since the turn of the century, almost suddenly subsided, and the theory of biological racial inferiority began to be repudiated by scholars generally. Under a liberal national Administration in the 1930's, "quite abruptly and unaccountably -- or so it seemed to many Southern white people -- an avalanche of denunciation, criticism and opprobrium descended upon the South from above the Mason and Dixon Line."[3] By the middle of the Twentieth Century segregation, though still tenaciously defended in the South, was frowned upon in most of the nation. Compulsory school segregation had been abolished in all but the seventeen Southern and border states, Kansas and a few scattered localities in three western states. Segregation in the Armed Forces had been ended by an order issued in 1948. The Negro vote had become a factor in national politics. The now more enlightened Negro masses were becoming acutely conscious of the incubus of segregation and Negro leaders were urging a militant stand against it in all of its forms. A presidential Committee on Civil Rights had reported in 1947:

> The separate-but-equal doctrine has failed in three important respects. First, it is inconsistent with the fundamental equalitarianism of the American way of life in that it marks groups with the brand of inferior status. Secondly, where it has been followed, the results have been separate but unequal facilities for minority peoples. Finally, it has kept people apart despite incontroversible evidence that an environment favorable to civil rights is fostered whenever groups are permitted to live and work together. There is no adequate defense of segregation.

It was at this stage in history that the Supreme Court confronted directly the question: Is segregation in public schools compatible with the ideals of democracy expressed in the Constitution of the United States? The Court answered with an unequivocal "No." The cases before it involved only public education, but the principle which it laid down in this pervasive and sensitive sphere would extend in time to a variety of public services and accommodations. The decision accomplished no immediate and sweeping transformation; indeed, the edict to end segregation was not to be obeyed in all sections of the South for many years to come, even in the field of public education. Nevertheless, the great decision of May 17, 1954, sounded the death knell of segregation and opened the door at last for the assimilation of Negroes as full-fledged citizens of the Republic.

The Court ruled specifically that segregation in public schools violates this commandment of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution: "...No state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privilege or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

It found that "separate educational facilities are inherently unequal" and hence deny to the minority race the "equal protection of the laws."

The Supreme Court had dealt with the race problem before. This 1954 pronouncement was one of three historic decisions, each of which was a milestone -- or at least a highway marker. In the advance toward enlightened interracial behavior the Dred Scott decision may be said to have pointed to the place from which our journey began. This decision was handed down in 1857 -- before the Fourteenth Amendment, which was adopted in 1868, and before Emancipation. It was savagely assailed in the anti-slavery North. It held that slaves were property, and that Congress could not set geographic limits to slavery. Looking back to the 1780's, when the Constitution was adopted, the opinion gave this account of the attitude toward Negroes prevailing at that time:

> They had for more than a century before been regarded as beings of an inferior order and altogether unfit to associate with the white race, either in social or political relations; and so far inferior that they had no rights which the white man was bound to respect; and that the Negro might justly and lawfully be reduced to slavery for his benefit....

The United states had come a long way from that concept by 1896 and, not slavery, but only the device of segregation was at issue when the Supreme Court delivered its decision in the case of Plessy v. Ferguson. Still the Court said: "Legislation is powerless to eradicate racial instincts or to abolish distinctions based upon physical differences.... If one race be inferior to the other socially, the Constitution of the United States cannot put them on the same plane." It sustained a Louisiana statute providing separate accommodations for white and colored persons in railway trains, provided the accommodations were physically equal. Thus it proclaimed what became known as the "separate-but-equal doctrine." Though the case involved directly only transportation facilities, the Court appeared to give incidental sanction to the separate-but-equal principle in education when it observed:

> Laws permitting, and even requiring (separation of the races) in places where they are liable to be brought into contact do not necessarily imply the inferiority of either race to the other, and have been generally, if not universally, recognized as within the competency of the state legislatures in the exercise of their police power. The most common instance of this is connected with the establishment of separate schools for white and colored children, which has been held a valid exercise of the legislative power even by the courts of states where the political rights of the colored race have been the ~~largest~~ longest and most earnestly enforced.

Seven justices concurred in this 1896 decision; one eloquently dissented. Mr. Justice John Marshall Harlan, a Southerner from Kentucky, with a clairvoyance which was to be vindicated by a unanimous Court in 1954, declared:

> In the view of the Constitution, in the eye of the law, there is in this country no superior, dominant, ruling class of citizens. There is no caste system here. Our Constitution is color-blind, and neither knows nor tolerates classes among its citizens.... In my opinion, the judgment this day rendered will, in time, prove to be as pernicious as the decision by this tribunal in the Dred Scott case.... What can more certainly arouse race hate, what more certainly create and perpetuate a feeling of distrust between these races than state enactments which in fact proceed on the ground that colored citizens are so inferior and degraded that they cannot be allowed to sit in public coaches occupied by white citizens...?
>
> We boast of the freedom enjoyed by our people above all other peoples. But it is difficult to reconcile that boast with a state of the law which, practically, puts the brand of servitude and degradation upon a large class of our fellow-citizens, our equals before the law. The thin disguise of "equal" accommodations for passengers in railroad coaches will not mislead anyone, nor atone for the wrong this day done....

Chapter 2

The separate-but-equal doctrine was eagerly embraced as a basis for Negro-white relationship; separate but equal provision for the two races became the declared policy of every Southern state. But the emphasis was entirely on "separate;" the history of the separate-but-equal doctrine is one of grotesque disregard of the "equal" end of the phrase.

The ideal of equal educational opportunity was a goal to be considered only after the needs of white children might have been met. The needs of Negroes were so neglected in the South during the next three decades that construction of Negro grade schools became a salient object of philanthropy. Several Northern foundations, notably the Julian Rosenwald Fund, contributed generously to this cause. At the completion of a Negro school in Elizabeth City County, Virginia, in 1930, the building of the 5,000th "Rosenwald school" was celebrated.[1] As late as 1933 more than 200 Southern counties with Negro populations of 12.5 per cent or more had no Negro high schools at all. After 1940 the South redoubled its efforts in the whole field of public education, and Negro children were given a larger share of the total outlay than ever before. By 1954 Negro school facilities had been brought close to the level of those for whites in several Southern states; but in others they were grossly inferior, and equality of educational opportunity was still far short of being achieved in the South as a whole.[2]

Many have speculated that had the "equal" requirement of the separate-but-equal doctrine been adhered to in good faith the question of segregation might not have come before the Supreme Court, at least not for many more years. It is indeed possible that if the Negroes had enjoyed the vastly better facilities and services which were needed to make their schools equal in those respects to schools for whites they would have been prepared to accept segregation for a longer period without complaint. On the other hand the more rapid cultural progress which such advantages would have made possible might have made the humiliation of segregation more poignantly felt. The question is academic now; but even before the 1954 decision was handed down, Southern leaders were seized with an impulse to hasten the expansion and improvement of Negro school facilities—in the hope, on the one hand, of presenting a stronger case to federal courts and, on the other, of dispelling the Negro urge for integration.

Lawyers of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People had prosecuted successful suits for equalization of school plant and teacher salaries in the South within the framework of segregation. The marked improvement in public schools for Negroes which followed World War II was due in large part to NAACP prodding. In 1950 the Association resolved to launch a broad attack in the federal courts upon segregation. Its general counsel Thurgood Marshall convened a series of conferences of lawyers who began to lay the groundwork for Supreme Court appeals. Aided by sociologists, psychologists and educators, both white and Negro, they prepared arguments based on the inequality of separateness itself. Langston Hughes, a noted Negro lawyer high in NAACP councils, relates:

> It was unreasonable and unjust, they maintained, to expect Negro children to wait twenty, thirty or forty years for the Jim Crow (segregated) school to wither away. For it was not just the physical inadequacies and curriculum deficiencies of most Negro schools in the South that were in question. Marshall argued that the very fact of segregation itself caused undeniable personality damage and serious injury to the human personality subjected to such inequalities.[3]

To bring the issue before the Supreme Court a suit, or suits, were needed to be filed in lower courts, seeking the admission of individual Negro children on a non-segregated basis to public schools of specific communities where segregation was required. These suits would ultimately reach the high tribunal on appeal as "class actions," and a decision by the Supreme Court that denial of such admission was in violation of the Constitution would make segregation unlawful everywhere. Situations which could give rise to suits ~~would~~ were not be long in presenting themselves.

One of them was already developing in Clarendon County, South Carolina. Clarendon's Negro schools were inadequate and greatly inferior to its schools for white children. Negro parents of children attending the overcrowded Negro high school in the town of Summerton, had begun to meet and discuss their grievances in 1949. When a committee waited upon the local school board and got no satisfaction, an NAACP lawyer prepared a formal petition, which 107 parents and children signed, and filed it with the school board. Nothing came of this. In 1950 NAACP lawyers, now prepared to challenge segregation itself, filed suit in the federal district court at Charleston to end segregation in the public schools of the Summerton school district of Clarendon County.

While this case was pending in the district court, Negro dissatisfaction with inferior school facilities in a Virginia county was expressed in a more spectacular fashion. On April 23, 1951, the students of Prince Edward County's inadequate Negro high school, 450 in number, went on strike. The Negro Parent-Teacher Association meeting two days later voted to support the students' efforts to obtain a new high school. But a NAACP attorney, addressing the meeting, pointed out that discrimination was not merely a matter of brick and mortar and announced that the NAACP was now seeking to end segregation itself. A team of NAACP lawyers took charge of the case and a petition was filed with the school board, requesting that it cease making distinction on the basis of race in considering applications for admission to the public schools. The striking students returned to their school, and the school board rejected the petition. On May 23, 1951, a similar petition was filed with the federal district court.

Three-judge federal district courts ruled similarly in the South Carolina and Virginia cases. (Three-judge courts are required when the constitutionality of state laws is in question.) The defendant school authorities were ordered to proceed without delay to equalize school facilities for white and Negro children, and the construction of the new schools was in fact undertaken promptly in both communities. But segregation was upheld, and this issue was taken on appeal to the Supreme Court.

Those were the two cases that came to the Supreme Court from states of the onetime Southern Confederacy. They involved two of the communities in the South where racial segregation would be most difficult to bring to an end. The disparity between the school facilities for whites and those for Negroes was conspicuous in both counties, and Negroes comprised an exceptionally large proportion of the population of each: in Prince Edward Negroes were 45 per cent of the total, in Clarendon, over 70 per cent. The South Carolina case was additionally notable because of the action of J. Waties Waring, one of the panel of three federal district judges. Judge Waring, a native South Carolinian, who had already made himself a controversial figure in that state by his liberal attitude with respect to the rights of Negroes, dissented from the district court ruling that segregation was constitutional. He became the target of intense local abuse, his life was threatened, and his wife slandered. Shortly thereafter he retired from the bench and moved to New York.

A striking contrast was presented by another community -- this in a non-Southern, mid-western state -- from which another appeal testing the constitutionality of segregation was on its way to the Supreme Court. In Topeka, Kansas, the Negro plaintiffs conceded that school facilities and services provided for the two races were substantially equal; they challenged only the principle of segregation, which was still practiced in the first six grades of the public schools. Segregation was not popular in Kansas. The state attorney general in undertaking to defend an 1867 Kansas statute leaving the question to local governmental units, had said: "We want it understood that we are not defending segregation;" and the Topeka board of education had permitted its attorney to help prepare the brief only on conditions that "the only issue to be argued will be the constitutionality of the Kansas law and not the moral rightness of segregation."[5] The NAACP brought in a battery of social scientists who testified that segregation imposed serious social and psychological handicaps upon the Negro children. The three-judge federal court considered itself bound by Supreme Court precedent and upheld segregation; but it made this significant observation:

> Segregation of white and colored children in public schools has a detrimental effect upon the colored children. The impact is greater when it has the sanction of the law; for the policy of separating the races is usually interpreted as denoting the inferiority of the Negro group. A sense of inferiority affects the motivation of a child to learn. Segregation with the sanction of law, therefore, has a tendency to retard the educational and mental development of Negro children and to deprive them of some of the benefits they would receive in a racial (ly) integrated school system.

The Supreme Court was to regard this finding "well stated," and embody it by quotation in its own opinion.

In a case from Wilmington, Delaware, where unequal school facilities were complained of, appeal was taken to the U.S. Supreme Cout from a decision of the Delaware Supreme Court, which was in favor of the Negro plaintiffs. The Delaware tribunal, while explicitly refraining from dealing with the question of segregation as such, had ordered Negro children admitted to white schools until such time as the Negro schools might be brought up to parity with those for white children. This case went to the Supreme Court by appeal on the part of the school authorities, who protested that the Delaware courts had not allowed a reasonable time for making the adjustment.

Each of the four cases described above raised the issue of public school segregation in relation to the prohibitions applicable to the states under the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution. The four were heard and dealt with collectively. By long custom the name of the first in the list of plaintiffs in the first of the cases to reach the Supreme Court is given to the whole action. The name of Oliver Brown, who sought to have his eight-year-old daughter, Linda Carol Brown, admitted to a white school near her home, was by alphabetization, the first in the list of plaintiffs in the Topeka suit, and this was case No. 1 on the Supreme Court docket. The four cases were labeled Oliver Brown et al v. Board of Education of Topeka, and referred to informally as merely Brown. Thus the most important judicial decision of the century was to be known for all time as the Brown decision.

A fifth school segregation case before the Supreme Court, that of Bolling v. Sharpe. This case, which came from the District of Columbia was contested under the Fifth rather than the Fourteenth Amendment, since this school system operated under no state, but directly under the federal government. This case was to be heard at the same time, but it received a separate ruling ending public school segregation.

The five cases were argued before the Supreme Court in December, 1952, and reargued one year later; the Court wanted the utmost deliberation to be given. A change of national Administrations occurred between the 1952 and 1953 hearings, and, because of the death of Chief Justice Fred M. Vinson, a change also in the highest judicial office. Earl Warren, governor of California, was appointed Chief Justice by President Eisenhower in time to preside over the 1953 reargument. The Court, which was to act unanimously, was strikingly representative of the nation. The Chief Justice, who would write the opinion, was a Republican; the associate justices, excepting Justice Harold Burton, of Ohio, a Republican friend whom Truman had appointed, were all from the Democratic Party. Three were from states requiring public school segregation: Justice Stanley Reed from Kentucky; Justice Tom Clark from Texas and Justice Hugo Black, a liberal from Alabama, in the Deep South. All the legal talent on both sides was of the highest order. Thurgood Marshall, heading a group of able Negro attorneys for the plaintiffs, proved himself a tough and brilliant lawyer. John W. Davis, a former ambassador to Great Britain and ~~Democratic~~ nominee of the Democratic Party ~~for President of the United States~~ in 1924, headed the group of state attorneys and lawyers defending segregation.

Both Democratic and Republican Administrations entered the case on behalf of the plaintiffs. First, President Truman's attorney general, James P. McGranery, and, later, President Eisenhower's attorney general, Herbert Brownell, Jr., supported the argument that public school segregation should be declared unconstitutional. Attorney General McGranery introduced testimony also of the secretary of state, Dean Acheson, who wrote:

> As might be expected, Soviet spokesmen regularly exploit (racial discrimination) in propaganda against the United States, both within the United Nations and through radio broadcasts and the press, which reaches all corners of the world.... The segregation of school children on a racial basis is one of the practices in the United States which has been singled out for hostile foreign comment in the United Nations and elsewhere. Other peoples cannot understand how such a practice can exist in a country which professes to be a staunch supporter of freedom, justice and democracy. The sincerity of the United States in this respect will be judged by its deeds as well as by its words.

The NAACP lawyers now carried their well-rehearsed argument on the inequality of separateness to the highest tribunal. Psychologists and sociologists testified voluminously that available scientific evidence indicates no innate racial differences in intelligence, that segregation blocks communication and increases interracial tension, and that segregation has detrimental personality effects upon Negro children and impairs their ability to profit from available facilities of public education.

The Court was to refer in a footnote to its decision to a number of sociological texts, adding: "And see generally Myrdal, An American Dilemma." Critics would make much later of the Court's apparent reliance upon sociologists, and the distinguished Swedish authority would be widely execrated in the South as a suspicious alien and probably a Communist. However, the extent to which the findings of sociologists were necessary to the disposition of the cases has been the subject of some debate among scholars. Professor Edmund Cahn holds that the decision turned on the "common sense" of the justices.

> So one speaks in terms of the most familiar and universally accepted standards of right and wrong when one remarks (1) that racial segregation under government auspices inevitably inflicts humilitation, and (2) that official humiliation of innocent, law-abiding citizens is psychologically injurious and morally evil. Mr. Justice Harlan and many other Americans with responsive consciences recognized these simple elementary propositions before, during, and after the rise of "separate but equal." For at least twenty years hardly any cultivated person has questioned that segregation is cruel to Negro school children. The cruelty is obvious and evident. Fortunately, it is so very obvious that the Justices of the Supreme Court could see it and act on it even after reading the labored attempts by plaintiffs' experts to demonstrate it "scientifically." [6]

Fifty eight years after Plessy, counsel for the defense argued that Virginia and South Carolina were at last on the way to fulfilling both ends of the separate-but-equal doctrine. Virginia's Attorney General Almond said: "It is our policy and our determination - and our people are enthusiastically in support of it - to equalize school facilities." [7] They warned that the elimination of segregation would destroy public school systems. Public schools, it was contended, involving minors present in school under state compulsion, were a different matter from institutions of higher learning, a field in which the Supreme Court had already in several recent cases rejected racial segregation. The wishes of parents had to be considered if schools were to enjoy the necessary public support. Colgate W. Darden, a former governor of Virginia, and then-president of the University of Virginia, testified that in his opinion the people would not support integrated education.

I much appreciate your sending the situation with the N.Y. Catholic Interracial Council.

The Court invited the views of the litigants on the question of whether or not the Congress which submitted the Fourteenth Amendment and the state legislatures and conventions which approved it understood that it would abolish segregation in education. Counsel for the plaintiffs said the Fourteenth Amendment did clearly intend to abolish segregation in public schools; counsel for the defense argued eloquently that the amendment bore no such intent. The brief submitted on behalf of the United States Attorney General found the evidence inconclusive with reference to schools, but held that the primary purpose of the Amendment was to secure for Negroes full and complete equality before the law and to abolish all legal distinctions based on race or color.

The Court also raised the question of whether Congress or the Supreme Court had the power under the Amendment to move against public school segregation today. The plaintiffs contended that the Court does have such power, and the briefs submitted by two United States attorneys general concurred. The defendants insisted that the state legislatures are the proper bodies to determine the racial pattern of education; they said the Court had recognized this since the Plessy decision of 1896.

Beyond these basic arguments, the Court queried the attorneys on the question of whether, in the event, desegregation should be ordered, a gradual transition ought to be permitted, and, if so, in what manner. Gradualism appealed to none of the litigants. Attorneys for the plaintiffs said they had examined "all of the plans for gradual adjustment which we could find" and concluded that "none would be effective." John W. Davis said, "....we find nothing here on which the Court could formulate a decree, nor do we think the Court below has any power to formulate a decree, reciting in what manner these schools are to be altered at all, and what course South Carolina shall take concerning it." 8

It was nearly a year and a half after the first arguments were heard when the opinion was finally delivered. No decision in generations had been so long pondered by the Court and so anxiously awaited by so many people.

Ten years ago today, as this book makes its appearance, on May 17, 1954, at the stroke of noon, the nine justices of the Supreme Court filed gravely into the courtroom. The audience rose, the Court crier intoned: "The Honorable Chief Justice and Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States. May God save the United States and this Honorable Court!" Opening formalities and the disposition of minor cases consumed nearly an hour. A brief pause ensued, then the Defense counsel pointed to school equalization programs under way, and insisted that the elimination of segregation would destroy public school systems. Public schools, it was contended, involving minors present in school under state compulsion, were a different matter from institutions of higher learning, a field in which the Supreme Court had already in several recent cases rejected racial segregation. The wishes of parents had to be considered if schools were to enjoy the necessary public support. Colgate W. Ten years ago today, as this book makes its appearance, on May 17, 1954, at the stroke of noon, the nine justices of the Supreme Court filed gravely into the courtroom. The audience rose, the Court crier intoned: "The Honorable Chief Justice and Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States. May God save the United States and this Honorable Court!" Opening formalities and the disposition of minor cases consumed nearly an hour. A brief pause ensued, then

Chief Justice read the great decision. His voice and words were calm and deliberate. It was not a long document, and not as majestically worded as might have befitted its place in history.

The Court reviewed briefly the history of the Fourteenth Amendment, which it found "inconclusive... with respect to segregated schools," and it reviewed the vast developments of public education since the Amendment's adoption:

"In approaching this problem," the opinion said, "we cannot turn the clock back to 1868 when the Amendment was adopted, or even to 1896 when Plessy v. Ferguson was written. We must consider public education in the light of its full development and its present place in American life throughout the Nation. Only in this way can it be determined if segregation in public schools deprives these plaintiffs of the equal protection of the laws."

. . . .

"Does segregation of children in public schools solely on the basis of race, even though the physical facilities and other 'tangible' factors may be equal, deprive the children of the minority group of equal opportunities? We believe that it does."

The Court recalled that the Plessy decision involved "not education but transportation" and noted that its validity as a precedent in public education had already been questioned by the Court in decisions rejecting segregation in universities. Now the Court defined a new precedent -- and marked the end of an era:

"...We conclude that in the field of public education the doctrine of 'separate but equal' has no place. Separate educational facilities are inherently unequal. Therefore, we hold that the plaintiffs and others similarly situated for whom the actions have been brought are, by reason of the segregation complained of, deprived of the equal protection of the laws guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment."

In a second opinion, dealing with the District of Columbia case, the Court said, "...it would be unthinkable that the same Constitution would impose a lesser duty on the federal government." It found that "racial segregation in the District of Columbia is a denial of the due process of law guaranteed by the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution."

The Court did not at this time issue the decree putting its rulings into effect, but scheduled further argument on the mechanics of effecting transition to integrated schools.

Chapter 3

The encyclopedic New York Times rushed to completion a feat rare in the annals of journalism. It produced on the very next morning, a 60-page paper with seven broad pages of information related to the great decision. Research had been done earlier in the expectation that the ruling would be handed down "on a Monday morning in May..." To quote that newspaper's own proud account:

> In all, nearly 50 Times staff members were involved in the operation. And by the time the decision was actually handed down, much of what they wrote was already in type.
> Monday, when the story broke, this vast news-gathering organization moved into high gear again. The Washington Bureau filed thousands of words on the ruling. Reporters and correspondents in the affected areas interviewed government and education officials for reaction. From New York, law professors, historians, sociologists, other experts were interviewed by phone. Editors tied the whole thing together.

The "Voice of America" began broadcasting the news to the world within one hour after the reading of the decision ended. It continued broadcasting it, in 34 languages, throughout the day and the night and the following day. The news was carried on the front pages of ~~most~~ many European newspapers.

Editorial reaction was cautious or aggrieved in the South but in the rest of the United States the dominant editorial note was one of resounding applause. Applause came also from the European press. The London News Chronicle headlined its story: "A BLACK STAIN WIPED OUT." The Manchester Guardian expressed "immense relief" at America's "having put behind what has long been its worst reproach." Le Monde in Paris hailed the decision as a "victory of justice over race prejudice," and the Zurich Neue Zeitung called it "an impressive example of the vitality of American democracy."

Knowledgeable European journalistst also pointed out, as did most American observers, that trouble lay ahead. Southern editors, few of whom were yet aroused to frank hostility, invariably stressed the difficulty of complying with the Supreme Court ruling in the near future.

The Arkansas Gazette in Little Rock said:

> The level of discussion has now descended to the crossroads hamlet and the participants are not learned educators, but the parents of Negro children and the white laymen who sit on local school boards.... In the end the new pattern will have to be hammered out across the table in thousands of scattered school districts, and they will have to be shaped to accommodate not only the needs but the prejudices of whites and Negroes to whom these problems are not abstractions but the essence of their daily lives.

The reaction of the New Orleans Times Picayune was one of unmitigated pessimism. "In the course of efforts to preserve some of the lines of separation," that paper said, "the ensuing strife will probably react unfavorably on public school support and multiply the problems with which the schools are already faced." The Birmingham (Alabama) News said that it "deeply regrets the decision," and the Birmingham Post Herald said: "Acceptance of the decision does not mean that we are stopped from taking such honorable and legal steps as may be indicated to avoid the difficulties it presents to both races."

Many Southern editors at this stage urged a calm, constructive approach to the problems posed by the Supreme Court decision. Practically all major newspapers in North Carolina, and a number in Tennessee and Florida sounded this note. In Georgia, where abandonment of the public school system was being talked of, the preeminent Atlanta Constitution said: "Our best minds must be put to work, not to destroy, but to arrive at constructive conclusions." The Chattanooga (Tennessee) Times said: "Special sessions of legislatures, if called, will create more heat than light. ....The Times believes that most of the Southern states will meet this situation calmly." In Virginia papers discussed the problem of adjustment to the ruling with as yet no hint of rebellion. The Richmond Times-Dispatch felt that the Supreme Court would have been on sounder ground "if it had entered its decree yesterday in the five cases before it, and granted a specific number of years for compliance....," adding:

> It would have been desirable if the court had at the same time specified the abolition of segregation by stages or steps, with, say, 10 per cent eliminated the first year after the decrees became effective, 40 per cent more two years later, perhaps, and the remaining 50 per cent some years after that. In this way, all uncertainty as to the timing and method of the tremendous shift would have been eliminated at once.

Viewed in retrospect it is interesting to note that headlines in some newspapers in former Confederate states announced in an entirely matter-of-fact tone: CHANGE NOT IMMEDIATE. Two years later the same newspapers would regard it as a foregone conclusion that there would be no extensive change in the system of segregated schools in their states for long years to come.

In the border region between North and South, where school segregation also prevailed, the editorial comment was almost entirely constructive. The Baltimore Sun foresaw that "the implications will be painful to many Marylanders," but agreed with the Supreme Court "that segregation, however equal the physical facilities, does put the brand of inferiority upon Negroes." The Washington Evening Star said: "Concern over a dubious assumption of power by the Court... does not alter the fact that this decision finds much support in wisdom and fairness." The Washington Post rejoiced that the decision "affords all Americans an occasion for pride and gratification." The St. Louis Post-Dispatch acclaimed the decision as "a great and just act of judicial statesmanship," and the Wilmington (Delaware) Journal found it "based on a sound American principle."

In the remaining two-thirds of the nation, where compulsory school segregation was already a thing of the past, important newspapers applauded the decision with unwonted eloquence, as in the following editorial samples:

Hartford Courant: "This milestone in our history means that we still struggle successfully towards our own ideals."

Des Moines Register: "The United States Supreme Court has begun the erasure of one of democracy's blackest marks...."

Denver Post: "Such an opinion had to be reached eventually in a country founded on the belief that 'all men are created free and equal.'"

Minneapolis Morning Tribune: "The court's momentous decision will be welcomed and embraced by all who believe that the constitutional guarantee of equal rights means just that, and nothing less."

San Francisco Chronicle: "The majesty of the democratic idea that men are created equal and are entitled to the equal protection of the laws shines through yesterday's unanimous decision...."

New York Times: "The highest court in the land, the guardian of our national conscience, has reaffirmed its faith -- and the undying American faith -- in the equality of all men and all children before the law."

Detroit Free Press: "Those citizens of the United States who cherish the belief that the American concept of democracy is a vital, living, organic philosophy, slowly but inexorably advancing toward the ideals of the founders of this Union, will be heartened by the unanimous opinion of the Supreme Court in the historic school segregation case."

Comment was elicited from many politicians and officials in the seventeen states, whose completely segregated public schools had been declared unlawful. Here we discern a sharp line in the pattern of reactions between the states which once had seceded from the Union and their immediate neighbors to the North. In the latter the comment of important officials was generally like that of Governor Phil M. Donnelly of Missouri, who said: "The citizens of Missouri are law-abiding people and I am confident that they will endeavor to uphold the Constitution of the United States, which is the supreme law of the land"[1] -- or that of Governor Theodore R. McKeldin of Maryland: "I am sure our citizens and officials will accept readily the Supreme Court's interpretation of the fundamental law."[1]

In the onetime Confederate South no politician of stature expressed approval of the decision; all stressed the enormous difficulty, if not the impossibility, of complying with it; and some vociferously denounced it. Louisiana's two Senators were among the more conciliatory spokesmen. Senator Allen J. Ellender said: "I don't want to criticize the Supreme Court. It (the ruling) is bound to have a very great effect until we we readjust to it." [2] Senator Russell Long said: "Although I completely disagree with the decision, my oath of office requires me to accept it as the law." Senator Long urged "all Southern officials to avoid any sort of rash or hasty action."[2] The liberal Senator Estes Kefauver of Tennessee said: "While we may not agree with the decision, we must not let this disrupt our public school system. We must not let this result in bitter strife."[2]

But Senator Richard B. Russell of Georgia called the decision "a flagrant abuse of judicial power,"[2] and Senator Burnet R. Maybank of South Carolina said it was "a shameful political rather than a judicial decision." [2] Senator James

O. Eastland of Mississippi declared bluntly: "The South w. not abide by, or obey, this legislative decision by a politi. cal court."[2]

Ironically, the most constructive comment came from officials of Virginia, the state which was destined to lead the South upon an adventure called "massive resistance." In an ephemeral phase of loyal resignation, Virginia's Attorney General J. Lindsay Almond, Jr., expressed confidence "that Virginia will approach the question realistically and endeavor to work out some rational adjustment."[2] Governor Thomas B. Stanley, who in a matter of weeks was to turn to defiance, promised to "call together as quickly as practicable representatives of both state and local governments to consider the matter and work toward a plan which will be acceptable to our citizens and in keeping with the edict of the court."[2]

Prophetic of the attitude which was soon to dominate Virginia, however, was the comment of that state's powerful Senator Harry F. Byrd, who called the court's ruling the "most serious blow that has been struck against the rights of the states" and said: "One of the cruel results arising out of the 'about-face' of the Supreme Court is that the Southern states, accepting the validity of the previous decisions, have in recent years expended hundreds of millions of dollars for the construction of new Negro school facilities...."[2]

The most violent reaction came from Georgia, whose governor, Herman Talmadge, had been obsessed with the possibility of such a decision for several years and had already expr fierce opposition. Governor Talmadge quoted a remark attrib to President Jackson after a fiercely disputed Supreme Court sion of an earlier day: "John Marshall made that decision. Le let him enforce it!" [3] Lieutenant Governor Marvin Griffin, who was soon to succeed to the Georgia governorship, smelled "meddlers, demagogues, racebaiters and Communists."[1]

The governor of South Carolina, now 75 years of age, looked back upon a career of service to the Republic matched by few living Americans. During the Second World War, James Francis Byrnes, as first Director of Economic Stabilization and, later, Director of War Mobilization, was considered by many the most powerful individual in the nation next to President Roosevelt himself. Under President Truman he was for eighteen crucial months secretary of state. Earlier he had served long in the Congress, as a member of the House of Representatives and as a Senator. Between his identifications with the legislative and executive branches he had served in the judicial as an associate justice of the Supreme Court.

The aging statesman was profoundly saddened when the high tribunal delivered its decision. As governor of South Carolina he had launched an unprecedented program of improvements in Negro schools. In his inaugural address on January 16, 1951, he had said: "It is our duty to provide for the races substant equality in school facilities. We should do it because it is right. For me that is sufficient reason."[4]

He had early exerted himself to avert the anti-segregation ruling. It was he who engaged Davis, whom he regarded as "the ablest constitutional lawyer in the United States," to defend the cause of segregation. When the national Administrations changed between Supreme Court hearings, he recalls in his autobiographic "All in One Lifetime," Byrnes "expressed to President Eisenhower the hope that he would not feel bound by the position taken by the Democratic Administration." Before the Supreme Court hearings began, Byrnes had sounded this warning:

> Should the Supreme Court decide this case against our position, we will face a serious problem. Of only one thing can we be certain. South Carolina will not now, nor for some years to come, mix white and colored children in our schools.... If the Court changes what is now the law of the land, we will, if it is possible, live within the law, preserve the public school system, and at the same time maintain segregation. If that is not possible, reluctantly we will abandon the public school system. [2]

Now Byrnes said he was "shocked that the court has reversed itself," but he added: "I earnestly urge all of our people, white and colored, to exercise restraint and preserve order.[5]

While recalcitrance was thus foreshadowed in the states of the onetime Southern Confederacy, in the segregation states outside of that region, an atmosphere conducive to compliance with the Supreme Court decision prevailed. In the four states which did not require school segregation but permitted local governmental units to practice it, segregation was already on the wane when the decision was handed down. The proportion of Negroes to the total population in these states was small, from .07 per cent in Wyoming to 3.8 per cent in Kansas. In Wyoming public school segregation had practically ended, and in New Mexico the last three communities with segregated schools now integrated them forthwith. Arizona entered the final phase of a desegregation program which began in 1953 and was to be completed in 1955. In Kansas the remnants of school segregation in ten cities were eliminated at once or scheduled for elimination the following year; in Topeka the school board in September, 1953 -- eight months before the Supreme Court acted -- had adopted a desegregation program to be completed in 1955.

In the six border states and in the nation's capital public schools were completely segregated when the Brown decision was handed down. Here also Negroes were more numerous. In the District of Columbia they comprised 35 per cent of the total population. The border states, Oklahoma, Missouri, Kentucky, West Virginia, Maryland and Delaware also had substantial percentages of Negroes, though still generally less than the states of the former Confederacy. (The only exceptions were Maryland and Delaware, which had larger percentages of Negroes than Texas with 13 per cent.) Oklahoma lay the farthest south geographically, but Oklahoma had been a state for less than half a century and had had only faint Civil War traditions as a territory. The other four had been slave states, and they looked back to a time when their citizens were divided in their sympathies between the Confederacy and the Union; Kentucky's identification with the South was celebrated in song and story. But in the middle of the Twentieth Century, these states were firmly integrated in their economies and in their philosophy and loyalties in the mainstream of the nation. Race prejudice was still deeply rooted in some sections, but state leadership and most community leadership in this region placed themselves promptly on the side of compliance with the law of the land.

In Oklahoma one school district was integrated in 1954, but otherwise in that state and in Kentucky the beginning of desegregation was deferred pending the Supreme Court's final ruling. In Missouri some scattered districts were desegregated immediately without disorder; the city of St. Louis announced a desegregation program in June which was to go into effect the following February. In West Virginia schools were completely integrated in a dozen counties and desegregation was begun in thirteen more. In Washington, D.C. and Baltimore, Maryland, something like complete desegregation was promptly carried out -- attended by only minor street demonstrations of protest. Approximately 60,000 of Washington's 100,000 pupils were colored -- a higher percentage of Negro children than in any other city even in the South -- and, added to the difficulty of interracial mingling, two completely separate school systems had to be knit together; but by November, 74,447 Washington pupils were attending 123 integrated public schools. In Baltimore the school board followed a simple plan, made possible by removing the racial restriction from its unusual pupil assignment system and allowing children to go to the schools of their choice; only 1,376 of the city's 55,331 Negro pupils chose the first year to enter previously all-white schools. (Half a dozen white pupils chose to enter previously all-Negro schools.) In Delaware, the city of Wilmington, commencing a three-stage operation, integrated its elementary schools in complete tranquility, though trouble developed in the rural, south Delaware community of Milford. Outside of this small section of Delaware, the flurries of public disorder which attended these desegregation starts were mild and shortlived.

In Milford semi-violent hostility succeeded temporarily in causing local officials to close public schools and suspend a desegregation order. Incidentally, the angry rallies of white citizens in Milford, numbering up to 4,000, bore early witness to the inflammatory potential of the professional racist agitator -- in this case one Bryant Bowles, who would continue to plague Delaware and carry his ~~malignant~~ disturbing message farther south during coming months.

In the region of the one-time Southern Confederacy the response to the ruling was one of defiance rather than compliance. Eighteen Negro pupils were admitted to formerly all-white schools in west Arkansas, and it was later revealed that the races had been quietly mixed in one west Texas school district; but otherwise no school desegregation took place in 1954. The mild first reaction to the decision in these eleven states was followed by steadily rising hostility; governors and state legislators busied themselves with plans for evasion of the order, and private organizations to stimulate popular resistance came into being.

North Carolina gave early evidence of that state's relatively temperate approach to the desegregation problem. School boards in several cities studied "ways and means of complying with the decision;" the chairman of one of them, D. E. Hudgins, in Greensboro, said publicly: "We must not fight, or attempt to circumvent, this decision."[1] Elsewhere in the South, the school boards of Nashville, Chattanooga, Arlington, Norfolk and Little Rock issued statements which contemplated compliance with the ruling. North Carolina's Governor Umstead, who had discouraged "rash statements or the proposal of impossible schemes,"[1] died on November 7 and was succeeded by Lieutenant Governor Luther Hartwell Hodges. Governor Hodges, and LeRoy Collins, who was elected in November to take office in January, 1955, as governor of Florida, were to share with Governor Frank G. Clement of Tennessee the reputation of being "moderate Southern governors." Governor Clement studied plans for gradual compliance and reminded his state that the ruling was "handed down by the judicial body which we, the American people, under our Constitution and law recognize as supreme in matters of interpreting the Constitution."[2]

But the Louisiana legislature, which was in session at the time the decision was handed down, censured the Supreme Court for "its usurpation of power."[3] A Texas Democratic convention declared the Supreme Court's decision an "unwarranted invasion" of state rights,[4] and Griffin was nominated for governor of Georgia on the pledge: "Come hell or high water, races will not be mixed in Georgia schools."[5] In Virginia, Governor Stanley abandoned his initial appeal for rational adjustment after a few weeks and signaled that state's turn toward resistance with the announcement: "I shall use every legal means at my command to continue segregated schools...."[6] In November, the voters of Louisiana and Georgia approved amendments to their state constitutions, in the former case, to permit the state to use its police powers to maintain segregated schools, and, in the latter, to permit the operation of a "private school" system, supported by tuition grants of public funds, in the event the legislature should see fit to close public schools. In December, Mississippians voted to give the legislature authority to close public schools rather than submit to their desegregation. It was the first trickle of a flood of constitutional amendments and legislative enactments in which Southern hostility and recalcitrance would express themselves during the next five years.

In the weeks before the Supreme Court's 1954 ruling, a group of Southern newspaper editors and educators who saw the need for comprehensive and unbiased information on the developing crisis in the South constituted themselves the board of directors of a "Southern Education Reporting Service." Under the sponsorship of the Fund for the Advancement of Education, this organization opened an office in Nashville, Tennessee, and began preparation for the issuance of the monthly Southern School News, the first issue of which appeared on September 3. The highly responsible reporting of this journal, which took no position itself on the Supreme Court decision or the desegregation question, was to prove invaluable to school administrators, public officials and all students of the problem during coming months and years.

Chapter 5

After the Supreme Court declared public school integration in 1954, as we have noted, it refrained from issuing a decree, but asked instead for another round of briefs and arguments on the precise issue of implementation. Fully aware of the explosive nature of the problem and anxious to be reasonable and to move cautiously, the Court invited the Department of Justice, the attorneys for the Negro plaintiffs, the lawyers for the school boards in the five cases immediately before the Court, and the attorneys general of all states requiring or permitting segregation to submit briefs and join the discussion. Specifically, the lawyers were to address themselves to the two questions of whether immediate desegregation should be ordered; or, in case gradual compliance should be allowed, whether the Supreme Court should itself formulate detailed decrees or remand the cases to the district judges with directions; and in the latter case, what directions should be given the district judges.

Briefs were submitted in November, 1954, but the oral argument originally scheduled for the following December was postponed until April, 1955. Justice Robert H. Jackson had died in October and his successor's appointment was not confirmed until March, 1955. The new member was John Marshall Harlan, whose grandfather half a century earlier had written the famous dissent in the case of Plessy v. Ferguson.

Thurgood Marshall again led a battery of lawyers from the NAACP on behalf of the Negro plaintiffs; the five localities which were parties to the suit were represented and, additionally, Florida, North Carolina, Arkansas, Oklahoma, Maryland and Texas sent lawyers to advise the Court. Attorney General Brownell submitted a brief and Solicitor General Simon E. Sobeloff represented the Eisenhower Administration in the oral argument.

From the beginning it was apparent that the Supreme Court would not order immediate desegregation. Marshall urged that desegregation be ordered by a fixed date, either the following September, or September, 1956. Brownell and Sobeloff agreed with the Southerners that the cases should be remanded to the district courts, but urged that district judges be directed to require school authorities to submit school integration plans within 90 days (one grade-a-year was indicated as an acceptable schedule); if no satisfactory plan were submitted, district judges should be instructed to order immediate desegregation. The Southern lawyers urged that maximum discretion ~~should~~ be allowed district judges in permitting gradual adjustment, very gradual indeed.

Many observers have contended that an order requiring immediate, overall elimination of race discrimination in the assignment of pupils to public schools would have resulted in a quicker and easier transition to the new order. It has been abundantly demonstrated since that public school desegregation is rarely as difficult as it is expected to be; the anticipation is far more disturbing than the reality. A quick desegregation operation is like a tooth-pulling. It might have been accomplished in many localities before resistance had hardened and it might have forestalled some organized harassment. In large Southern cities with uniformly good public schools, efficient law enforcement and a more sophisticated populace, the miracle of immediate desegregation might indeed have been accomplished. If local authorities had grasped this fact and had proceeded simply as a constitutional duty, the transition in the South would have been immediately accelerated.

But among persons familiar with the Southern scene, including even ~~many of~~ the most liberally disposed, few ~~rarely~~ conceive that an order for immediate and general desegregation would have been practicable. In many areas desegregation would have meant the enrollment of small contingents of white pupils in predominantly Negro schools. Often in the poorer localities it would have meant the transfer of white pupils from good or comfortable schools to the pitifully inadequate schools which had been provided for Negroes -- a step which, however just, would have been virtually impossible to accomplish. In rural Southern counties, too, the schools are centers of social life to a greater degree than elsewhere in the nation. If we add to these circumstances the intense and pervasive race prejudice, which local officials in these areas generally shared, we are bound to conclude that a sweeping, overnight transition would have been impossible.

The painful delay in ensuing years in bringing public school segregation in the South to an end must be traced to causes other than the judgment of the Supreme Court on this point. The Court decided in favor of gradualism and maximum consideration for the diversity of local situations: it left the formulation of specific decrees to district courts, and in remanding the cases to them on May 31, 1955, in a 900-word opinion -- again unanimous -- it laid down these guidelines:

> While giving weight to these public and private considerations, the courts will require that the defendants make a prompt and reasonable start toward full compliance with our May 17, 1954, ruling. Once such a start has been made, the courts may find that additional time is necessary to carry out the ruling in an effective manner. The burden rests upon the defendants to establish that such time is necessary in the public interest and is consistent with good faith compliance at the earliest practicable date. To that end, the courts may consider problems related to administration, arising from the physical condition of the school plant, the school transportation system, personnel, revision of school districts and attendance areas into compact units to achieve a system of determining admission to the public schools on a nonracial basis, and revision of local > laws and regulations which may be necessary in solving the foregoing problems. They will also consider the adequacy of any plans the defendants may propose to meet these problems and to effectuate a transition to a racially nondiscriminatory school system. During this period of transition, the courts will retain jurisdiction of these cases.

In accordance with the foregoing, district courts were required to enter the "necessary and proper" orders to end public school segregation "with all deliberate speed." The phrase "with all deliberate speed," strange at first to the general public became a famous and much debated term for the tempo prescribed for school desegregation.

The South on the whole reacted to this second ruling with a feeling of relief. The Court's final ruling was, as the New Orleans Times-Picayune observed "pretty much what the Southern attorneys general had asked for." Some newspapers were moved to excessive optimism like the Tampa Tribune, which said: "The Court's wisdom, we think, will dissipate the thunderhead of turmoil and violence which had been gathering in Southern skies since the court held school segregation unconstitutional a year ago...."

Political leaders in the onetime Confederate South also expressed momentarily a degree of relief. Lieutenant Governor Ernest Vandiver of Georgia approximated the feeling of most when he said: "I think the Supreme Court in some small measure attempted to correct an obnoxious decision."[7] The text of the Court's ruling was read as the bulletins came over teletypes to both houses of the Florida legislature, which was then in session, and was greeted with cheers. The wave of hostility and resistance in the South, which had been steadily rising for a year, came to a pause. But the period of hiatus in that trend was to be measured in weeks.

In September schools opened again with hardly any change in the rule of segregation in this region. In the western part of Texas, an area with few Negro inhabitants, and resembling the border states with respect to this problem, 65 school districts did remove racial restrictions in public school enrollment. In Arkansas one more school district, Hoxie, after an on-and-off period amid some local disorder, integrated 25 Negro children in formerly all-white schools. In the once highly secret "Atomic Bomb City" of Oak Ridge, Tennessee, 85 Negro pupils were integrated among 2,526 white students in federally-operated junior and senior high schools. These were the only departures from the system of segregated public schools in the former Confederate South; in eight states no Negro child was admitted in 1955 to any public school with white children.

In Prince Edward County, Virginia, an incident occurred which was grimly prophetic of events to come, not only in that county but in a wider area. May 31, 1955, the day of the Supreme Court's ruling, was the last day under Virginia law for the adoption of county budgets, and the Prince Edward governing board ~~of that county~~ met the same evening to take action on school appropriations for the coming year. Prince Edward County was one of the five localities directly under the Supreme Court order.

Fearing that desegregation would be immediately enforced several hundred angry white citizens appeared before the board to urge that the county give up public schools. The board voted unanimously to cut off all funds for school operation. At a mass meeting on June 7, attended by some 1,300 citizens an organization was formed and a fund-raising campaign was launched with a view to providing private schools for the county's white children. A few weeks later, however, upon the advice of state authorities and being convinced that desegregation was not imminent, the board reconsidered the matter and resumed public school appropriations.

Ringing out sharply in the Southern press at this juncture was a belligerent editorial in the Richmond News Leader. It is time for us to become acquainted with the remarkable editor of this paper, James Jackson Kilpatrick, Jr. "Jack" Kilpatrick, a native of Oklahoma, at 31 years of age had succeeded Douglas Southall Freeman in the News Leader's editorial chair in 1951. A ~~brilliant~~ talented editorial craftsman and a militant bellweather of the Southern temper, Kilpatrick ~~at this period~~ did probably more to stimulate resistance ~~in the South~~ at this than any other single writer. The News Leader's first reaction to the May, 1954, decision had been to call for the formulation of "a proposal that would win the Supreme Court's approval," suggesting: "If the Court were to fix, say, a ten-year period, and permit the states to integrate 10 per cent of their schools a year... a solution might be found." Because the News Leader editorial of June 1, 1955, reflected a mood which soon would be widely prevalent in the former Confederate South, it is appropriate to quote extensively from it here:

> In May of 1954, that inept fraternity of politicians and professors known as the United States Supreme Court chose to throw away the established law. These nine men repudiated the Constitution, spit upon the tenth amendment, and rewrote the fundamental law of this land to suit their own gauzy concepts of sociology. If it be said now that the South is flouting the law, let it be said to the high court, You taught us how.
>
> From the moment that abominable decision was handed down, two broad courses only were available to the South. One was to defy the court openly and notoriously; the other was to accept the court's decision and combat it by legal means. To defy the court openly would be to enter upon anarchy; the logical end would be a second attempt at secession from the Union. And though the idea is not without merit, it is impossible of execution. We tried that once before.
>
> To acknowledge the court's authority does not mean that the South is helpless. It is not to abandon hope. Rather, it is to enter upon a long course of lawful resistance; it is to take lawful advantage of every moment of the law's delays; it is to seek at at the polls and in the halls of legislative bodies every possible lawful means to overcome or circumvent the court's requirements. Litigate? Let us pledge ourselves to litigate this thing for 50 years. If one remedial law is ruled invalid, then let us try another; and if the second is ruled invalid, then let us enact a third...
>
> When the court proposes that its social revolution be imposed upon the South "as soon as practicable," there are those of us who would respond that "as soon as practicable" means never at all.

Chapter 6

The burgeoning clash between local attachment to segregation and state rights and the national will would produce for the region of the onetime Southern Confederacy an adventure and an experience peculiarly its own. Not for generations had the line which marked the outer boundary of the block of states which once had seceded from the Union been so sharply drawn.

We cross that line here to observe the response to the Supreme Court's ruling in another broad region where public school segregation had been compulsory hitherto. The border states, which made more progress in school desegregation in three years than the former Confederate states would do in ten, did not accomplish it without scattered incidents of disorderly resistance, some of them prolonged, and one alarming outbreak of violence. But save for small enclaves of persistent Southern heritage -- the eastern counties of West Virginia, the "Boot Heel" of Missouri, "Little Dixie" in Oklahoma, Maryland's Eastern Shore and sections of southwestern Kentucky and southern Delaware -- these states had outlived the agrarian past which linked them with the South. Leadership here moved generally in the opposite direction from the course which leadership was taking in the onetime Secession states. Governors, attorneys general, and state boards of education voiced acceptance of the Supreme Court decision and pledged their best efforts to bring about orderly compliance with it. While legislatures in the states farther south were taking measures to penalize any move toward school desegregation, legislation enacted in Oklahoma provided financial incentives to speed the closing of "inefficient" Negro schools and the transfer of their enrollment to mixed schools. Also in this region the clergy, civic clubs and the press cooperated in preparing the public for the change.

Kentucky is the border state which we have most hesitation in separating from the "South" in this study. In terms of fried chicken, bourbon, mint juleps, Southern belles and the strains of "My Old Kentucky Home," Kentucky is still emphatically Southern. Indeed, during the first two years after the Brown decision, convulsions in two Kentucky localities suggested to many that that state might match the hostility of the eleven Secession states in the matter of school desegregation. The exemplary school desegregation operation in Louisville was the more striking on that account. Benjamin Fine wrote in the New York Times of September 11, 1956, the day after Louisville schools were integrated.

> When the history of this proud Southern city is written, this day will undoubtedly go down as an historic landmark. Historians will note that a social revolution took place that may advance the cause of integration by generations. Even in the South, it was shown here, integration can be made to work without violence.

Nevertheless, the manner in which integration was accepted and the firmness and calm with which the transition proceeded here after 1956 would seem to justify our plan in this study of dealing with Kentucky as a border, rather than a Southern state. For convenience and clarity in the remainder of this volume we shall speak of "the South" with reference only to the eleven states of the onetime Southern Confederacy. It may be added that, since Kentucky's initial disturbances, this has been a common practice: such expressions as "Southern resistance," "Southern turmoil," "Southern soul-searching," "Southern moderates" and "Southern extremists" in public discussion generally have had reference only to the eleven Secession states.

Negroes were present in the border states in proportion to the total population as follows: Delaware 14 per cent, Maryland, 17 per cent, West Virginia, 6 per cent, Kentucky, 7 per cent, Missouri, 8 per cent, and Oklahoma 7 per cent. All six of these states made substantial progress in complying with the Supreme Court ruling during 1955 and 1956. When schools opened in September 1956, desegregation was almost complete in Missouri and West Virginia; in the latter state public schools remained segregated in only two small counties on the Virginia border. In Delaware, Maryland, and Kentucky desegregation was proceeding more slowly, though on a scale which would have looked revolutionary in any of the states farther south; in pockets of heavy Negro population and strong race prejudice in these three states the elimination of segregation would be a further process of protracted year-by-year advance.

In Missouri, the two principal cities, St. Louis and Kansas City, accounted for more than two-thirds of the Negroes, who comprised 8 per cent of the state's total population. Both cities completed desegregation in 1955, with the exception of some minor adjustments which were completed in 1956. Rural and small town areas generally followed the example of these cities except in the cotton-growing "Boot Heel" of southeast Missouri. Even there, ten high schools had ended segregation by 1957, leaving only four high schools segregated in the entire state; by then some 60,000 of the state's 67,000 Negro pupils had been integrated with white children.

In Delaware, the city of Wilmington completed its desegregation program in 1956 without incident. By 1957, fourteen other biracial districts out of sixty-one in the rest of the state had followed suit. Bryant Bowles was in jail and the period of public disorder, agitation and harassment had ended. A federal court put an end to a gradul grade-a-year plan being followed in some districts and ordered complete desegregation in all grades and all schools beginning with the 1961-1962 term.

Apart from the prompt action in the City of Baltimore in 1954, Maryland waited for the Supreme Court order of 1955. The State Board of Education, which sets the policy for schools in the counties, indicated its acceptance of the ruling but said that "no program of integration can be put into effect until the decision of the Supreme Court becomes final..." Only eight of the state's twenty-three counties desegregated schools in 1955. Desegregation was slow in getting under way in rural counties of substantial Negro population, but within the next two years all but two counties with Negro residents adopted desegregation as a formal policy, to be realized at varying speeds.

Oklahoma as a whole moved swiftly after the Supreme Court's 1955 ruling: of 261 school districts having Negro pupils, 136 were desegregated in 1955 and 38 more the following year; but the southeastern corner of that state -- "Little Dixie" -- which has the heaviest concentration of Negro population, settled down to a long, slow transition.

The violence which flared in Kentucky was ~~anomalous~~ in several respects, unprovoked. Sturgis and Clay are two small coal and farming communities of about 3,000 and 2,000 inhabitants respectively in the Southwestern section, where Negroes represent about 10 per cent of the total population. The Union County Board of Education, without announcing any general desegregation plan, decided rather abruptly in the summer of 1956 to admit nine Negro children to the white school at Sturgis instead of transporting them to a Negro school at Morganfield eleven miles away. The Negroes registered without incident on August 11, but tension rose as the news circulated through the community and, when they came for the first regular day of class, they were turned back by approximately 500 whites who had surrounded the school. The school superintendent addressed the demonstrators and the crowd dispersed. The next day it came back, but the Negro pupils did not appear; their parents had agreed to send them to Morganfield in return for assurance that schools would be desegregated in 1957. At this point, however, State Adjutant General J. J. B. Williams visited Sturgis and, over the objections of the mayor and school officials, decided that troops of the National Guard were needed. Early on the morning of September 6 two hundred guardsmen of the 240th tank battalion rolled into Sturgis. In this new situation the Negro parents tried again to send their children to the local white school. Guardsmen with fixed bayonets on their rifles escorted the Negro children through a mob of 800 heckling, shouting white people. Seven white men were arrested for disturbing the peace. Approximately 1,000 angry citizens gathered that night in a meeting promoted by a segregationist "White Citizens' Council," and attendance at the school the next day dropped 50 per cent.

The protest movement spread to Clay, eleven miles east of Sturgis in Webster County, where the board of education had decided to admit four Negro children to a white school. A crowd of 150, many of them women, stood in front of the school and turned the Negro children back; thirty men hovered at the bottom of the hill, blocking the road to keep the press away. National guardsmen were sent to Clay, and for a few days Negro children attended the schools in both towns under troop protection. National guardsmen and state police reached a total of 560 in the two communities. For a few days the Negroes attended the formerly all-white schools at Sturgis and Clay under troop protection. However, the state attorney general then ruled that, since no official plan for desegregation had been formulated, the Negro pupils had been improperly enrolled in both towns, and the integration attempt was abandoned for the 1956-1957 school term.

The turmoil at Sturgis and Clay came but a few weeks after worse disorders which had attended attempts to integrate a high school at Clinton, Tennessee. In the sensational headlines the two incidents were associated as reflecting turmoil in the South. But Kentucky's dis-association from Southern resistance was firmly established by the successful feat of desegregation performed a few days later in the metropolis of Louisville.

The desegregation accomplishments of Wilmington, Baltimore, Washington, D.C., Kansas City, St. Louis and Louisville demonstrated that peaceful elimination of school segregation in large cities of substantial Negro population was possible, ~~and~~ They were hailed as illuminating pilot operations, ~~for Southern cities.~~ ~~of these~~ St. Louis and Louisville were situated the farthest south, approximating the latitude of Charlottesville, Virginia, and they shared the administrative and -- to some extent -- the emotional problems of Southern cities.

St. Louis had a total population of 875,000 people of whom 175,000 or 20 per cent were Negroes; its public schools enrolled 91,000 pupils of whom 35 per cent were Negro. On June 22, 1954, five weeks after the original Brown decision was handed down, the board of education of St. Louis announced a program for desegregation of the schools under its control. The adjustment moved with dispatch: teacher colleges and special schools were desegregated in September, high schools and adult education classes the following February, and elementary schools in September, 1955. Technical details of the operation are set forth in a comprehensive report of the St. Louis school board, issued in September, 1956, entitled "Desegregation of the St. Louis Public Schools." The story is also told in the brochure, "The St. Louis Story," by Bonita H. Valien. With regard to the highly significant cooperation of community leadership in the undertaking, the school board report relates:

> Both before and after the announcement of the plan in the local newspapers, a number of key organizations of the community volunteered their assistance and support. These included the press, the League of Women Voters, the city-wide councils of parent-teacher associations, the YMCA, the YWCA, the UAACP, the Urban League, the Metropolitan Church Federation, representatives of the Catholic Church, the Lutheran Society for Better Human Relations, the Jewish Community Council, the National Conference of Christians and Jews, the Mayor's Commission on Human Relations and others.... The decision was reached that.... each organization so minded assume what responsibility it found appropriate and practicable to explain and interpret the plan....
> ...The League of Women Voters published a booklet describing the plan in detail... and recommending support. The Metropolitan Church Federation set aside a Sunday for prayer of thanksgiving for public school desegregation....

In both St. Louis and Louisville, the law enforcement authorities lent alert and systematic, but inconspicuous cooperation. In Louisville plainclothes men mingled with possible troublmakers and as many as 500 police were on call. But there was no case of disorder worthy of the name in either city.

The preparation for, and execution of, Louisville's school desegregation program is described in a very readable book entitled "The Louisville Story," by Omer Carmichael and Weldon James. Carmichael was the superintendent of schools who engineered the transition, and James was associate editor of the Louisville Courier-Journal. Louisville, once a slave-trading center of the Old South, is now a growing, progressive city, with a population at the time of school desegregation of close to 400,000. Negroes comprised about 16 per cent of the total, but they accounted for nearly 27 per cent of the school enrollment.

The 1954 Supreme Court ruling was followed promptly by announcements on the part of Governor Lawrence W. Wetherby of Kentucky and the Louisville board of education of their determination to comply with it. On the day of the 1955 ruling Superintendent Carmichael said: "Now that the Court's decision has been made we can go to work and develop a plan." The plan proved to be one of intensive preparation, followed by complete desegregation at one stroke in September, 1956. A significant feature was a liberal transfer privilege in the first year of integration, to serve as an ice-breaker and a "safety valve." It was anticipated that many parents of both races, particularly in the beginning, would prefer to have their children attend schools in which their own race was not in a small minority. Eleven per cent of the pupils requested transfer, and they were nearly always accommodated. But after all the post-registration, 73.6 per cent of all pupils were in 55 mixed schools leaving only eleven all-white and nine all-Negro schools.

A small Citizens Council group offered minor harassment, wooden crosses were burned -- a threat symbol ~~inherited~~ adopted from the Ku Klux Klan -- and a handful picketed the school board office and City Hall for an hour or so, though none of this activity engaged many participants or gave the police authorities much concern. (Local newspapers reported that several pickets were from outside Louisville, and that not one was a parent of a Louisville school child.) School officials received a few abusive letters and telephone calls.

Press, clergy and civic groups rallied behind the desegregation program much as they had done in St. Louis, but in Louisville the achievement owed most to the personality and leadership of superintendent Omer Carmichael, ~~the superintendent of schools~~. The latter had dedicated himself to this project with tact and skill and unwavering purpose since 1954. After the widely publicized event Carmichael found himself immediately in demand for national press interviews and public appearances on both lecture rostrums and television programs. He was invited to the White House for an hour's talk with President Eisenhower, who expressed the belief that the Louisville accomplishment set a pattern which could bring relief in other areas. Carmichael devoted much of his time from then on to expounding the science of peaceful school integration and witnessing to the possibility of accomplishing it, though in the South his message generally fell upon deaf ears, until he died in January, 1960.

A certain science of school desegregation was indeed developing. Both in the big city programs and in the experiences of small-town and rural school districts useful lessons were being learned. Valuable light was thrown on the problems of preparing students, teachers and the public for the change, patterns of gradualism and provision for disparate levels of educational achievement on the part of newly integrated pupils.

Hopkins County, Kentucky, adopted a one-grade-a-year desegregation plan; under this the first grade was integrated at the start and other grades were to be integrated successively thereafter. When objections of NAACP attorneys were upheld by a federal district court, the county adopted a new plan for desegregation to be completed within a four-year period, but the one grade-a-year plan remained a popular device for effecting gradualism and it would be approved temporarily by federal courts in more difficult situations in the South. In Kanawha County, West Virginia, grades one, two and seven were integrated in 1956 and grades three, four, five and six the following year; a variety of other plans were used. Analyses of many of these plans were made under the auspices of the public education fraternity Phi Delta Kappa and were published in a book entitled "Action Patterns in School Desegregation."

Widespread fear had been expressed that the influx of Negro pupils would lower the standards of previously all-white schools. Negro children, coming from a backward economic and cultural environment as well as from generally inferior schools -- and retarded by segregation itself -- were on the average considerably behind white pupils of the same age in educational progress. This problem was met in Washington, D.C., St. Louis, Wilmington and other cities by variations of what was known as the "track system," which was designed to prevent backward pupils of either race from retarding the progress of others. The somewhat famous track system which Washington began to implement in 1956 distributed 13,377 senior high school students -- 3,026 in a basic track, 5,575 in a general track, 3,884 in a college preparatory track and 892 in an honors track. Educators noted that the principle had been widely followed before desegregation and that the system was beneficial regardless of the race of the pupils involved.

All of these findings and the growing literature on the subject were eagerly studied by sociologists and educators -- outside of the South, where they could have been of greatest value. At this angry juncture in the region of the onetime Confederacy public school administrators or college professors who were known to be as much as studying the problem of of school desegregation exposed themselves to popular abuse and official reprisal. The science of school desegregation became, however, a part of the necessary homework of federal district judges; and, though furtively at first, it would gradually receive attention from Southern educators as the years went by.

While the meager school desegregation in most of the South for some years to come would follow litigation and orders of federal courts, it is significant that desegregation in the border states was initiated in the main "voluntarily." That is, without specific court orders, but in spontaneous response to the constitutional mandate. A handful of lagging districts were prodded by federal court action, but during the first five years after the Brown decision over 600 school districts in this region were desegregated voluntarily.

With 1956 the period of crisis ~~for this region~~ here was over; the remaining transition to integrated public education would go quietly and uneventfully forward for most of the decade. Insofar as concerned the District of Columbia and the six border states, the Supreme Court decision posed problems of exceptional difficulty, but it met with no widespread resistance, offered only minor threats to public order and posed no challenge to the authority of the judicial or executive branches of the national government.

In the former Confederate South a different story was unfolding.

Chapter 7

For most white Southerners the essential jolt in the Brown decision was its simple recognition of the fact that Negroes are citizens of the United States. Though only a rare fanatic would admit it, there was in their instinctive attitude a remnant of the old feeling, which was echoed in the Dred Scott decision, that Negroes were not exactly people, but "beings of an inferior order." Many of the kindest white Southerners -- who "loved Negroes" -- more or less unconsciously shared this feeling. The Negro minority was not quite a part of the "public" in the South. If the "public" was invited to a concert or other function under white auspices, a Negro had no assurance that he would be admitted. The normal courtesy titles of "Mr.," "Mrs." and "Miss" were widely denied even to cultivated Negro ladies and gentlemen. When a Southern politician referred to "my people" to "the people" of this or that section he seldom considered the Negro element of the population as included in the designation. Negroes might be "Southern Negroes," but a "Southerner" in common parlance was emphatically a white person.

This concept had now been demolished by the highest tribunal in the land. The new concept had to be digested and a new structure of Negro-white relations had to be erected. But, first, the old relationship -- one based for the most part on well-meaning paternalism on the part of whites and meek acceptance of inferior status on the part of Negroes -- had to be destroyed. In the process a large measure of the genuine friendship which had developed under the old order had also -- it seemed, inevitably -- to be swept away. If interracial relations had been good before the Brown decision, as white Southerners insisted, they now deteriorated rapidly.

A racial estrangement set in which would begin to relax only after five years in some states, after six or seven in others, and which lingers still in much of the Deep South. Choruses from Negro colleges ceased to be invited as they had often been invited in the past, to sing for white audiences; Negro groups were excluded from holiday parades and festivities in which they had formerly taken part; and many white community leaders who had been conspicuously active in aiding and advising Negroes abandoned this activity -- to lend their efforts in some cases to "anti-integration" movements. Even the Urban League, a long respected Negro welfare organization, not involved in the school integration controversy, was deserted by many of its white friends and supporters; the Urban Leagues of Little Rock, Richmond, New Orleans, Jacksonville and Fort Worth were excluded from local Community Chests, in whose fund-raising campaigns they had previously shared. Some white Southerners even boycotted radio and television programs which included Negro entertainers; in an incident which was widely deplored in the South but which was indicative nevertheless of the feeling in many quarters, the celebrated Negro singer Nat King Cole was attacked by hoodlums in the audience when he visited Birmingham in his native state of Alabama. In situations of particular tension hatred of Negroes expressed itself in economic sanctions and in larger outbreaks of violence.

Many white Southerners were disturbed at the new aggressiveness on the part of Negroes in claiming the rights of citizens -- in going to federal courts, even the Supreme Court of the United States, with litigation aimed at a "way of life of the South." Traditionally the business of "keeping the Negro in his place" had been a major concern. The spectacle now of able and sophisticated Negro lawyers matching wits with white counsel and winning case after case was at the same time a violation of the traditional racial fitness of things and an embarrassing refutation of the myth of innate Negro incompetence. The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People became an object of consuming hatred. And ~~though the inconsistency was unnoticed,~~ the kind of hatred which this mainly Negro organization inspired in people who insisted that Negroes were hopelessly inferior creatures itself represented a break-down of that illusion; for the hatred of the NAACP partook of neither condescension nor contempt: it recognized an astute and powerful adversary.

Fear stimulated opposition to desegregation most stubbornly on two counts: fear of Communism, with which the crusade for Negro rights was believed to be somehow related; and fear of racial amalgamation. Miscegenation was a delicate subject, not often raised openly by responsible critics of the Supreme Court decision. The fact that the vast majority of Negroes in the United States are actually mulattoes, with some white ancestors, pointed to widespread miscegenation at an earlier period of Southern history, and illegitimate sexual relations of white males with Negro women were not uncommon at the time of the Brown decision. Yet a fear that intermingling of white and Negro children in public schools would lead to interracial marriages on a large scale was prevalent at all levels of white Southern society; it was exploited daily by racist agitators. It was hardly borne out by the experience of Northern states where segregation had long since been abolished. The extent of intermarriage between whites and light-skinned mulattoes in the North it is impossible to determine, but known cases of intermarriage between whites and individuals who were obviously Negro are still rare. No significant increase in miscegenation could be observed anywhere as a result of public school integration. Nevertheless, the fear of interracial marriages was perhaps the most insistent single ingredient in Southern hostility to the desegregation ruling. When the question, "Would you like for your daughter to marry a Negro?" -- was asked, it was supposed to put an end to any argument on the subject.

The idea that the movement to end racial segregation was a part of a Communist conspiracy took hold among a vast number of white Southerners. Many were ready to believe that Communists dominated, not only the NAACP, but the federal government and the Supreme Court of the United States. The merchants of hate, whom we shall presently describe, included this canard heavily among their wares. These wasted little time in rational criticism of the Brown decision, but referred to that action matter-of-factly as a Communist plot and plastered many a tree and signboard with the slogan, "Impeach Earl Warren."

Learned and thoughtful criticism of the Supreme Court decision was not lacking; there were rational considerations which caused many Southerners to regret the Brown decision. In due course we shall discuss the Southern protest as it manifested itself on a higher level. We examine here the Negrophobia which spread over the South, its background add the men and organizations which promoted it.

Without reading farther back into the long history of race prejudice, account should be taken of the residual poison left by the racist literature which was popular in both North and South during the first quarter of the twentieth century. This was the period when the segregation craze was moving to its most absurd extremes; it was also the period when the present older generation of Southerners was in the formative years of adolescence and early manhood. The books of Madison Grant and his racist contemporaries were yet available in the 1950's to reinforce the more literate segregationists. In the field of best-selling fiction, Southerners above middle-age were likely to have read some of the novels of Thomas Dixon -- of which five million copies had been sold.

Dixon is best remembered as the author of "The Clansman," upon which the early motion picture extravaganza "The Birth of a Nation" was based. This cinematographic apotheosis of the Ku Klux Klan, even after repeated expurgation, is still tinged with anti-Negro venom. In the 1930's, having been seen by an estimated one hundred million people, "The Birth of a Nation" virtually disappeared.[1] After the Brown decision it was revived and shown in a number of Southern cities; it was running in Little Rock on the eve of the 1957 riots there, and it was shown in New Orleans during periods of interracial strife in that city. During a convention of the NAACP in Atlanta, Georgia, the film was exhibited in a suburban theater under the auspices of the Ku Klux Klan itself; a handbill, issued by the "United Klans," read in part:

> The NAACP dares you -- white man -- to see: THE BIRTH OF A NATION.... Thousands of NAACP members are here -- to take over your city -- and do your thinking -- UNLESS -- You dare to stand your ground and join the thousands of white people who have decided that the white man shall retreat no further....

In the 1950's the old silent movie was not a resounding box office success and its current showing was not a major factor in the rising tide of anti-Negro feeling; but there were few among the older generation of Southerners -- or, indeed, of Americans -- who had not sat through "The Birth of a Nation" at least once at some time in their lives.

As for Dixon's novels, such as "The Clansman" and "The Leopard's Spots" it would be difficult to imagine reading matter better calculated to put salt on lingering sores of the Reconstruction era and instill hatred and fear of the Negro. Dixon describes the Negro (using a "Clansman" character as his mouthpiece) as a "creature, half-child, half-animal,... a being who, left to his will, roams at night and sleeps in the day, whose speech knows no word of love, whose passions, once aroused, are the fury of the tiger..."[2]

The amateur racist anthropologist was given this kind of basic material:

> "...Since the dawn of history the Negro has owned the Continent of Africa -- rich beyond the dream of poet's fancy, crunching acres of diamonds under his bare black feet. Yet he never picked one up from the dust until a white man showed him its glittering light. His land swarmed with powerful and docile animals, yet he never dreamed of a harness, cart or sled.... He lived as his fathers lived -- stole his food, worked his wife, sold his children, ate his brother, content to drink, sing, dance and sport as the ape!"[2]

In "The Leopard's Spots" -- which the Atlanta Journal of that day called "an epoch-making book, packed with truth stranger than fiction"[3] -- a Dixon character declares:

> One drop of Negro blood makes a Negro. It kinks the hair, flattens the nose, thickens the lips, puts out the light of intellect and lights the fires of brutal passion....[4]

Probably the first book-length diatribe to appear in the wake of the Brown decision, and one of the most widely circulated, was written by Thomas P. Brady, judge of the circuit court of the fourteenth Mississippi district and vice-president of the Mississippi Bar Association. It was entitled "Black Monday," (with reference to Monday, May 17, 1954, when the decision was handed down.) One might suspect that Judge Brady had just put down an old copy of "The Leopard's Spots" when he wrote:

> The Negro proposes to breed up his inferior intellect and whiten his skin and "blow out the light" in the white man's brain and muddy his skin.[5]

One senses an echo of Dixon also in this comment from "Black Monday:"

> You can dress a chimpanzee, housebreak him, and teach him to use a knife and fork, but it will take countless generations of evolutionary development, if ever, before you can convince him that a caterpillar or a cockroach is not a delicacy. Likewise the social, political, economic and religious preference of the Negro remain close to the caterpillar and the cockroach....[6]

Such at any rate was the tenor of literature which thousands of white Southerners found in their mail-boxes or on their doorsteps. The stuff was sometimes sponsored by a Citizens Council or a unit of the Ku Klux Klan, more often the source was anonymous. The indigenous output was supplemented by several hate publications in the North which, long given to vilification of Negroes, Catholics and Jews, now focussed their attention upon Negroes.

"Black Monday" itself became a sort of handbook for the burgeoning Citizens Councils, in which Judge Brady was a leading spirit, and which were to become the largest segregationist organizatin in the South.

The book was an embodiment of virtually the whole syndrome of the militant segregationist extremists. Many of these charged that the Supreme Court and the federal government were deliberately fomenting interracial turmoil and predicted as inevitable the strife which they themselves were strenuously engaged in promoting. But few could match the purple prose of Judge Brady, who expressed it thus:

> Oh, High Priests of Washington, blow again and stronger upon the dying embers of racial hate, distrust and envy. Pour a little coal oil of political expediency and hope of race amalgamation upon the flickering blaze which you have created, you will start a conflagration in the South which all of Neptune's mighty ocean cannot quench.... A law is never paramount to mores....

> Sacred mores are invulnerable to the dagger of any Brutus. When a law transgresses the moral and ethical standards of the mores, invariably strife, bloodshed and revolution follow in the wake of its attempted enforcement.[7]

A maudlin revival of the cult of Southern womanhood was reflected in Judge Brady's apostrophe: "The loveliest and purest of God's creatures, the nearest thing to an angelic being that treads this terrestial ball, is a well-bred, cultured Southern white woman or her blue-eyed, golden-haired little girl."[8] The cult was related, of course, to a horror of contact between white women and Negro men. It had fired lynching mobs in the past, and it would have a part again in a few months in Judge Brady's own state in the savage murder of a Negro boy.

Among the most conspicuous characteristics of race prejudice are its swift contagion at times of public excitement and the ease with which it can be turned by even a moderately skillful agitator into hysteria and frenzy. In the unrest following the Supreme Court's desegregation decision it provided a means by which a previously unimportant and little known person could quickly attract a large following, get into the limelight and enjoy a sense of power. Bryant Bowles, whom we left in the midst of the commotion in the Milford area ~~of the border state~~ of Delaware, was one of the first to discover this possibility. The harvest of publicity which he reaped in those early disturbances may have carried a suggestion of similar opportunities elsewhere. Many ~~no doubt~~ also went into action ~~also~~ out of unfeigned hostility to the Supreme Court ruling. At any rate anti-integration agitators were not long in coming forward in every Southern state. Most of these confined their activities to their own communities, ~~or states~~, but some kept a sharp eye on the broad spectrum of the school desegregation crisis and moved in wherever local unrest seemed to offer the best promise of drama, turmoil and publicity.

The most famous among these inter-state rovers was not a Southerner at all, but a native of New Jersey, named John Kasper. Twenty-five years of age, Kasper had attended Columbia University and had run a bookstore, specializing in anti-Semitic literature, in Greenwich Village. In a tireless campaign to stimulate resistance to the Supreme Court's order and to "race-mixing," he harangued Citizens' Councils, Ku Klux Klan meetings and -- at times of crisis -- angry mobs. Kasper was to have a large hand in the violence which plagued Tennessee in 1956 and 1957. Meanwhile he became a hero to thousands of Southerners. Admiral John Crommelin, a retired naval officer from Montgomery, Alabama -- himself a racist who lent his voice to the agitation in Tennessee -- was to tell a rally in Clinton: "You may not see it, but some day a statue will be erected on this court-house lawn to John Kasper."[9]

Kasper would spend most of 1958 and 1959 in a federal prison. But his popularity by then was already fading. This strange young man, who incessantly preached hatred of the Negro, had earlier -- during the Greenwich Village phase of his career -- fraternized conspicuously with Negro friends. The revelation in 1957 of this scandalous detail of his past resulted in widespread disenchantment among his anti-Negro following.[10]

Bryant Bowles had promoted a so-called "Association for the Advancement of White People," and Kasper headed a short-lived "Seaboard White Citizens' Council;" but these men actually operated as independent prima donnas. The great majority of the racist agitators would crusade within the framework of the more stable anti-integration organizations that were being formed in all sections of the South and the ancient Ku Klux Klan, which was stirring again.

The Ku Klux Klan that galloped mysteriously across the pages of Reconstruction history had an aura of idealism and chivalry which in a troubled time invited the participation or elicited the sympathy of many of the noblest citizens of the South. In its lofty declaration of principles it sought to succor the weak and unfortunate and to protect members of the white race in "life, honor and property" from molestation by the newly freed and enfranchized Negroes. To accomplish the latter purpose, which was its actual raison d'être, this secret order played upon the superstitions of ignorant ex-slaves by parades, and night forays, of silent horsemen, covered with white sheets and wearing masks, by lighting up "fiery crosses" and by other eerie signs and warnings -- and also, to an extent which the public never knew, it engaged in acts of murderous violence. This "Invisible Empire," as it was called, reached the peak of its activity and power in 1869, and thereafter gradually fell into disrepute and disbanded.

An unmounted Ku Klux Klan appeared in 1915, and, flourishing during the "roaring twenties," spread across the nation until it attained an estimated membership of four million. The Klan in this reincarnation stood, not only for "womanhood" and white supremacy, but for Protestant Christianity and "pure Americanism" -- making it hostile to Catholic, Jewish and foreign-born citizens; in some areas it added organized labor to its list of foes. This aberration gradually subsided after 1928, and, as Arnold S. Rice observes in "The Ku Klux Klan in American politics," -- "During the early 1950's there were indications that the Klan might disappear permanently from the American scene."

Then the Supreme Court's anti-segregation decision of 1954 gave the Klan a new lease on life. Klaverns, as local units were called, were resuscitated and fiery crosses lighted up the sky in many sections of the South. Like the Invisible Empire of Reconstruction days, the post-Brown decision Klan was limited to the South, and its attention -- and its terroristic exhibitions -- were focussed upon Negroes, and "Negro-lovers." Masks had now been widely outlawed, but white sheets and regalia were brought forth and much of the old mumbo-jumbo was reinstated. Although this ritual was sometimes practiced by other than authentic Klansmen, the burning of crosses near the homes or meeting places of suspected "integrationists," whether colored or white, became a standard symbol of local tension, and hundreds of such instances were reported. However, the Ku Klux Klan had a bad name now even in the South. In spite of much sympathy with its aim of "keeping the Negro in his place," it was frowned upon by most of the public. It established some 500 Klaverns and enrolled ~~over~~ probably 100,000 members, but they were drawn almost entirely from fanatic, hoodlum and lawless elements, and the movement was able to gain a foothold in only a part of the South.

Georgia, Alabama, Florida, South Carolina and Louisiana became Klan strongholds. ~~But~~ However, Klan emissaries were coldly received in the Upper South; Virginians would have no truck with the organization. Only small Klan nuclei developed in Arkansas, Tennessee and Texas. In Mississippi an omnipresent Citizens' Council organization preempted the racist field. North Carolina was afflicted with considerable Klan activity, but the secret order was to receive a rebuff in that state which resounded across the nation and was one of the few genuinely humorous incidents which the desegregation crisis afforded. In March, 1958, a Klan expeditionary force, led by Wizard James Cole, of Marion, S. C., staged a full-dress demonstration in Robeson County to warn the 30,000 Lumbee Indians ~~of that county~~ there against association with their white neighbors. The Lumbees, who are a sophisticated and thoroughly modernized tribe, responded in a spirit of indignation mingled with hilarious amusement. Gathering around their white-robed visitors they fired hunting rifles into the air until the Klansmen fled in terror, while Lumbee jokers wrapped discarded Klan sheets and regalia around themselves and danced with glee!

In numbers and prestige the Ku Klux Klan was ~~far~~ surpassed by the more respectable organization of Citizens' Councils, but it was a prime factor in the incitement of public turmoil and shocking atrocities were to be perpetrated by members of this unsavory order.

By far the most influential rallying point for the movement of resistance to desegregation were the organizations which sprang up in every Southern state and either coagulated in what became the "Citizens' Councils of America, Incorporated," or allied themselves with that body. John Bartlow Martin writing of the Citizens' Council movement two years later in "The Deep South Says NEVER" posed the question: "At that time (late 1954) the South was divided, perplexed, resigned. Today the Solid South is a fact, and its resistance to desegregation is granitic.... How has this come about?" And he cited "the remarkable achievement of a movement that has uncompromisingly set its face against the mainstream of American thought as expressed by the Supreme Court of the land -- and has thus far got away with it."

Citizens' Councils operated sporadically also in 1955 and 1956 in Kentucky and Missouri. At first there were many "White Citizens' Councils" and an "Association of Citizens' Councils." Local groups also used such names initially as "National Association for the preservation of the White Race," "States' Rights League," Hermitage Crusade," "Southern Gentlemen" -- or "Pond Hollow Segregation Club." Strong state organizations which, with varying degrees of integration in Citizens' Councils of America, preserved their separate identity, were: the States' Rights Council of Georgia, the North Carolina Defenders of States' Rights, the Tennessee Federation for Constitutional Government and the (Virginia) Defenders of State Sovereignty and Individual Liberties. The Ku Klux Klan was emphatically not an affiliate. Although their membership sometimes overlapped and the two groups joined forces in some demonstrations, the Klan, with its notorious propensity to violence, was officially shunned by the status-seeking Citizens' Councils.

The first Citizens' Council came into being in July, 1954, when fourteen, then approximately one hundred, citizens met in the town of Indianola on the Mississippi Delta. Their organizer was Robert B. Patterson, a well-to-do planter, who was to continue as executive secretary of the Citizens' Councils of Mississippi and become a leading figure in the further expanding movement.

Six months before the Brown decision, Patterson had attended a meeting at which a state legislator predicted that the Supreme Court would soon order schools desegregated. He then wrote, and had printed for distribution, a letter in which he said:

> Dear Fellow Americans:
> I attended a meeting the other day on the elementary school issue and when I left I was confused, mad and ashamed. It seems a great danger is hanging over the heads of our children -- mongrelization. ...Some of our leaders cringe in confusion and await what they claim is inevitable.... A lot of people are resigning themselves to seeing their children crammed into schools and churches with children of other races and being taught the Communist theme of all races and mongrelization.... I gathered my children and promised them that they would never have to go to school with children of other races against their will, and this is my solemn vow and pledge. If every Southerner who feels as I do, and they are in the vast majority, will make this vow, we will defeat this communistic disease that is being thrust upon us....

This early equation of racial integration with Communism would be a favorite theme of Citizens' Councils and segregationists generally during coming years. Incidentally, in another paragraph Patterson voiced also the isolationist sentiment which would be curiously blended with race prejudice in Citizens' Council doctrine. "...We've been tricked into a costly no-decision war with Red China," he wrote. "Miscegenation is increasingly flaunted in our faces by the Northern press. We long ago let Russia steal all our atomic secrets and heaven knows what else. What should be my cue for excitement? When an atomic blast levels my home?" [12]

Citizens' Councils sprang up quickly in other Mississippi towns. W. J. Simmons, a wealthy banker's son, who organized the Jackson Council, joined Patterson in making a career of Citizens' Council promotion. Judge Brady, an executive committee member was regarded as the intellectual leader of the movement. The sale of "Black Monday" was pushed throughout the South, and a flood of pamphlets began to pour forth. By the end of 1954 Citizens' Councils were operating in over one hundred Mississippi towns, and Councils were forming in several other states. The movement slowed down during the period of waiting for the Supreme Court's 1955 decree; then it spread rapidly until it was claimed to have over 300,000 members. Informed observers estimate that at its peak the membership of Citizens' Councils of America, with its affiliates, probably reached that figure. [13]

Among the best known leaders of the expanded Citizens' Council movement were Sam Engelhardt, the dynamic organizer of the Alabama Councils; Hugh G. Grant, a former United States Minister to Thailand, and president of the States' Rights Council of Georgia; Emory Rogers, of South Carolina; State Senator William Rainach, of Louisiana; and Roy V. Harris, a prominent Georgia politician, who became president of the Citizens' Councils of America. Segregationists of all types -- including some of the Ku Klux Klan mentality -- found place in the movement; but the Citizens' Councils placed great emphasis on respectability, and, in spite of the racist crudities of such men as Judge Brady, mayors, state legislators, sheriffs, clergymen and business and professional men of the first rank were to be found on Citizens' Councils rolls. Mississippi, the birthplace and headquarters of the movement, was enveloped in it virtually to the saturation point, and the Citizens' Councils were to become a formidable political power in that state.

Add Old Chapter 7 (New Chapter 4)

With these influences at work to stimulate hostility to the school desegregation order and to Negroes, one may well ask what influences were operating in the opposite direction. Did any voice ring out to halt this trend? Did anyone to whom the masses of Southerners would listen say: Stop; this is immoral, this is unpatriotic or this is unwise? -- or this is making the inevitable change more difficult and dangerous for us? The answer is No. The counteracting influences, during the first post-Brown decision years at least, were feeble indeed. Clergymen who spoke out against the trend were rare. Some newspaper editors sought cautiously to combat it, but most either avoided the subject or urged the extremists on in inflammatory editorials. Those politicians who called for calm and respect for the law of the land spoke so softly that their voices were hardly heard in the anti-integration din.

There were, of course, thoughtful white Southerners who either believed that the Supreme Court had correctly interpreted the Constitution or realized that its decision was binding and would not be revoked, and who foresaw that public school segregation would somehow have to be brought to an end. But we are unable to form any reliable estimate of how many held such views because public expression of them was so rare. Whether from fear of criticism and abuse, or from a sincere belief that an outspoken approach would impair their ability to exert a quiet influence in ~~minor~~ some phase of the crisis, such sentiments for the most part were carefully concealed. Public acknowledgement that the Supreme Court decision was the law of the land -- coupled as this concession generally was with insistence upon a personal preference for segregation -- invited bitter criticism and required courage in the highest degree. Emphasis on moderation and interracial friendship, even law and order, aroused suspicion and had to be voiced with caution.

There had long been an organization in which respected white Southerners joined with Negro leaders in working for interracial friendship and understanding. Formed in 1919 as the Commission on Interracial Cooperation, it was reorganized in 1944 to become the Southern Regional Council. This organization, with a regular staff and an office in Atlanta, engaged in continuous and much-needed research on race relations, while in statements, publications and speeches by its members it sought both to inform the public and to advance the cause of interracial justice. In 1952 the Southern Regional Council took a position against race segregation. It welcomed the Brown decision when it came in 1954, and its activities thenceforth were intensified and expanded. Affiliated with the Council, or working independently, there were half a dozen small interracial state groups of dedicated people working for the same cause.

White people were also working for better interracial relations in the South through national organizations, notably the Anti-Defamation League and the American Friends Service Committee. The number of such organizations in the field and the volume of their activities would assume substantial proportions in coming months. But in the first post-Brown decision years, relatively few as much as knew of their existence. In 1956 the white Southerners working actively for interracial friendship between the races could be counted, not in tens of thousands, but in hundreds.

It was inevitable that the mounting hostility to the desegregation order and anti-Negro feeling, encouraged by dynamic organizations in which sheriffs and police were often members -- would express themselves in acts of violence.

The Southeastern Office of the American Friends Service Committee, the Department of Racial and Cultural Relations of the National Council of the Churches of Christ in the U.S.A., and the Southern Regional Council collaborated in compiling "a report of racial violence reprisal and violence in the eleven Southern states from January 1, 1955, to January 1, 1959." The information was culled from reports of the Associated Press, the United Press, the International News, the Southern School News and a score of newspapers, the source being given in each case. Two hundred and twenty-five acts against private liberties and public peace were listed as follows:

6 Negroes killed;
29 individuals, 11 of them white, shot and wounded in racial incidents;
44 persons beaten;
5 stabbed;
30 homes bombed; in one instance (at Clinton, Tenn.) an additional 30 houses were damaged by a single blast; attempted blasting of five other homes;
8 homes burned;
15 homes struck by gunfire, and 7 homes stoned;
4 schools bombed, in Jacksonville, Nashville, and Chattanooga, and Clinton, Tenn.
2 bombing attempts on schools, in Charlotte and Clinton;
7 churches bombed, one of which was for whites; an attempt made to bomb another Negro church;
1 church in Memphis burned; another church stoned;
4 Jewish temples or centers bombed, in Miami, Nashville, Jacksonville, and Atlanta;
3 bombing attempts on Jewish buildings, in Gastonia, N.C., Birmingham, and Charlotte;
1 YWCA building in Chattanooga and an auditorium in Knoxville dynamited;
2 schools burned.

The victims of these outrages or their targets were nearly all Negroes. Among exceptions were a few white people who conspicuously befriended Negroes, were accused of "race-mixing" or urged "moderation"; and a wave of bombings of Jewish temples occurred in 1958. (The latter shocked the public in the South as elsewhere, although sporadic anti-Semitism was a by-product of the anti-integration campaign.) Under the headings of "Intimidation," and "Reprisals," the report listed numerous other instances of cross-burnings and threats, of less violent demonstrations, and scattered instances of persecution of white persons who associated with Negroes or otherwise dissented from extreme segregationist orthodoxy.

All of these incidents were reported in the press, more comprehensively in Northern than in Southern newspapers. They were deplored by Southern editors. But many Southern publicists held that they were the inevitable result of a provocative and improper Supreme Court decision. John Temple Graves, a distinguished Southern newspaper columnist said that "the Court made us necessarily more race conscious than we have been since Reconstruction" and added: "It has taught us to disregard the law."[15] Criticism was often countered with the charge that crime and violence were equally prevalent in the great cities of the North.

It is possible that this blunt tabulation of outrages could give an impression of a kind of anarchy which did not exist. The incidents listed occurred in a region of 40 million people over a period of four years, and most Southerners knew of them only through news media. Nevertheless they reflected a degree of malignancy and lawlessness in the movement of resistance to desegregation more serious and more pregnant with crisis than many realized. The underlying purpose of the perpetrators -- apart from an emotional outlet -- was to warn that Southern white men were still in control in the South and that dire consequences would be visited upon any Negroes who dared to avail themselves of the rights which the Supreme Court had proclaimed for them.

In the first incidents to arouse nationwide concern public school desegregation was not directly at issue -- the revolting murder of a Negro boy in Mississippi, the series of disturbances in the struggle of Negroes for equal treatment on the city buses of Montgomery, Alabama, and the rioting precipitated by the admission of a Negro woman to that state's university. They signaled -- especially the first and last of these -- extraordinary mobilizations of newspaper and camera men, magazine writers, and the television and radio services; they were the subject of interminable examination, analysis, speculation and debate, as well as colorful and sensational narrative. But many and more farreaching convulsions were yet to come, and in the ten-year story these need hold our attention only briefly.

The slaying of Emmett Till in Sumner, Mississippi, and its aftermath, were naked manifestations of Negrophobia, a hark-back to the worst days of anti-Negro brutality in the South. This fourteen-year-old Negro was kidnapped and murdered -- when a white woman said that he had tried to date her, uttered an obscenity and "wolf-whistled!" The case was widely known as the "wolf-whistle" murder. The trial of the two men charged with the deed -- the woman's husband and a companion -- drew large crowds and was followed with avid interest throughout the nation. In the ugly tradition of cases in which white men are accused of killing Negroes, nobody was punished. The grand jury refused to indict the two defendants.

(In a less publicized incident earlier in the month, Lamar Smith, a Negro who was reported to have urged other Negroes to vote in a gubernatorial election, was shot to death on the courthouse lawn in Brookhaven, Mississippi. In this instance likewise the grand jury failed to indict the three men charged with the slaying.)

The protracted Negro boycott of city buses in Montgomery, Alabama, was significant chiefly in two respects: it marked the beginning of a new era of aggressive "non-violent" action on the part of Southern Negroes and it threw into national prominence a remarkable new Negro leader. On Thursday, December 1, 1955, when a bus carrying white and Negro passengers made a downtown stop, the driver asked four Negroes to give up their seats to free them for white passengers. One of the Negroes, Mrs. Rosa Parks, refused. She was taken to the police station and charged with violating city segregation laws. Saturday, printed leaflets were circulated asking Negroes to stay off the buses Monday, the day of Mrs. Parks' trial. Almost 90 per cent of them did. They went to work in private automobiles, Negro taxis, in wagons, on foot or bicycle. Mrs. Parks was found guilty and fined $14. That night 5,000 Negroes crowded into the Holt Street Baptist Church and by the end of the evening the Montgomery Improvement Association was formed and the Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr., was named as its president.

It was the beginning of a year-long bus boycott -- during which King's home was bombed, a dynamite cap exploded in the home of another leader and 100 Negroes were indicted on charges of violating Alabama's anti-boycott laws. Meanwhile, a suit was filed in federal court which eventually on November 13, 1956, brought a unanimous ruling by the United States Supreme Court that Montgomery's bus segregation laws were unconstitutional. The Negroes called off the boycott and resumed riding on the newly desegregated buses. But acts of violence continued: during the months following four Negro churches, the homes of two ministers and a taxi stand were bombed; snipers fired at buses, in one instance wounding a Negro woman; and a 15-year-old Negro girl was beaten by several young white men near a city bus stop.[16]

(A Negro boycott of city buses in Tallahassee, Florida, which developed in a similar manner in the summer of 1956, and was accompanied by tension and some violence, was also terminated as a result of the Supreme Court decision in the Montgomery case.)

The leader of the Montgomery Negro movement, Dr. Martin Luther King -- he had won a doctorate at Boston University -- was a talented preacher and writer, even a philosopher, as well as a calmly indomitable crusader. He became the apostle of a new doctrine of non-violent resistance and protest, which drew its inspiration in part from Mahatma Gandhi, and rose quickly to the top rank of national Negro leadership, revered by Negroes and execrated by Southern segregationists.

(Space)

In February 1956 public interest turned from the bus boycott in Montgomery to focus excitedly on the city of Tuscaloosa in the same state, where a Negro woman, Autherine Lucy, was admitted briefly to the University of Alabama. The lifting of racial barriers in Southern colleges and universities had begun before the Brown decision and had proceeded peaceably in half a dozen Southern states. The Supreme Court had ruled against segregation in state-supported institutions of higher learning in a series of decisions, beginning with the Gaines case in 1938. Approximately 125 public and private universities and colleges in Southern and border states -- including one Alabama institution, the Catholic college of Spring Hill in Mobile, -- had admitted Negro students. By the beginning of 1955-1956 Negroes had been admitted to state universities in all but five Southern states: Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Mississippi and South Carolina. In these states university integration was now linked in the minds of segregationists with public school integration, which they were prepared to resist to the end.

Miss Lucy, now 26 years of age, had first sought admission to the University of Alabama in 1952 and been refused. Her case had been in litigation, in the hands of NAACP lawyers, for three years when the final definitive federal court order came. She attended her first class on Friday, February 3, 1956. That night a crowd of 1,200 students, attracted by a burning cross, assembled on University Avenue and exploded firecrackers, sang "Dixie" and marched through the women's dormitory area. After a basketball game the next night students massed before the Student Union Building for further demonstrations. Many outsiders were noted among the university students -- high school pupils, workers from a nearby plant and members of an extreme pro-segregation group from Birmingham. Monday, a crowd of about 3,000 roamed the campus, jeering, cursing and throwing eggs and stones at officials accompanying Miss Lucy to her classes -- the latter lying in the bottom of the car. Some peered in classroom windows, shouting: "Where is the nigger? Lynch her! Kill her!" Finally Miss Lucy was removed from the campus under heavy police escort and university officials suspended her indefinitely, expressing fear for her life.[17]

Not all of the townspeople were stampeded into folly. Indeed Dr. O. C. Carmichael, president of the university, said: "The lawlessness .. represents a small percentage of the student body."[18] The student government association legislature called for action to protect students' safety; the International Relations Club criticized the "ineffectiveness of the forces of law and order;" law school students adopted a resolution supporting Dr. Carmichael in his determination not to tolerate disorder; and 750 students signed a petition requesting that those leading the rioting "be apprehended and subjected to severe disciplinary action up to and including permanent expulsion."[19] A group of civic leaders in Tuscaloosa also called for law and order and the calls for decency and decorum in the Tuscaloosa News won for its editor, Burnett Boone, a Pulitzer Prize.

At the end of the month United States District Judge H. Hobart Grooms ordered that Miss Lucy be readmitted. But within hours she was permanently expelled. Something had happened which angered the university officials and furnished a not unwelcome excuse for ending the Lucy incident on disciplinary grounds. In her suit for reinstatement Miss Lucy had charged that the university had conspired with the mob. In court Thurgood Marshall dropped all charges of conspiracy, saying: "After careful investigation we are unable to produce any evidence to support these allegations." The board of trustees announced that it "felt impelled because of the nature of the charges made against its members and the officials of the university to take action expelling Autherine Lucy."[20] On petition by Miss Lucy to re-enter the university, Judge Grooms ruled that her expulsion was justified. Later the board of trustees announced that Leonard Wilson -- the 19-year-old chief leader of the rioting mob -- had been expelled, that four other students had been suspended and that 25 had been disciplined.

On February 17 a Citizens' Council had been formed in Tuscaloosa for the first time. Over 1,000 flocked to the organization meeting -- at which sophomore Leonard Wilson was temporary chairman. Wayne Phillips wrote in the New York Times Magazine:[21]

"Saturday, the day after the white council meeting, there was something in Tuscaloosa the outsider had not felt before. There was hate, and there was fear.

"Hate literature was circulated through the regular Saturday shopping crowds on the main street. Negroes were publicly ridiculed by men with whom they had lived in peace for years. Strangers were shunned or, if recognized as Northerners, taunted. Violence was something to be laughed at, boasted of, and gloried in...."

Chapter 5

The People's Chosen Representatives

On January 29, 1960 -- when North Carolina had achieved only token integration in nine out of 173 school districts but had been spared radical resistance contortions or serious public disorder -- the governor of that state addressed the Harvard Law School Forum. Looking back over this period, Governor Luther H. Hodges (later Secretary of Commerce in the Kennedy Administration) described in a temperate and elevated tone the difficulties which confronted a Southern state executive, and the course which North Carolina had followed. He said that he did not wish "to dwell on the differences of opinion among competent lawyers and scholars concerning the 1954 decision nor to take a great deal of time stating certain facts having to do with tradition, community mores and strongly held convictions with respect to maintaining separate public schools for different races," but he wanted "to make the point that the Governor of North Carolina did indeed face a very difficult, overwhelming problem brought about by the 1954 change in the interpretation of the Federal Constitution," and he continued:

> First, I am sure that all of you will agree with me, regardless of your personal opinion concerning either the correctness or the desirability of the 1954 decision, that decision did in fact precipitate a considerable legal debate throughout the country. Furthermore, this legal debate did not simply divide along regional lines, with all the affirmatives located North of the Mason-Dixon line and all the negatives located South of that same imaginary line.

It is accepted history that the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution was adopted in the aftermath of the War Between the States. And the Congress which debated and approved the language of the 14th Amendment for submission to the vote of the States also enacted federal statutes providing for operation of separate schools within the District of Columbia. It is also a matter of history that through the decades immediately following the adoption of the 14th Amendment no less than 25 States, at one time or the other, had statutes either authorizing or requiring separate schools for the races. The States either permitting or requiring such practices were not by any means limited to those which we now group together and refer to as "Southern States." For example, at various times there were California, Delaware, Illinois, Indiana, Kansas, Missouri, Nevada, New Jersey, New York, Ohio, and Pennsylvania, all outside the Southern or border-state category. It is also a matter of historic fact that in various cases decided before 1900, as well as after 1900, the United States Supreme Court gave express approval to what is called the "separate but equal" rule.

Whatever the niceties of constitutional interpretation involved in the decision of those cases which came before our highest court before 1900, many states and local governments did proceed to extablish and operate racially separate schools and the Supreme Court did not, until very recent times, indicate that the rule of "separate but equal" might be in jeopardy so far as judicial interpretation was concerned.

It is thus clear that the 1954 decision amounted to a drastic change of the judicial mind, or a complete reversal of long-established interpretation by the Supreme Court.

This fact in and of itself did, in my opinion, make the problem vastly more difficult for the Governor of a State which had chosen to maintain separate public schools for the races.

The governor traced the development of public education in North Carolina since the Reconstruction era and recalled the "background of extreme travail and difficulty through which Negro citizens had to come to citizenship responsibilities," resulting in the development of segregated school systems "in many states of the Union." From the time that he "was suddenly called upon to assume the responsibilities of governor in November, 1954, and without knowing how North Carolina would meet the ever-darkening crisis," he had set for himself two objectives:

"1) To maintain, if possible, a system of public education for all the children of North Carolina; and

"2) To maintain law and order."

"I frankly confess to you today," Governor Hodges said, "that there were many times during that period when it seemed that not only were the pillars of education about to fall, but also the pillars of stable and responsible government....There were times when it seemed almost that our state, our region and indeed the whole nation, must suffer an orgy of great internal discord, and that we must pass through a period of neighbor against neighbor, citizen against citizen, state against state, and in truth a nation divided against itself...."

"By early 1955 our state legislature was in regular session, and the Advisory Committee on Education under the chairmanship of Mr. (Thomas) Pearsall .... in due time recommended to me, and I... in turn recommended to the General Assembly, the repeal of all our statutes which then required that white and Negro children be assigned to separate schools. At the same time we recommended, and the General Assembly enacted, a pupil assignment law which placed in the local boards of education throughout the state full authority and responsibility for assignment of the pupils to the public schools in each local unit in accordance with valid and reasonable standards...."

The governor recalled further that he had suggested "that it would be in the interest of our public schools and in the interest of maintaining peace... for all of our citizens to observe voluntary separation of the races in the public schools." (But it may be noted that this suggestion aroused no enthusiasm among North Carolina Negroes.)

"As the people of our state were increasingly concerned," he called the legislature in special session in July 1956 and recommended as "safety valves" an amendment to the state constitution "which would (1) authorize tuition grants to be paid to the parents of any child assigned against the wishes of his parents to a school in which the races were mixed, such grants to be available for education in a private school chosen by the parents...; (2) authorize the people in any locality, by majority vote, to discontinue the operation of the public schools in that community...."

However, speaking in January, 1960, the North Carolina governor was able to say of his state with pride: "In no instance that I recall has an election been called by citizens at the local level for the purpose of voting to close schools. Also, I understand that up to the present time, there has been no case in which the parent has withdrawn his child from a public school and applied for a tuition grant on the grounds that he objected to his child attending school with a person of another race."

Governor Hodges closed on this lofty note: "We must always keep before us the great promise of America, which is the promise of freedom under responsible and democratic government -- and I mean freedom for all citizens irrespective of race, religion or creed. While our day-to-day progress toward more perfect realization of these ideals may seem to falter, and while all of us at one time or the other despair of doing good works, the spirit of America must always remain alive in our hearts."

There was on the whole a more constructive spirit among the state governors in the South than among the representatives of the people in their state legislatures and in the halls of Congress. All elected officeholders were conscious of the political advantages of catering to the racist fever. But the chief executive bears a unique responsibility for the maintenance of public order and the general equilibrium of his state. The legislator, who can cast but one vote in a numerous assembly, feels freer to voice extravagant opinions and to join in impulsive gestures. Some governors were equally uninhibited, and the picture would change somewhat with the rising tide of fanaticism at the grassroots of political power. Moderate incumbents in Alabama and Mississippi would be replaced by irresponsible extremists;

the governor of Arkansas, who was then pursuing a decorous course, was -- surprisingly -- to become a symbol of Southern rebellion against federal authority. But, in the summer of 1956, more Southern governors were looking in the direction of adjustment to the Supreme Court's desegregation ruling than were facing the other way.

Griffin, who had succeeded Talmadge as governor of Georgia, and George Timmerman, Jr., who had succeeded Governor Byrnes in South Carolina, were lesser men than their predecessors; but Griffin was an even more reckless advocate of resistance, both in Georgia and as a roving ambassador of turmoil in other Southern states; and Timmerman, who held that "the mixing of children of two biologically different races" was "contrary to the divine order of things," pledged that "not in a thousand years will the schools of South Carolina be integrated." In Texas Governor Allan Shivers frowned upon school-closing proposals, but had placed himself firmly on the side of resistance to desegregation. Governor Thomas B. Stanley, after initial hesitation, had yielded to the pressure of a political machine and proclaimed resistance in Virginia.

On the other hand, half a dozen Southern governors, in addition to Governor Hodges of North Carolina, were in varying situations resisting segregationist hysteria. In Tennessee, the moderate policy of Governor Frank Clement was put to a dramatic test on the morning of January 23, 1956, when approximately 300 fierce segregationists drove from Memphis and Chattanooga and converged on the state capitol in Nashville. Cars in the two motorcades were decorated with Confederate and American flags and banners bearing pro-segregation slogans, including one demanding "Segregation or War." The Governor listened for an hour to twenty of their spokesmen, then lectured them firmly and made no concession to their demands. State Attorney General George McCanless, who accompanied the Governor, said: "I am a Southerner, and I believe in segregation, But we in this country are a government of la s and not men, and the decisions of the Supreme Court are applicable to the whole country and not just somewhere else."[2]

Tennessee was unique among Southern states in that, not only the governor, but the two representatives of that state in the United States Senate, Estes Kefauver and Albert Gore, expressed moderate views on the desegregation issue, though they took little part in the controversy. Jim McCord, a former governor, state conservation commissioner under Clement, also said, following the January demonstration: "If calmness and patriotism alone had activated the members of the United States in the 'Fifties, war might have been averted. And, if the people of today will lend themselves to calm purposes and Christian-like ideals, these questions can be settled adroitly and to the best interests of Tennessee." The fact that Tennessee was blessed with such leadership at the highest level increases the blame to be placed at the door of the roving racist agitators who converged upon that state when it soon would become the scene of the most violent explosions yet registered over the desegregation of public schools.

Governor LeRoy Collins of Florida won the title of "the moderate Southern governor" from many national observers by his repeated appeals for Christian tolerance and respect for law. Collins was a handsome and attractive public figure. A polished gentleman and a devout Episcopalian, he spoke the language of idealism. Collins was cautious, if not negative, in his approach to the actual implementation of the Supreme Court decision. He averted much segregationist criticism by a vague insistence that "we can preserve segregation," and he put through the Florida assembly a series of enactments which, though relatively moderate, were expressly designed to accomplish that purpose. No Negro child had been admitted to any white public school in Florida, and none would be before 1959. But it was due to the courage and skill of LeRoy Collins that Florida was spared the legislative excesses which afflicted most Southern states, and his lofty utterances helped a certain flame of liberalism to burn more brightly in the South.

Governor Orval Faubus of Arkansas was wavering in his "moderate" stand, yet he was campaigning successfully for reelection against two extremist opponents whom he called "hate preachers." He favored action to prevent "sudden and complete integration," but he pointed with a kind of pride to the fact that in Arkansas three public school districts and all the state institutions of higher learning -- one of which his son attended -- had been desegregated.

Governor Earl Long had neither the moral nor the physical stamina to stem the rising tide of hostility and intolerance in Louisiana. But he was sympathetic with the Negroes; their votes had been an important factor in his election and he would seek to keep their friendship to the end. He was to battle segregationist extremists fiercely -- though he would embrace most of their proposals. "Extremists on both sides are injuring the cause," he said, and added with great truth: "There are a lot of fakers trying to advance themselves politically by using the race issue to befuddle the people."[3] Being "soft on integration" was one of the many charges to be leveled at his administration, which would be demoralized by periods of debauchery and mental illness.

In judging the actions and public utterances of the governor of a state which is seething with anti-Negro and anti-integration feeling the political exigencies and limitations which surround him must be taken into account. A degree of compromise with extremism was the price of election to office in the first place, and only by marching some distance down the road of defiance with the majority was it possible to exercize an influence against going all the way to disaster. Without a leaven of politicians who reasoned thus, the most reckless element would have held unchallenged sway. Alabama and Mississippi were the two Southern states where hostility to desegregation would express itself in the most violent form. The governors of those states at this time insisted upon their attachment to segregation and their determination to preserve it, but from a study of their behavior in its peculiar context -- aided by the writer's talks with them -- it is evident that these two governors deplored the resistance furor and desired to move toward some orderly adjustment.

Alabama's colorful Governor James ("Big Jim") Folsom was habitually kind to Negroes and was regarded by most of them as a friend of their cause. He discouraged legislative excesses, sometimes withholding his signature from segregationist measures, and his early groping toward orderly adjustment to the desegregation ruling led some national observers -- wrongly -- to remove Alabama from the classification of "resisting" states. His "soft" approach aroused bitter opposition during his term of office and appeared to close the door to any return to political power on his part in the future. Speaking before the Alabama Education Association in 1955, Folsom said: "I would like to remind you that we always hear more noise from those who are guided by blind prejudice and bigotry than is ever the case with those who try to think through and be fair in their approach."[4]

Mississippi, of all Southern states, had the highest percentage of Negroes in its population and the strongest attachment to state rights and white supremacy among its white citizens. Any public expression bordering on liberalism, or even moderation on the segregation issue, was politically perilous there. Governor James P. Coleman, who had been a congressman of liberal leanings, resisted extremist pressure in a number of critical situations and was criticized for his "softness on integration;" he refused to join the Citizens' Council. Coleman's words and actions often shocked liberals who viewed them from afar, but among the too-silent moderate minority in Mississippi he was regarded as the state's best hope. When most of the Southern members of Congress joined in a sensational manifesto of protest against the Supreme Court's decision -- of which we shall presently have more to say -- Governor Coleman recalled the situation in the South on the eve of the Civil War and cut through the loud applause in Mississippi with the comment: "Those in positions of responsibility must think things through before they take positions of no return.... The greatest need of the time is for cool thinking on racial problems. This is no time to let hot-heads make us lose our perspective and go beyond the point of no return."[5]

Southern members of Congress were much heard from. Senator James O. Eastland, of Mississippi, attacked the Brown decision day in and day out and seized upon every argument in sight to support his contentions. Many others -- conspicuously Senator Strom Thurmond of South Carolina, (Senator after 1956) Herman E. Talmadge of Georgia, Representative John Bell Williams of Mississippi, and Representative James C. Davis of Georgia -- criticized the desegregation ruling unceasingly and without restraint. The demur of a handful of liberal Southern members was scarcely audible. A disproportionate number of Southern sentors were high in national councils. The seniority rule and the usually long tenure in office in the one-party South had made Southerners the ranking Democratic members of the most powerful Senate committees. Eastland was the ranking Democrat on the Judiciary Committee; Senators Richard B. Russell of Georgia, Walter George of Georgia, and Harry Flood Byrd of Virginia, were ranking Democratic members of the Armed Forces, Foreign Relations and Finance Committees respectively. Russell denounced the desegregation ruling without being obsessed with it; George registered his disapproval, but his unwillingness to take the warpath of defiance was largely responsible for his retirement in 1956. Byrd was bitter, though not voluble, on the subject; in his direction of a famous political machine in his own state and in his skillful maneuvering among his colleagues in Congress this Virginia Senator was to give a powerful stimulus to the movement of resistance in the South.

Byrd was generally regarded as the chief architect of the "Southern Manifesto," which boomed across the nation in March 1956. It was part of his plan to "organize the Southern states for massive resistance" -- as he had already organized his own state of Virginia. The manifesto, signed by an overwhelming majority of the Southern members of Congress and introduced in the House and Senate on March 12, 1956, attacked the Supreme Court decision sharply and commended "those states which have declared the intention to resist enforced integration by any lawful means."

The first draft was stronger. Columnist Drew Pearson wrote of the behind-the-scenes preliminary activity: "Chief resistance, surprisingly, came from two outspoken conservatives

-- Senators Spessard Holland of Florida, and Price Daniel of Texas. They succeeded in toning down the original inflammatory language. The first draft scathingly denounced the Supreme Court's desegregation ruling as an 'illegal and unconstitutional seizure of power by the nine men composing the court'.... Holland and Daniel warned that the first draft was a declaration of anarchy.

....

"Byrd easily recruited South Carolina's unrepentant Dixiecrat, Senator Strom Thurmond, to be his front man. Surprisingly, two Southern moderates, John Stennis of Mississippi, and Sam Erwin of North Carolina, eagerly joined Thurmond in drafting the first angry manifesto."[6]

The plan took shape at a meeting of 20 Southern senators in the office of Senator George, who consented to serve as chairman of a drafting committee. Senator Russell wrote the final manifesto. Many Southerners hesitated to sign the document; Senator George himself was clearly lacking in enthusiasm. But under pressure from manifesto promoters -- who reminded them of the feeling back home and the possibility of being labeled "betrayers" of the South -- 19 out of 22 Southern senators went along. The only Southern senators who refused were the two from Tennessee; Lyndon Johnson of Texas, being the Senate majority leader, was not asked to sign.

In the House of Representatives 24 Southern members refused to lend their names to the manifesto. Three North Carolina members withheld their signatures -- Representatives Thurman Chatham, C. B. Deane and Harold D. Cooley. Chatham said: "I personally will not sign anything that will tear down the power and prestige of the Court as the final arbiter of justice."[7] (Chatham and Deane would be defeated in their bids for reelection two months later; Cooley would survive.) But 82 Southern members signed the document. The delegations of Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, South Carolina and Virginia gave the manifesto their unanimous support.

The Southern Manifesto was received without comment in the House of Representatives. In the Senate the reaction of most non-Southerners, after the initial shock, was one of sorrow more than anger; some were relieved that the Southerners had not been more violent in their protest. Outside of Congress, both President Eisenhower and Adlai Stevenson, his Democratic opponent, emphasized the fact that the Southerners had committed themselves to support their views only by lawful means. No personage at a high official level answered this broadside against the Supreme Court's decision. The high tribunal itself, as it must, remained silent.

As the Southern Manifesto, officially entitled the "Declaration of Constitutional Principles," brought the highest segregationist prestige and talent to bear in presenting the case against the Brown decision, it is appropriate to give its full text here:

> We regard the decision of the Supreme Court in the school cases as a clear abuse of judicial power. It climaxes a trend in the federal judiciary under taking to legislate, in derogation of the authority of Congress, and to encroach upon the reserved rights of the states and the people.

The original Constitution does not mention education. Neither does the Fourteenth Amendment nor any other amendment. The debates preceding the submission of the Fourteenth Amendment clearly show that there was no intent that it should affect the systems of education maintained by the states.

The very Congress which proposed the amendment subsequently provided for segregated schools in the District of Columbia.

When the amendment was adopted in 1868, there were 37 states of the union. Every one of the 26 states that had any substantial racial differences among its people either approved the operation of segregated schools already in existence or subsequently established such schools by action of the same law-making body which considered the Fourteenth Amendment.

As admitted by the Supreme Court in the public school case (Brown v. Board of Education), the doctrine of separate but equal schools "apparently originated in Roberts v. City of Boston... (1849), upholding school segregation against attack as being violative of a state constitutional guarantee of equality." This constitutional doctrine began in the North -- not in the South, and it was followed not only in Massachusetts, but in Connecticut, New York, Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, Minnesota, New Jersey, Ohio, Pennsylvania and other northern states until they, exercising their rights as states through the constitutional processes of local self-government, changed their school systems.

In the case of Plessy v. Ferguson in 1896, the Supreme Court expressly declared that under the Fourteenth Amendment no person was denied any of his rights if the states provided separate but equal public facilities. This decision has been followed in many other cases. It is notable that the Supreme Court, speaking through Chief Justice Taft, a former president of the United States, unanimously declared in 1927 in Lum v. Rice that the "separate but equal" principle is "...within the discretion of the state in regulating its public schools and does not conflict with the Fourteenth Amendment."

This interpretation, restated time and again, became a part of the life of the people of many of the states and confirmed their habits, customs, tradition and way of life. It is founded on elemental humanity and common sense, for parents should not be deprived by government of the right to direct the lives and education of their own children.

Though there has been no constitutional amendment or act of Congress changing this established legal principle almost a century old, the Supreme Court of the United States, with no legal basis for such action, undertook to exercise their naked judicial power and substituted their personal political and social ideas for the established law of the land.

This unwarranted exercise of power by the court, contrary to the Constitution, is creating chaos and confusion in the states principally affected. It is destroying the amicable relations between the white and Negro races that have been created through 90 years of patient effort by the good people of both races. It has planted hatred and suspicion where there has been heretofore friendship and understanding.

Without regard to the consent of the governed, outside agitators are threatening immediate and revolutionary changes in our public school systems. If done, this is certain to destroy the system of public education in some of the states.

With the gravest concern for the explosive and dangerous condition created by this decision and inflamed by outside meddlers:

We reaffirm our reliance on the Constitution as the fundamental law of the land.

We decry the Supreme Court's encroachments on rights reserved to the states and to the people, contrary to established law and to the Constitution.

We commend the motives of those states which have declared the intention to resist forced integration by any lawful means.

We appeal to the states and people who are not directly affected by these decisions to consider the constitutional principles involved against the time when they too, on issues vital to them, may be the victims of judicial encroachment.

Even though we constitute a minority in the present Congress, we have full faith that a majority of the American people believe in the dual system of government which has enabled us to achieve our greatness and will in time demand that the reserved rights of the states and of the people be made secure against judicial usurpation.

> We pledge ourselves to use all lawful means to bring about a reversal of this decison which is contrary to the Constitution and to prevent the use of force in its implementation.
> In this trying period, as we all seek to right this wrong, we appeal to our people not to be provoked by the agitators and troublemakers invading our states and to scrupulously refrain from disorder and lawless acts.

With the legislatures of the eleven Southern states the Brown decision and matters related to it became a continuing obsession. Extraordinary sessions were called again and again -- in March, 1956, the Alabama legislature was in special session for the fourth time in 14 months -- and regular sessions were often so taken up with the segregation problem that little time was left for the public business which normally crowded their agenda.

Public school appropriations received much attention. Appropriation bills offered opportunities to strengthen the dikes of segregation, but a certain beneficial effect of the re-examination of the "separate-but-equal" policy also appeared here. The Mississippi legislature struggled with the problem of financing an ambitions "school equalization" program;; Governor Timmerman boasted that in South Carolina "schools for Negroes are now superior to any in the nation" as a result of a $127,000,000 construction program in which Negro schools had received 60 per cent of all funds allocated. Discounting such exaggerations, Southern states were moving with new impetus to close the gap between white and Negro school facilities. Committees were set up in all eleven

Southern states to study the problems posed by the Brown decision -- not expressly to prevent desegregation (though this became their chief objective.) Half a dozen states modified or repealed their compulsory school attendance laws, a precaution which apparently contemplated desegregation of some public schools. But budget-makers in Florida, Louisiana, South Carolina and Virginia stipulated that state appropriations would be available for segregated schools only.

Resistance to desegregation and circumvention of the Supreme Court ruling became increasingly the preoccupation [redacted] The volume of pro-segregation legislation grew steadily in 1954 and 1955, and in 1956 state assemblies launched upon a veritable legislative binge. Ingenius and imaginative politicians lay awake nights concocting schemes to baffle the NAACP and outwit the federal judiciary, and, except where one proposal duplicated or interfered with another, they all stood a good chance of being enacted into law. The legislatures of Alabama, Georgia, Mississippi, South Carolina and Virginia — in session during the first three months of 1956 — adopted no less than 42 pro-segregation measures. By the end of the year the number of such enactments in eleven Southern states had reached a total of 106, and the flood had not yet subsided.

In examining the mood of Southern legislatures it is important to note the disproportionate representation of the rural areas, and particularly of those counties with the heaviest Negro population. It was among the white people of these sections that race prejudice was most deeply rooted. The excessive influence in the legislatures of the Black Belt counties -- the fiercest strongholds of resistance to desegregation -- was striking. Patrick E. McCanley, assistant to the director of the Southern Education Reporting Service, in a study for With All Deliberate Speed pointed out:

> For example, in Alabama 16 Black Belt counties with 13.5 per cent of the state's total population have 27.3 per cent of the House representation and 28.5 per cent of the Senate seats. Georgia's 37 Black Belt counties with 11.5 per cent of the population have 19 per cent of the House seats and 22.7 per cent of the Senate seats. Fourteen Louisiana Black Belt parishes (counties) have 13.8 per cent of the House representation and 18.4 per cent in the Senate, with only 8.4 per cent of the population. Mississippi's 32 Black Belt counties have 40.9 per cent of the population, 43.9 per cent of the House seats and 48.9 per cent of the Senate seats.

The Black Belt was limited for this purpose to contiguous counties having populations over or near 50 per cent Negro. McCanley noted further that the Black Belts reelect the same representatives over greater numbers of years than do other sections, giving them "added influence in terms of prestige, committee and leadership appointments and greater parliamentary experience."

> In South Carolina, average statewide senatorial service in 1957 was 7.5 years; average service for Black Belt senators was 9.7 years. The state average in the House of Representatives was 2.9 years; average for the Black Belt representatives was 4.6 years. In Virginia, average length of service for all members of the assembly was 8.2 years; for Black Belt representatives it was 12 years...[18]

The stampede principle and a fetish of unanimity also contributed to the fever which seized the state legislatures.

The phenomenon was discernible at the congressional level in the recruitment of supporters for the Southern Manifesto. The dissenter faced the political consequences of being labeled an "integrationist," "a friend of the NAACP," etc. The resentment of extremist colleagues was not unlike that visited upon a conspirator who shrinks from a desperate enterprise upon which his comrades have embarked. The dissenter was denied support in his other unrelated objectives and excluded from important committees -- which impaired his usefulness as a legislator. There were in every state assembly at the outset, a minority, generally a substantial minority, who objected to extravagant measures of resistance to the Supreme Court ruling. A number of the earlier bills found division in debate and were passed by only moderate majorities. But, as the futility of opposition became more and more apparent, potentially farreaching enactments were adopted swiftly by a vote which, if not unanimous, was less than half a dozen votes short of that goal. The stampede sometimes began before a bill was introduced. Some of the most drastic bills adopted by the Virginia legislature were signed by more than a majority of the members of one chamber before they were thrown into the hopper. In South Carolina the Senate resolution of protest against the Supreme Court decision was signed by all members of that body before being introduced; it passed the House unanimously, (though eight Representatives recorded their preference for stronger language).

Resolutions of protest, or "interposition," against the Supreme Court ruling were adopted by the unanimous vote of the Alabama and North Carolina Senates and the unanimous vote of both houses in Louisiana and South Carolina; in the lower chambers of Alabama and North Carolina the opposing votes were four and two respectively; in Virginia opposition to such resolutions was registered by only 5 votes in the House and 2 in the Senate. In Georgia half a dozen bills to aid and encourage private schools cleared the Senate unanimously. In Louisiana a dozen pro-segregation bills were passed without a dissenting vote in either chamber. When the Florida legislature approved a five-bill program the Senate acted unanimously; in the House of Representatives only one opposing vote was cast -- that of Representative John B. Orr, Jr.

In a gesture so rare as to be sensational in the Southern scene, this young legislator declared his belief that segregation was "morally wrong." It is interesting to note that such boldness in this instance brought praise from several colleagues and a barrage of commendatory messages, and that his constituents in the relatively liberal city of Miami were to return him to office for one further term before his segregationist opposition laid him low.

The strange pile of legislation beginning to clutter the statute books of Southern states included provisions for the following: the use of police powers to prevent the admission of Negroes to white public schools; the placing of schools under the control of the governor or the state legislature, (where it was hopefully calculated they could not be reached by federal courts); the financing of litigation opposing desegregation; investigation of pro-integration and pro-segregation activities (with emphasis entirely on the former); commissions to publicize the "Southern point of view;" the closing of public schools to prevent desegregation and the sale or leasing of public school property; and aid and encouragement for private schools. In order that Negroes should be penalized equally in any school-closing, several legislatures provided for the closing of all public schools in any district in which Negroes should be enrolled in one or more schools. Among the more subtle devices, the Georgia legislature decreed that a schoolteacher could instruct only pupils of his or her own race. A number of enactments sought to hamper or frustrate the NAACP. Several legislatures memorialized their delegations in Congress urging them to seek legislation to curb the powers of the Supreme Court, and the Georgia legislature called for the impeachment of six Supreme Court justices whom it accused of "attempting to subvert the Constitution of the United States and of high crimes and misdemeanors in office."

Mississippi provided for a fine or a jail sentence for any white person attending a school also attended by Negroes. The Mississippi legislature sought to provide fines, imprisonment and civil liability for federal officers who tried to enforce desegregation, but this bill was vetoed by Governor Coleman. Coleman gave his approval, however, to an act setting up a State Sovereignty Commission to "do and perform any and all acts and things deemed necessary and proper to protect the sovereignty of the state of Mississippi and her sister states from encroachment thereon by the Federal Government or any branch, department or agency thereof. This commission was voted $250,000 for its work. For the first three years it would engage mainly in propaganda, but it was equipped with an investigating division empowered to employ secret investigators and paid informers.

Two types of action taken by nearly all Southern legislatures deserve special attention. One of these were the pupil assignment, or "pupil placement" laws setting up elaborate requirements and criteria -- "other than race" -- to regulate the assignment of children to schools. Liberal observers could see in some of these a means of effecting selective gradualism in adjusting to the Supreme Court ruling; but the object of most of their proponents was to make it possible to deny Negroes admission to white schools or to hold desegregation to a minimum when it could no longer be prevented.

In the Virginia legislature, Senator Stuart B. Carter, who rivaled the lonely courage of Florida's State Senator Orr in averring publicly a "conscientious belief in integration," supported the pupil assignment plan at one stage, saying that "the best method of making the change is to have gradual orderly integration, where necessary controlled and regulated by the people in the school district." We have already quoted Governor Hodges' reference to the Pearsall Plan of pupil assignment in North Carolina, William T. Joyner, vice-chairman of the committee which drafted the North Carolina bill, expressed the philosophy of what might be called the "moderate" supporters of pupil assignment plans when he said:

> "I think that some mixing in the schools is inevitable and must occur. I think that the result of free choice and honest assignment according to the best interest of the child will be separation so substantially complete as to be tolerable to our people.... I do not hesitate to advance my personal opinion and it is that the admission of less than 1 per cent -- for example, one-tenth of 1 per cent -- of Negro children to the schools heretofore attended only by white children is a small price to pay for the ability to keep the mixing within bounds of reasonable control.[9]

The principle of establishing criteria to insure a regulated transition was given qualified approval by federal courts. But in practical operation the plans gave rise to interminable litigation; it was difficult, for instance, to establish an intent to comply with the Supreme Court ruling when the same legislature that set up the plans enacted laws requiring the closing of schools to prevent the admission of Negroes. Nevertheless, a trickle of integration would begin in North Carolina in 1957, and in Virginia -- after revision of its law and a radical change of policy in 1959 -- integration was to proceed somewhat more extensively under a pupil placement plan.

Some pupil assignment laws were transparently designed to exclude Negroes from otherwise white schools. While the words "segregation" and "Negro" were avoided, school authorities in determining the schools in which pupils should be placed were given such factors to consider as "... the possibility or threat of friction or disorder among pupils or others; the possibility of breaches of the peace or ill will or economic retaliation within the community; the home environment of the pupil; the maintenance or severance of established social and psychological relationships with other pupils and with teachers; etc. etc."[10] Abundant excuses were thus provided for rejecting the applications of Negroes to enter white schools. Cumbersome systems of appeal -- promising long delay and possible expense, were calculated further to deter Negro applicants.

The climax of hostility on the part of Southern state legislatures was reached in a gesture called "interposition." This was a doctrine once held by many Southern leaders that a state had a right to "interpose its sovereignty" between the federal government and its people. In blunter language it meant that a state could nullify the effects of an edict of the federal government within its boundaries, and that the state in the last analysis was in fact independent. In the middle of the twentieth century the word "interposition" had been forgotten by all but historians; and the doctrine had been long since buried by the Civil War. But both were exhumed. The word became familiar to the general public and the doctrine was embraced in some degree by the legislatures of all Southern states.

The ancient doctrine was succinctly invoked in a statement issued in August 1955 by a group of white citizens in South Carolina, known as the "Committee of 52", which attracted little attention. These South Carolinians urged their legislature "to take such steps as may be necessary or desirable to interpose the sovereignty of the State of South Carolina between Federal courts and local school officials with respect to any effort of such courts to usurp state authority in the matter of public education."[11] Credit for the disinterment of interposition is given also to an elderly Virginia lawyer named William Old (who was later honored by the legislature of his state for this accomplishment by being named a circuit court judge.) But it was the Richmond News Leader which broadcast the idea over Virginia and the South and its editor Kilpatrick was rightly regarded as the "father" of modern interposition.

Old put the results of his research into a pamphlet which came to Kilpatrick's attention in October 1955, and to the latter -- now a zealous resister and groping for a formula -- Old's findings were pure gold. Most of the News Leader's editorial page was given over to interposition. The Virginia and Kentucky interposition resolutions of 1798 and 1799 were reprinted in full. Voluminous editorials, written with the solemnity of great statepapers, appeared daily alongside three-column portraits of Jefferson, Madison, Calhoun and other pre-Civil War Southern immortals. "After six weeks, and 50,000 words in the News Leader, the strange new word 'interposition' had entered the vocabulary of most adult Virginians and of politicians all across the South. Reprints of the interposition editorials had been distributed beyond the News Leader's circulation range. A group of extreme segregationists, meeting in Memphis, Tennessee, urged Virginia to 'interpose its sovereignty' when the legislature met in January and called on all Southern states to fall in line...."[12]

The five Southern states whose legislatures were in session in January 1956 raced to adopt resolutions of interposition in one form or another. Alabama had the honor of being the first across the interposition line. The Virginia legislature hagged longer over the wording, but in the debate and earlier drafts it had led the way. The Virginia General Assembly resolved in part as follows:

> That by its decision of May 17, 1954, in the school cases, the Supreme Court of the United States placed upon the Constitution an interpretation, having the effect of an amendment thereto, which interpretation Virginia emphatically disapproves;
>
> That with the Supreme Court's decision aforesaid and this resolution by the General Assembly of Virginia, a question of contested power has arisen: The court asserts, for its part, that the States did, in fact, in 1868, prohibit unto themselves, by means of the Fourteenth Amendment, the power to maintain racially separate public schools, which power certain of the States have exercised daily for more than 80 years; the State of Virginia, for her part, asserts that she has never surrendered such power....
>
> (That Virginia) anxiously concerned at this massive expansion of central authority ... is in duty bound to interpose against these most serious consequences, and earnestly to challenge the usurped authority that would inflict them upon her citizens....
>
> And be it finally resolved that until the question here asserted by the State of Virginia be settled by clear constitutional amendment, we pledge our firm intention to take all appropriate measures, legally and constitutionally available to us, to resist this illegal encroachment upon our sovereign powers and to urge upon our sister states, whose authorities over their own most cherished powers may next be imperiled, their prompt and deliberate efforts to check this and further encroachment by the Supreme Court, through judicial legislation, upon the reserved powers of the states.

Significant excerpts from resolutions adopted by five other states in 1956 are given below:

> Alabama: "(The Supreme Court decisions) are, as a matter of right, null, void, and of no effect; and the legislature of Alabama declares to all men as a matter of right, this state is not bound to abide thereby...."

Georgia: "It is the duty of the State in flagrant cases such as this to interpose its powers between its people and the efforts of said Court to assert an unlawful dominion over them."

South Carolina: "The State of South Carolina as a loyal and sovereign State of the Union will exercise the powers reserved to it under the Constitution to judge for itself of the infraction and to take such other legal measures as it may deem appropriate to protect its sovereignty and the rights of its people."

Mississippi: "Said decisions are in violation of the Constitutions of the United States and the State of Mississippi, and therefore, are considered unconstitutional, invalid and of no lawful effect within the confines of the State of Mississippi."

Louisiana: "Until the usurpation herein complained of... be settled by legal Constitutional amendment... the legislature of Louisiana does hereby solemnly declare the decision of the Supreme Court... and any similar decisions that might be rendered in connection with the public school system and public parks and recreational facilities, insofar as such decisions may affect or apply to the sovereign State of Louisiana, to be in violation of the Constitution of the United States, and of the State of Louisiana..."

New Chapter 6

The Problem of Enforcement

"The decision in Brown v. Board of Education created the greatest problem of compliance since the Marshall period." (Encyclopaedia Britannica).

The Supreme Court had said pointedly in its 1955 pronouncement: "It should go without saying that the vitality of these constitutional principles cannot be allowed to yield simply because of disagreement with them." But how in a region in hostile disagreement with its ruling was that ruling to be enforced? The question touched the foundations of the system of government under which we live.

The Russian dictator Joseph Stalin, speaking of the Roman Catholic Pope once asked scornfully: "How many divisions has he?" The Supreme Court has no divisions of soldiers at its command, and no police nor any enforcement agency. It has no direct means of invoking the power of the Government of the United States to enforce its decrees. In the normal course its place in the constitutional division of powers, its Olympian prestige and the long tradition of matter-of-fact obedience to its fiats are sufficient. But in most of the South after the Brown decision these values appeared to have lost their force. In the constitutional crisis which arose, and which would involve far more than public schools, the power of the President -- even military force -- would ultimately be used to insure compliance with limited local and specific orders of federal courts. But the broad ruling that public school segregation violated the Constitution brought no steps on the part of the national government looking to its general abolition.

The Supreme Court received no significant aid from the executive and legislative branches. President Eisenhower strove to follow a course of disenvolvement in the controversy; Congress took no action which even suggested approval of the Brown decision. On one occasion when the President was chided by congressional critics for his apparent indifference to resistance to the desegregation ruling, he replied, via special counsel: "The President would not make any assumption that the judicial branch of the Government is incapable of implementing the Supreme Court's decision."[11] To newspaper men and others, President Eisenhower spoke frequently of "progress" -- "progress" which had been made or "progress" which should be made -- but his personal opinion of the Brown decision and of school desegregation was left in some doubt. "There are very strong emotions on the other side," he once remarked -- "people that see a picture of mongrelization of the race, they call it." Calling for "education," "patience" and "moderation," he criticized "extremists" and seemed to place those working for compliance and those working for defiance together. His comment on massive gestures of resistance were in the nature more of extenuation than of rebuke. Commenting on the Southern Manifesto, the President said with singular complacency:

"Now, the first thing about the Manifesto is this: That they say they are going to use every legal means. No one in any reasonable position anywhere has talked nullification, because -- and there would be a place where we get to a very bad spot for the simple reason that I am sworn to defend and uphold the Constitution of the United States and, of course, I can never abandon or refuse to carry out my own duty.

"But, let us remember that the Supreme Court itself talked about emotionalism in this question, and it was for that reason that it said 'progress must be gradual.'"[2]

Nullification was expressly present in some of the interposition resolutions adopted by Southern state legislatures. Asked for his comment on these, the President said:

"Now this is what I say: There are adequate means of determining all of these factors. The Supreme Court has issued its own operational directives and delegated power to the district courts.

"I expect that we are going to make progress, and the Supreme Court itself said it does not expect revolutionary action suddenly executed.

"We will make progress, and I am not going to attempt to tell you how it is going to be done."[3]

Suggestions were made in many quarters that the President should invite Southern leaders to discuss the problem with him at the White House. In February 1956 Adlai E. Stevenson, Democratic nominee for the presidency in 1952 (and 1956) proposed that the President call a meeting of Southern white and Negro leaders "to explore ways and means of allaying rising tensions over racial integration in the South."[4] Governor Collins of Florida asked the President to call a conference of Southern governors and attorneys general. The Textile Workers Union of America asked him to summon the Southern governors for a specific discussion of ways to bring about integration of the schools. No such conferences were held. President Eisenhower told a news conference May 23 that he believed they would tend to inflame rather than alleviate racial tension and that the participants probably would feel compelled to stand by long-established positions.

The inaction of Congress did not signify disapproval of the Supreme Court decision. On the contrary, if members of Congress reflected the sentiments of their constituents, a large majority must have approved -- and they probably did approve -- of the desegregation ruling. A Gallup Poll in July 1954 found that, in spite of overwhelming disapproval in the South, 57 per cent of those with opinions in the nation approved of it. Those approving were, in the Far West, 68 per cent, in the Middle West, 61 per cent, and in the East, 76 per cent. However, not only was the powerful and determined Southern bloc to be reckoned with, but there was difference of opinion even among liberals as to what action, if any, Congress should take. Theodore R. McKeldin, who as governor of Maryland at this time was leading his state to compliance in good faith, was to say in 1959: "We don't need a special act... to tell us what the Supreme Court has stated rather clearly... We have the powers now, in the Presidency and in the Department of Justice to act as a nation against any state's act of rebellion against the Constitution. There is a practical question, too, as to the kind of federal integration law which would suit the condition and popular temperament of, say, Maryland and Kentucky, and at the same time those of Georgia and South Carolina." 5

On the other hand, many felt that, in view of the farreaching implications of the desegregation ruling and the extraordinary hostility to it in the South, the executive and legislative branches of the federal government should share the responsibility for its implementation. A number of plans were suggested. Governor Collins advanced a proposal in 1957 for the creation of a federal commission in each state with the primary responsibility for the direction of desegregation in public schools. The commissions, under this plan, would offer counsel to individuals and school authorities, investigate allegations that persons were being denied admission to public schools on account of race, consider any plan for desegregation upon the request of school authorities and approve or disapprove of them or direct modifications. Southern governors, to whom the plan was first submitted, were cool to any plan looking to school integration; others found the Collins plan impracticable or an encroachment upon the scope of the federal judiciary. The proposal is of interest, nevertheless, as indicative of a needed service for which no governmental machinery existed.

Senator Lyndon B. Johnson of Texas introduced a bill in the Senate in 1958 for the creation of a federal community relations service to conciliate community disagreements. His bill cautiously recognized that the requirements of the Constitution "are giving rise, or may give rise, to disagreements in communities in the various states disruptive to peaceful relations among citizens of such communities."

In the same session of Congress Senator Paul H. Douglas of Illinois, with the co-sponsorship of seventeen colleagues, introduced a bill with comprehensive provision for the legislative implementation of the desegregation ruling. This bill endorsed the Brown decision unequivocally as expressing "the moral ideals of the nation" and "the supreme law of the land." It provided for technical and financial assistance to state and local communities confronted with the problem of adjustment, including available information, surveys, national and local conferences, trained specialists and local advisory councils. An appropriation of 40 million dollars annually was contemplated to assist local governments to meet the costs of additional educational measures which might be taken to facilitate the transition. The Douglas Bill also provided for positive action on the part of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare to promote, and on the part of the Department of Justice, to force desegregation. The Secretary of HEW would be authorized to persuade local governments to begin desegregation and, in the event of their refusal, to prepare a tentative plan for desegregating a specific school district. If, after due consultation, hearings, etc., local officials refused to comply with the Secretary's approved plan, the Attorney General could institute a civil action to enforce compliance with it. The Attorney General was also authorized to proceed against any official or other person preventing, or threatening to prevent, the execution of a court desegregation order.

The bill that became the Civil Rights Act of 1957, included, under a famous Title III, provision for the initiation of desegregation suits by the Department of Justice, but Title III was deleted before the bill's passage. The Civil Rights Commission in its 1959 report would request authorization to "establish an advisory and conciliation service to assist local school officials in developing plans designed to meet constitutional requirements and local conditions...." The Commission's 1961 report would recommend: "That Congress enact legislation making it the duty of every local school board which maintains any public school from which pupils are excluded on a basis of race, to file a plan for desegregation with a designated federal agency within six months after the adoption of such legislation, said plan to call for at least a first step toward full compliance with the Supreme Court's decision in the School Segregation Cases at the beginning of the following school year, and complete desegregation as soon as practicable thereafter."

In the period here under review none of the above proposals were adopted. But they are nonetheless illuminating: they represent steps which the magnitude of the problem suggested.

space

The Supreme Court administers only the lower courts in the national judicial system, and it had given responsibility for the implementation of its ruling to them. So the task of accomplishing the vast social change fell upon the federal district courts and circuit courts of appeal. It fell upon "58 Lonely Men," the federal judges in the South -- of whom J. W. Peltason has said in his book by that title: "Perhaps not since pre-revolutionary years, when royal governors imposed imperial orders on colonials, have any American officials been placed in the center of such a cross fire, a cross fire of such intensity that even the dignity of high office offers little protection."[6]

All but five of the Southern federal judges were born in the region and, privately, a majority of them probably favored race segregation. They understood better than most the difficulties which stood in the way of adopting public school systems to the new order, and they had strong ties of friendship and sympathy with local officials and community leaders. But excepting the rebellion of four or five aging jurists, the federal judges in the South strove to carry out the instructions of the Supreme Court and to adhere to the principles laid down in its decisions. Many of these judges displayed high qualities of serenity, firmness and courage -- in some cases a degree of heroism -- in the midst of turmoil and hostile pressures. When suits were filed in federal courts, orders could be confidently expected -- though not without possibly lengthy litigation -- to admit Negroes to white schools. In the few instances where district courts failed, the federal courts of appeal were sure to bring them into line.

A number of school districts in Western and Southern Texas, like most border state districts, proceeded to remove racial barriers in response to the broad ruling that public school segregation was unconstitutional. A few scattered school districts elsewhere would accept token integration "voluntarily," -- though largely to forestall court action with expensive litigation, which they realized must come. It was hoped that the example of court-ordered integration would set off a general movement of adjustment. But, outside of Southern and Western Texas, no such movement developed in the South. For the most part departure from the system of segregated public schools in a region of 40 million people would wait upon the district-by-district action of forty-eight district judges plus ten circuit judges of the federal judiciary. It was a frail mechanism to propel a social revolution.

Moreover it was not self-starting. A federal judge cannot order a school board to cease segregating pupils until someone with proper standing invokes the jurisdiction of his court. The courts could act only when cases were brought to them; complaint of denial of constitutional rights had to be filed and adjudicated. Litigation took a variety of forms, but the standard procedure was this: a group of Negro children would apply for admission to white schools, the application would be rejected or ignored by the white school authorities, and the children and their parents, with legal counsel, would go in due course to the federal district court for relief. Negroes who were bold enough to launch upon this onerous and often dangerous operation needed advice, moral support and, above all, legal counsel. By and large there was just one source from which these could be obtained -- the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. By a caprice of history and circumstance the NAACP thus became an accessory of the enforcement mechanism. No instrumentality of government, but the NAACP, became in effect the activating agent.

We may pause here to take another look at the organization upon which this immense responsibility fell. The NAACP's forty-four year struggle for Negro rights had reached a climactic triumph in the Brown decision. Now in the undertaking to secure the implementation of that ruling it enjoyed a larger membership and more financial support and enlisted more legal talent than ever before. Its growing roll of dues-paying members -- about 300,000 in 1956 -- did not give the full picture of its representative capacity; it spoke for nineteen million Negroes in the United States.

It had a headquarters office in New York, staffed by about one hundred employees, and its members met regularly in 1,100 branches scattered widely over the nation, over half of them in the Southern and border states. Dues collections and special donations to the NAACP and its Legal Defense and Educational Fund gave it an income in 1955 of $1,179,605.

Although the great majority of its members were Negroes, there were also white members, and white individuals had been prominent among its leadership from its beginning. Its president was Arthur B. Spingarn, a white man; another white man, Lloyd Garrison, was chairman of its legal committee. Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, widow of the late President Roosevelt, was among a distinguished group, white and Negro, on its board of directors. In 1958 its members would include Herbert H. Lehman (former senator and former governor of New York); Averill Harriman and Nelson A. Rockefeller (successively governor of New York), Governor G. Mennen Williams of Michigan, Chester Bowles (former governor of Connecticut), Walter Reuther, Harry Golden and Richard Cardinal Cushing. United Nations Undersecretary Ralph Bunche and Robert C. Weaver (later Administrator of the Housing and Home Finance Agency in the Kennedy Administration) were among nationally famous Negroes high in NAACP councils.

The chief spokesmen for the NAACP were its Negro executive secretaries -- Walter White, the veteran crusader, who died in 1955, and Roy Wilkins, the dynamic and personable leader who succeeded him. Thurgood Marshall, the brilliant Negro lawyer who led the successful fight for the historic Supreme Court decision, (now a federal circuit judge) was a hero to many. Marshall and his associates in that fight -- Robert L. Carter, Jack Greenberg, Louis T. Redding, James Nabrit, George E. C. Hayes, and Spotswood W. Robinson -- continued to be the dominant influence in the important legal phase of NAACP activities. The legal committees of local branches which had primary responsibility for lawsuits, were aided and guided by Marshall and his staff.

The wide gulf between the thinking of white people and that of Negroes in the South -- at all cultural levels -- was nowhere better illustrated than in their attitudes toward the NAACP. The flood of vilification and the incessantly repeated smears had led many, even among white people who were otherwise moderately disposed, to regard the NAACP as an evil influence. To most white Southerners it was a mysteriously diabolical thing. In contrast, Southern Negroes looked up to the NAACP with admiration and respect, bordering on reverence; to most of them it was above criticism, an institution which all men of good will should support. The attitudes of political leaders North and South toward the NAACP offered another striking contrast: in the North politicians cultivated its friendship, were glad to appear publicly with NAACP leaders; in the South any friendly contact with an NAACP official might be enough to end a politician's career.

The basic complaint of Southern segregationists, underneath the synthetic charges of Communism and miscellaneous villainies, was that the NAACP was "stirring up" the Negroes and thus inciting racial turmoil. The NAACP did emphatically encourage Negroes to seek what the Supreme Court had declared to be their constitutional rights, but it insisted at all times upon orderly recourse to courts of law. It may have been a blessing even from the point of view of those Southerners who believed most strongly in segregation that an inevitable rebellion on the part of the Negroes against subservient status should have been guided by an organization so devoted to peaceful procedure.

Addressing an NAACP convention a few weeks after the Supreme Court decree of May 31, 1955, Marshall said: "In all school districts we will insist that the first and minimum evidence of 'good faith' shall be the recognition by the school board that students cannot be assigned on the basis of race and that racial segregation is abolished in that school system. Next, we will insist that a plan for desegregation be worked out as soon as possible but not later than September 1955. Third, we will insist that some concrete steps toward desegregation be put in effect the next term, beginning this fall. Fourth, we will insist that the plan include step-by-step desegregation during the next school year. Finally, we will insist that desegregation be completed not later than the school term beginning September 1955."[7]

This ambitious program was not inconsonant with the momentum of desegregation in the border states. But with respect to the former Confederate states of the South, as we look back upon it, it seems a fantasy without relevance to the actual situation which was developing. Ten years later it would still be an unrealistic undertaking.

First to receive district court attention in the South were the two cases -- that of Clarendon County, South Carolina, and that of Prince Edward County, Virginia -- which had been remanded specifically by the Supreme Court. In July three-judge courts heard each of these cases and in each ordered that discrimination in the admission of children to public schools should be terminated "with all deliberate speed." But no date was fixed for compliance. These two Black Belt counties were among the most difficult communities in the entire South from the standpoint of both practical obstacles and intransigent hostility among white citizens. Years would go by and desegregation would be accomplished in many other Southern localities before the first Negro would attend school with white pupils in either of these.

A statement made by United States Circuit Judge John J. Parker, who presided in the hearing of the Clarendon County case proved one of the most important glosses of the Brown decisions; it would figure prominently in segregationist planning and argument thereafter. Judge Parker said:

"It (the Supreme Court) has not decided that the states must mix persons of different races in the schools or must require them to attend schools or must deprive them of the right of choosing the schools they attend. What it has decided, is that a state may not deny any person on account of race the right to attend any school that it maintains... Nothing in the Constitution or in the decision of the Supreme Court takes away from the people freedom to choose the schools they attend. The Constitution, in other words, does not require integration. It does not forbid such segregation as occurs as the result of voluntary action. It merely forbids the use of governmental machinery to enforce segregation."[8]

Thus compliance with the ruling would not necessitate as drastic and sweeping an operation as some supposed; with careful planning and a gradual program, it could be accomplished in the most difficult situations. But the statement was widely interpreted to mean that desegregation could be postponed until Negroes took positive steps in each locality to secure admission to white schools. Segregationist efforts were intensified to prevent Negroes from doing that.

However, formal application was already being made by hundreds of Negro children in widely scattered districts for admission to white schools. This first step was in the form of petitions filed with local school authorities. By September desegregation petitions had been filed -- 13 in Alabama, 4 in Florida, 5 in Georgia, 2 in Louisiana, 5 in Mississippi, 14 in North Carolina, 10 in South Carolina, 2 in Tennessee, and 6 in Virginia.[9] A majority of the signers of these petitions yielded to segregationist pressure and withdrew their names; many of the petitions were withdrawn; most would be ignored by school authorities.

Elsie Horn, who with six other Negro parents withdrew a suit against the board of education in Montgomery County, North Carolina, said she had been asked if she would like it if she sent her "kids to a white school and they came up missing or didn't come back at all." Intimidation in Mississippi and Alabama effectually put a stop to Negro applications for enrollment in white schools here for years to come. In Yazoo County, Mississippi, the Citizens' Council published a full-page advertisement in a local paper giving "an authentic list of the purported signers to an NAACP communication to our school board." Many of the signers promptly lost their jobs; a plumbing contractor was taken off the two construction jobs which he had under way and was refused plumbing supplies by a wholesale house. Economic reprisals against the signers of school desegregation petitions were reported in three Alabama Counties, Dallas, Bullock and Selma. In Selma, the county seat of Dallas, White Citizens' Council Chairman Alston Keith estimated that of the 29 Negro petition signers "about 16 -- probably all of them who had jobs -- were fired," explaining that some were self-employed.

The economic reprisals against Negro signers of school desegregation petitions were carried to the most sweeping and protracted extremes in the South Carolina city of Orangeburg; but the Orangeburg episode was even more significant in that it represented the first important instance of Negro retaliation. For several years after the Brown decision economic pressure was widely hailed among segregationists of the Ku Klux Klan -Citizens' Council school as a sure means of extinguishing Negro initiative. It was used also to intimidate white business men who refused to join Citizens' Councils or who betrayed some measure of sympathy with the Negro cause. But economic reprisals could not be carried out on a large scale without loss or hardship to some of their authors. In the end the Negro himself -- in his campaign for access to lunch counters and various public facilities and for equal employment opportunity -- would use the economic weapon more systematically and with dramatic effect. Judge Brady had said in Black Monday: "It will be inconvenient upon the white women of the South to discharge their maids and cooks, but this can be done." But he little understood the Southern housewife -- who would regard doing her own floor-scrubbing and dishwashing a high price to pay even for state rights and white supremacy! Few economic relationships between whites and Negroes could be terminated without some harm to both parties. And in Orangeburg the Negroes struck back.

In this city of 17,000 population the economic struggle began when 57 Negroes petitioned the school board in July 1955, asking that immediate steps be taken to "reorganize the public schools on a non-discriminatory basis." The Orangeburg Times Democrat said: "The petition stunned citizens who had taken pride in the equalization of schools and of teachers' salaries, and who were sincerely convinced that they had dealt fairly and intelligently with racial problems...."

Indignant whites promptly organized a Citizens' Council and 3,000 gathered in a mass meeting, at which a campaign of reprisals was launched against the petitioners, their families and members of the local NAACP. In the January 24, 1957 issue of The Reporter magazine Edward Gamarekian gave this picture of the economic sanctions which were applied:

"Those who worked for white employers were fired. Those who rented from white landlords were evicted. Those who bought from white merchants and suppliers were denied further credit and asked to settle outstanding accounts at once. Some were no longer able to buy in some places, even for cash.

"Mayor Jennings, who was the president of the Orangeburg Coca-Cola Bottling Company, the Palmetto Baking Company, and the Orangeburg Ice & Fuel Company, cut off the supply of Cokes, bread, and ice cream to three Negro grocers and a gas station owner who signed the petition. The Coble Dairy stopped the delivery of milk to these grocers and to all the petitioners on its home delivery routes. The owner of a taxi company was threatened with the loss of his Western Union delivery contract and his drivers were harassed by the local police. A Shell service-station operator was forced out of business by the owner-distributor.

"Petitioners were refused new insurance policies. Immediate payment was demanded on loans and mortgages where agreements were oral or loosely drawn. Banks, loan companies, and individual lenders refused to give any further financial assistance. Teachers related to petitioners were threatened with the loss of their jobs when their contracts expired at the end of the school year. A few of the petitioners receiving welfare aid were told it would be cut off."

The Negroes, who constituted 63 per cent of the population of Orangeburg county, and united generally behind the petitioners, replied with the only weapon available to them -- the boycott. They ceased to patronize the white merchants who were leading the reprisal movement. The fall of 1955 and the winter of 1955-1956 was a period of business stagnation in Orangeburg, and one of privation for many Negroes. Food, clothing, money, and messages of sympathy were sent to the Orangeburg Negro community by the NAACP and various churches, organizations and individuals in the North. On the white side, one grocer went out of business, the laundry closed its pick-up station in the Negro section and many merchants saw their sales dwindle. By the spring of 1956 the white business community was ready in effect to cry enough; economic peace returned to Orangeburg.

On the basic issue -- the desegregation of Orangeburg public schools -- the Negroes lost: there would be no public school desegregation in South Carolina for long years to come. The case was not taken to federal court. But 25 of the petitioners stood fast to the end, and it was impressively demonstrated that the economic weapon was not the exclusive property of the white man.

NAACP lawyers were kept busy. A variety of problems claimed their attention in the South -- including the unfinished business of removing racial barriers in institutions of higher learning. Litigation was under way for the desegregation of universities in Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Louisiana and Tennessee. In several states NAACP lawyers found themselves engaged in a struggle to defend the very existence of the

Clearcopy Onion Skin

NAACP locally, and its right to operate. They were also prodding lagging public school districts in the border states, and in the South a few hardy petitioners were laboring through the application procedure to the filing of school desegregation suits. A few scattered suits seeking the admission of Negroes to white public schools had been filed during the period when the cases leading to the Brown decision were in litigation, and had been held in abeyance pending the outcome of that supreme effort. These cases were now re-activated. In Southern and border states by mid-1956 federal courts had handled 95 suits related to the problem, 65 of them requesting desegregation of public schools.

Desegregation litigation was under way before the end of 1955 in Anderson County (Clinton) and Nashville, Tennessee; Big Spring, Wichita Falls, Mansfield and Dallas, Texas; Atlanta, Georgia; Pulaski County, Virginia; Bearden, Arkansas; two North Carolina counties; and two Louisiana parishes; suits were filed early in 1956 in Miami, Florida; Charlottesville and Newport News, Virginia; and Little Rock, Arkansas. In Atlanta, New Orleans and Bearden, and in Anderson and Pulaski Counties, pre-1954 suits were revived. In McDowell County, North Carolina, an old equalization suit was changed to one requesting desegregation. In Little Rock NAACP lawyers sought to force quicker action by a school board that had announced a gradual desegregation program.

Clearcopy Onion Skin

Two litigations proceeded without NAACP involvement: in Bearden, where local Negroes moved independently, and in Hoxie, Arkansas, where a school board sought an injunction to prevent segregationist interference with a desegregation program which it had voluntarily adopted.

Initial rulings in the desegregation cases were generally inclusive: in most cases school boards were allowed more time without a fixed deadline or the door was left open for further litigation; when ground could no longer be found for delay in district courts, appeal was nearly always had to higher federal courts. Nevertheless, as the beginning of the 1956-1957 school term approached, two cases were headed for a stormy climax. In Mansfield, Texas, the federal circuit court of appeals had overruled a district court that refused to order immediate desegregation, and had rejected a request of the school board for more time. In Clinton, Tennessee, the Anderson County school board was preparing to comply with an order issued by Federal District Judge Robert L. Taylor in January, that the county high schools should be desegregated at a time not later than "the beginning of the fall term of the year 1956."

Mansfield and Clinton

For students of the public school desegregation problem the month of September each year was a time of anxiety and suspense. That was when summer vacations ended and schools opened for a new term. School-opening sometimes occurred in the last days of August and in several instances desegregation difficulties caused it to be postponed until October or even early November, but September was generally the month of school-opening, of desegregation attempts and of crisis. September 1956 saw convulsions at Sturgis and Clay and reassuring progress in Louisville, as we have already related, in Kentucky; it also saw disturbing crises in Texas and Tennessee. National magazines and news media were hard put to deploy reporters and photographers to scenes of turmoil sputtering simultaneously in those three states.

Texas furnished the first clearcut example of failure of enforcement of a federal court order for desegregation of a public school. It furnished an example also of failure in the case of an institution of higher learning, which -- unless the anomalous outcome of the attempt of Miss Lucy to enter the University of Alabama be taken as a failure of enforcement of a court order -- was the first in this category. The performance of Texas was in some respects paradoxical. Among the eleven Southern states Texas had the best record of compliance with the Brown decision. While eight states made no move toward public school desegregation

In 1955 and 1956, racial barriers in school enrollment were disappearing fairly briskly in this state. The Supreme Court of Texas in October 1955 had accepted the decision of the United States Supreme Court, and declared the provisions of the constitution and statutes of Texas requiring public school segregation void. Segregation had come quietly to an end in the three high schools of Austin, the state capital. By the fall of 1956 desegregation had taken place in 104 of the state's 1,857 public school districts. Negroes had been admitted also to twenty-nine colleges and universities that previously had been restricted to white students, nineteen of these institutions being publicly-supported and ten being church-supported.

But peaceful adjustment to the new order had been almost entirely confined to the wide expanse of western and southern Texas where Negroes were few. In a populous northeastern one-third of the state, in which approximately 90 per cent of the Negro population resided, a radically different spirit prevailed. This section resembled Louisiana and Mississippi in its deeply rooted race prejudice. The Ku Klux Klan had been active here in the 1940's; lynchings were still remembered. A report (later proven false) that a white woman had been raped, had precipitated a sensational race riot in Beaumont in 1943, resulting in two deaths, one white and one Negro. The hostility of this region to desegregation was reflected in the state administration and in the state political hierarchy.

East Texas produced in one week the two incidents in which federal court desegregation orders were allowed to yield to local hostility -- by, or with the acquiescence of, state authorities. Texarkana Junior College, a segregated white institution, had been ordered by a federal district court to cease discriminating on account of race and specifically to admit two named Negro students. Local opposition was encouraged and in effect endorsed by Dr. W. H. Stillwell, president of the college, who told an audience of protesting citizens: "If integration results in lowering educational standards, it is not only your right but your duty to resist it."[1] An effigy of a Negro was hanged on the campus, a cross was burned, and a shotgun blast was fired at a filling station owned by a Negro leader. Four Texas Rangers came to preserve order. They arrested four Negro teen-agers for throwing stones at an automobile containing white youths, but the Ranger in charge refused to escort the Negro students through the white mob surrounding the college. The Negroes were driven back and the integration attempt was given up -- though order was restored in Texarkana.

The village of Mansfield on the outskirts of Fort Worth presented the first test of court-ordered public school desegregation in hostile East Texas, and one of the first in the South. Mansfield had a population of approximately 1,500, of whom some 350 persons were colored. A one-room schoolhouse without indoor plumbing had been replaced in 1954 by a four-room grade school for Negroes, but Negro high school students still had to ride approximately forty miles daily by public bus to attend high school in Fort Worth, the schedule involving a two-hour wait in that city. In April 1955 the Negroes complained to the school board of a variety of school deficiencies, including this hardship, which they hoped to have relieved by the assignment of a regular school bus. When they were unable to secure satisfaction, some of the bolder Negroes decided to apply for the admission of their children to Mansfield High School, a segregated school for whites only. After unsuccessful efforts in July and August and at school-opening in September, a suit was brought in federal court in October on behalf of twelve Negro students. In November Federal District Judge Joe E. Estes dismissed their petition as "premature and precipitate" -- on the ground that the school authorities had not had sufficient time for the transition to an integrated system. In June 1956 the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals reviewed the case and ruled that, the obstacle being only "a difficulty arising out of the local climate of opinion," the defendants should have been ordered to abolish segregation in Mansfield High School -- "acting promptly, and completely uninfluenced by private and public opinion as to the desirability of desegregation...." On remand, the district court issued the necessary orders and a plea for a year's postponement was denied.

During the summer the little community was subjected to a steadily increasing barrage of anti-Negro and anti-integration propaganda, in which the local newspaper joined. A cross was burned on August 22, and another on August 23, in the Negro section of the town. On August 28 a dummy representing a Negro was hung over Mansfield's main street, with signs reading THIS NEGRO TRIED TO GO TO A WHITE SCHOOL and WOULDN'T THIS BE A HORRIBLE WAY TO DIE? Other Negro effigies were hanged on the flagpole (in lieu of the national flag) and over the entrance to Mansfield High School. A White Citizens' Council was formed.

Registration at the school took place on Thursday and Friday, August 30 and 31, and -- after the Labor Day week-end -- on Tuesday, September 4. A turbulent crowd of whites, sometimes estimated at as high as five hundred, surrounded the school each registration day, prepared to turn back any Negroes who appeared. On September 4, the Rev. C. W. Clark, an Episcopal clergyman from Fort Worth, who urged a "Christian" attitude, was harassed and had to be rescued by a Texas Ranger. Two Rangers had been sent to Mansfield by Governor Allen Shivers to restore order.

Governor Shivers was faced squarely with the question which in time would confront three other Southern governors: whether to preserve order in compliance with federal court desegregation rulings or to preserve order by causing, or allowing, those rulings to be disobeyed. In a crisis which occurred almost simultaneously in Tennessee, the governor of that state chose the former course. The governor of Texas chose the latter. Governor Shivers announced on August 30 that he had urged "that the Mansfield School Board go ahead and transfer out of the district any scholastics, white or colored, whose attendance or attempts to attend Mansfield High School would be reasonably calculated to incite violence," and that he had "asked Colonel Garrison (of the Texas Rangers) to instruct his men to arrest anyone, white or colored, whose actions are such as to represent a threat to the peace at Mansfield."

The governor added:

"I am taking this action not in a spirit of defiance of federal authority but as the only course I can conscientiously pursue in upholding my constitutional responsibility for maintaining law and order in Texas. Should the resulting actions on the part of the Mansfield school authorities be construed as contempt of the federal courts, I respectfully suggest that the charge should be laid against the Governor and not the local people.

"It is not my intention to permit the use of state officers or troops to shoot down or intimidate Texas citizens who are making orderly protest against a situation instigated and agitated by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. At the same time we will protect persons of all races who are not themselves contributing to the breach of peace. If this course is not satisfactory under the circumstances to the federal government, I respectfully suggest further that the Supreme Court, which is responsible for the order, be given the task of enforcing it."[2]

Calm was restored in Mansfield; but Mansfield High School has remained segregated to this writing, eight years later. The mob accomplished its purpose. The procedure followed by the governor of Texas had in it an element of rebellion which, when manifested later elsewhere -- on a larger scale, in a more spectacular fashion and more sharply under the eyes of the nation and the world -- would invite the intervention of federal military forces. But in tiny Mansfield the incident was quickly closed.

The Mansfield incident drew from President Eisenhower a significant revelation of his attitude toward the Brown decision and the problems that it posed in the South. In his press conference of September 5, 1956 the following colloquy took place:

> Robert E. Clark, International News Service: Do you think there is anything that can be said or done on the national level to help local communities meet this problem without violence?
>
> The President: Well, in each case I think the local governments have moved promptly to stop the violence. And let us remember this: Under the law the federal government cannot, on the ordinary normal case of keeping order and preventing rioting, cannot move into a state until the state is not able to handle the matter.
>
> Now, in the Texas case there was -- the attorney for the students did report this violence and asked help, which apparently was the result of unreadiness to obey a federal court order.
>
> But before anyone could move, the Texas authorities had moved in and order was restored, so the question became unimportant.
>
> Sarah McClendon, El Paso Times: Mr. President, in doing so, Governor Allan Shivers sent Rangers to defy the court order, reassign out the Negro pupils, and said in a public statement which was carried in the newspapers:
>
> "I defy the federal government," he said, "Tell the federal courts if they want to come after anyone to come after me and cite me in this matter."
>
> I wonder if you have discussed this with anyone in the Department of Justice?
>
> The President: I have not discussed it because you are quoting both an order that I have not read and a statement that I have not seen.
>
> Now, I have -- we have -- actually sent for the district court order to know what it says. I don't know what it says. And remember that the Supreme Court placed in the hands of the district judges the primary responsibility for insuring that progress in every sector was made.
>
> Now, just exactly what Governor Shivers said I don't know. This is the first I have heard of it.
>
> John L. Steele, Time magazine: With the schools opening up this week and next in places of serious tension I wonder if there is anything you would like to say, through us, to the younger people who are going to school regarding this problem?

The President: Well, I can say what I have said so often: It is difficult through law and through force to change a man's heart. It seems to me that all of us who are so interested in this question of equality of rights regardless of religion and of race and color should do more about it. I try to miss no opportunity to urge people -- I have done it; I have asked the clergy in and I have asked them to help. I have asked educators in; I have asked them to help.

Whenever I see a governor I ask him to help.

But I do believe that we must all, regardless of our calling in this world, help to bring about a change in spirit so that extremists on both sides do not defeat what we know is a reasonable, logical conclusion to this whole affair, which is recognition of equality of men.

Now, there -- the South is full of people that are adamant and are so filled with prejudice that they can't keep -- they even resort to violence; and the same way on the other side of the thing; the people who want to have the whole matter settled today.

This is a question of leading and training and teaching people, and it takes some time, unfortunately.

Arthur Sylvester, Newark (N.J.) News: Mr. President, in view of your statement just now, do you endorse the finding of the Supreme Court on segregation or merely accept it as the Republican platform does?

The President: I think it makes no difference whether or not I endorse it. What I say is they -- the Constitution is as the Supreme Court interprets it; and I must conform to that end and do my very best to see that it is carried out in this country.

Robert G. Spivak, New York Post: Governor Shivers, when he made his announcement last week, ordered the removal of Negro students from the Mansfield school after mob action had been in effect in that area. I wonder if you think that that is a surrender to mob rule?

The President: Well, you don't know for how long he has ordered this. I don't know whether he has ordered the permanent transfer of these people or until the situation is under control.

The -- I want to re-emphasize this -- Certainly, every liberal will be very jealous of protecting the locality's right to execute the police power in this country.

When police power is executed habitually by the -- and exercised habitually by the federal government we are in a bad way. So, until states show their inability or their refusal to grapple with this question properly, which they haven't yet, at least as any proof has been admitted, we'd better be very careful about moving in and exercising police power.

Clinton, Tennessee, received the biggest headlines of September 1956. The agony of Clinton was a demonstration above all of the incendiary capabilities of visiting agitators in a peace-loving community. It was a reminder also of a related phenomenon that would continue to aggravate and expand disorders in the South, and one which needs to be borne in mind by law enforcement authorities everywhere. That is the universal availability today of automobile transportation. Hoodlums and lovers of excitement, of whom every community has its share -- not to mention Negrophobes and pro-segregation extremists -- from as far as a hundred miles are able to converge upon any point of seething unrest within a few hours and return to their homes the same night. Riots, therefore, are not necessarily spontaneous or of local instigation. Those in Clinton were neither. The Clinton story was exciting fare for newspaper and magazine readers; it was one of villains and heroes, of hysteria and courageous common sense, of irresponsible fanaticism and steadfast dedication to the public good, of drama, tragedy and pathos -- ending at long last in the triumph of embattled decency. It illuminated many aspects of the problem of the transition to the new order in the South and merits examination in some detail.

Clinton was a pleasant town in Anderson County in the Cumberland Mountains of East Tennessee, about fifteen miles northwest of the metropolis of Knoxville -- where Clinton Negroes had been sent to a segregated high school hitherto. It had a population of 3,712, including 220 non-whites, by the 1950 census. In the federally-run "atomic city" of Oak Ridge, nine miles north of Clinton, high schools had been peacefully integrated a year earlier. It is to be noted, too, that the desegregation controversy here was devoid of any suggestion of nostalgic Confederate loyalty; this section of Tennessee had stood with the Union in the Civil War.

The Anderson County school board, which had charge of the Clinton high school, had been involved in federal court litigation since 1950. Once the Brown decision appeared, thoughtful citizens of the area had sensed that it would be implemented before long in the local case. When in January 1956 the district court issued a definitive order for the desegregation of Clinton High School, the town authorities resolved to do everything possible to insure a smooth and peaceful transition. D. J. Brittain, Jr., the high school principal, instituted a program of theme assignments and debates to make students aware of their coming responsibilities. The correspondent of the scrupulously objective Southern School News wrote in August for its September issue: "Based on interviews with parents and other citizens in the community, it is fair to describe their attitude as one of resignation."

Both before and during the turmoil that came, the performance of local officials was on the whole exemplary; and they were supported by the town's leading business and professional men. Horace Wells, editor of the local weekly newspaper, received the 1957 University of Southern Illinois Elijah P. Lovejoy Award for "realistic devotion to law and order." The faculty and a large majority of the students of Clinton High School behaved admirably. The police power of the state was exerted on the side of order within the law.

School was scheduled to open Monday, August 27, 1956. On August 23, the Anderson County school board reaffirmed its intention, announced the previous autumn, "to comply with any and all court mandates...."

But on Saturday afternoon, August 25, John Kasper arrived in town. This roving missionary of white supremacy, whom we met in an earlier chapter, immediately started buttonholing people on the street and, as he later testified in court, "Went from door to door and talked with each neighbor about the pending integration." Sunday he told a little crowd gathered in front of the courthouse that "people are superior to courts," and urged the students present to picket the high school and stay away from classes. His inflammatory crusade began to arouse apprehension. Town and county officials, editor Wells and others met Sunday afternoon to plan for the protection of the school on Monday -- and to decide what to do about Kasper. When efforts to persuade him to leave town failed, Kasper was arrested on charges of inciting to riot and vagrancy.

Monday -- with Kasper in jail -- twelve Negro and 715 white students began attending classes together at Clinton High School. Some disorder occurred outside the school, where a crowd of about fifty had gathered, but, inside, the Negro students were received peacefully, even with some cordiality. One of their number, Jo Ann Allen, an attractive fourteen-year-old junior -- drawn out in friendly questioning by her teacher -- was elected vice-president of her homeroom class.

Tuesday attendance at the school reached a full 806. But John Kasper was free again. Tried at nine A.M., and his case dismissed for want of evidence, he betook himself to the high school and told the principal to "run the Negroes off or resign." "I told him," Brittain said later, "I would resign if 51 per cent of the parents with students in school wanted it."[3] Kasper went to work distributing anti-Brittain signs demanding that the principal resign. Tuesday evening he delivered a fiery speech to several hundred on the courthouse square.

The next day, Brittain, who had been bombarded with anonymous phone calls -- some of them threatening his life -- called an assembly of the students and turned it over to Jerry Shattuck, president of the student council; he told Shattuck to conduct a poll while teachers and principal were outside of the auditorium. The vote of confidence in the principal was unanimous. It was followed by a singing of the school song -- hearing which, Brittain returned and received an ovation. He asked the students to poll their parents when they got home. The returns from this poll were 447 to 6 in favor of Brittain.

There was a crowd of over one hundred outside the school Wednesday. Negro students now were attacked or chased; some were slipped out of the back door of the school to protect them from the mob. In the evening about one thousand gathered in the square to hear Kasper. His speech was interrupted by a federal marshal. The marshal served a temporary restraining order with notification of a hearing the next day on a permanent injunction. But Kasper resumed his harangue.

Thursday, August 30, his federal court hearings began, and he was jailed again. Kasper would remain in jail for the next eight days -- the period of greatest turmoil in Clinton.

Many who have analyzed the crisis have concluded that this community would have adjusted itself to the school change without serious difficulty if John Kasper had stayed away. Certainly this tall, brooding fanatic -- with his tone of literate sophistication and his ability to cast a strange spell over the ignorant -- was the foremost kindler of the blaze that ignited there. He aroused hundreds -- even thousands -- and a few score became his slavish disciples. But there were other factors. The Clinton area was not without its criminal element; and practically all its white citizens objected to the mixing of races in public schools. Moreover, Kasper had many allies and coreligionists from afar. They were all too ready to carry on the work which he had started while he languished behind prison bars.

Clinton had had no segregationist organization; now several imported ones got into the picture. Emmissaries of the Tennessee Federation for Constitutional Government had arrived in Clinton before Kasper. Incidentally, TFCG had filed suit in the state court demanding that state funds be cut off from Mansfield High School and that county officials be restrained from admitting Negroes to it. (Five of the fifteen local residents listed as complainants said they did not understand that their names would be used in the suit and four took legal action to have their names removed.) Judge Taylor rejected the petition on August 28.

Without Kasper, a crowd of about three hundred persons milled around the school Thursday -- hurling stones, tomatoes and epithets at the Negroes when they left for home. Three youths were arrested. A score of miscellaneous segregationists harangued the crowd on the square in the evening. Friday, attendance at the school dropped to 446, including ten Negroes. Meanwhile, in the federal court, Kasper was found guilty of contempt and sentenced to one year in prison.

Friday night saw a kind of pandemonium. One Asa, or "Ace," Carter had arrived in town from Alabama. Among the roving segregationist agitators of 1955 and 1956, Carter a busy organizer of both Ku Klux Klan and White Citizens' Councils, was less famous only than Kasper himself. He came to substitute for Kasper at the Friday night mass meeting. If Carter lacked the latter's mystical magnetism, he was no less capable of setting a large crowd on fire. He attacked Negroes, the NAACP, the Supreme Court and the "carpetbagging judge that put Kasper in jail" -- and left immediately after his speech. (Incidentally, he launched a movement for a Clinton White Citizens' Council; local segregationists were signing up when he departed.) The crowd quickly became a rioting mob which spread over the town, shouting, "We want Kasper!" Some marched to the mayor's home and threatened to dynamite it. The cars of Negro tourists were attacked. Crowds of frenzied teenagers began blocking traffic on Highway No. 25, which is a major north-south road and Clinton's main street. Cars carrying Negroes were stopped and tilted, windows and windshields were smashed and air was let out of tires. The rioting continued until about one A. M. The harried police made no arrests: to have sent two officers to escort a prisoner to jail would have immobilized one-third of Clinton's six-man force!

Saturday the Clinton board of aldermen declared the town in a state of emergency and issued formal requests to the governor of Tennessee on the one hand and to citizens of Clinton on the other to assist in restoring order. Sheriff Glad Woodward joined the town board in the appeal to the governor, which was put in writing and flown to Nashville by chartered plane. Governor Clement also received approximately fifty telegrams from Anderson County asking for help. Meantime a volunteer force of auxiliary police was quickly formed in Clinton. Leo Grant, Jr. a 28-year-old lawyer who took the lead in this, related afterward: "Forty-seven were rounded up in all -- preachers, doctors, clerks -- and most of us mighty scared, but also mighty provoked."[4]

The rally Saturday night was sponsored by five organizations previously foreign to little Clinton -- the Tennessee Federation for Constitutional Government, the Pro-Southerners, the White Citizens' Councils, the Tennessee Society to Maintain Segregation and the States' Rights Council of Tennessee. The crowd began to gather soon after six P.M. and by eight it had reached an estimated two thousand.

The story from then on suggested a moving picture melodrama, though its climax might have been considered too neat for plausible fiction. We let a reporter for the Chattanooga Times tell it, noting that the facts are amply borne out by other witnesses. This happened in an American town in the middle of the twentieth century!

> Gradually, at one corner of the courthouse square, a crowd gathered. At its center was the hard nucleus of teen-age hoodlums and segregation extremists who had been the leaders of the last riot. They milled about, shouting about "nigger-lovers," "coon-hunting" and "let's run the niggers out."
>
> The situation was rapidly getting out of hand. Leo Grant, burly 220-pound commander of the "home guards," wearing a .45 pistol and carrying a sub-machine gun, mustered the regulars and volunteers in a skirmish line across the courthouse lawn.
>
> They moved, shoulder to shoulder, toward the crowd. In civilian clothes and carrying shotguns, rifles, an assortment of pistols and clubs, they resembled a colonial Minute Man platoon setting off against the British.
>
> They reached the mob and halted. The police and the mob stood face to face. A foot apart. Neither gave an inch. The air was so charged with electric tension you almost could have lighted a cigarette on it.
>
> Grant ran back into the courthouse and returned with tear gas grenades. The police line drew back.

"Psst! Psst!" Three grenades exploded in the crowd and gas billowed over the lawn. The crowd began scattering. Three more grenades followed.

But the tough element which was giving this town such a difficult time began assembling again. The police, regulars and volunteers, drew into a knot near the courthouse.

"Let's take their guns and kill the 'nigger-loving ----," someone in the mob shouted. More shouts went up. The mob was on the rampage again, madder than ever. Another minute and the war would be on.

At that precise moment, over the hill southeast of town, came 39 highway patrol cars. They moved down on the town, 39 sirens wailing, all 39 red dome lights flashing. They sped down the hill, turned with tires screaming, and circled the courthouse square. They screeched to a halt.

Out of the first car stepped Gregg O'Rear, 6 feet, 7 inches tall, 290 pounds, two stars of a highway patrol inspector glistening on his shoulder, his hand on his pistol, his campaign hat cocked over his right eye, a grim expression on his face.

He walked down the middle of Main Street, followed by 109 state troopers carrying riot guns and submachine guns at the ready, and night sticks.

.....

Deadly silence fell....[5]

Throughout the disorders in Clinton the animosity displayed by the rioters toward representatives of news media was second only to their rage against Negroes. Fearful that reports and pictures would be used against them, they attacked photographers and reporters and smashed or damaged photographic equipment.

Sunday at about noon the National Guard detachment moved in to relieve the state troopers -- 633 battle equipped guardsmen behind seven M-41 tanks and three armored personnel carriers, under the command of State Adjutant General Joe W. Henry. Further disorders occurred Sunday night and Monday (Labor Day)

-- the nightly rally in the square was attempted again, until a crowd of 1,000 was dispersed by two platoons of guardsmen with bayonets fixed -- but, as the military made their presence felt, the community gradually quieted down. On Monday General Henry issued stern orders for the town: outdoor public-speaking, parking cars or assembling in the courthouse square after six P.M. and the use of public address systems out of doors were prohibited.

The unrest having spread to the nearby town of Oliver Springs, two tanks and 71 guardsmen were dispatched to quell rioting there.

Tuesday, September 4, attendance at the high school dropped to 266 including nine brave Negroes; but it increased daily thereafter until it reached a total of 652, including all twelve Negro pupils, by September 15. The last contingent of the National Guard withdrew on September 11. The town police force had been doubled and the sheriff's deputies had been multiplied until nearly 200 local law enforcement officers were ready for any further emergency.

On Thursday, September 6, Federal District Judge Taylor granted Kasper right to bail, and issued a permanent injunction against further interference with desegregation. Friday two Clinton admirers put up the required $10,000, and Kasper was released. On September 25 Kasper went to jail again, briefly, until released on another bond, of $2,000 -- this time under a different jurisdiction. The reader will be taxed, as the public was, to keep up with Kasper's legal vicissitudes. He was arraigned now in the Anderson County Criminal Court, after grand jury indictment, under Tennessee law, on charges of sedition and inciting to riot. His next appearance in court would be for his trial on these charges, set for November 5.

Violence flared in late September with the night-blasting of a Negro home. In mid-October 125 carloads of hooded Ku Klux Klan members paraded through Clinton; four crosses were burned; newsmen were chased from the vacant lot near the town where hooded speakers denounced integration. Otherwise, quiet settled over the area until November.

The August attempt of the Tennessee Federation for Constitutional Government to halt desegregation of Clinton High School by state court injunction backfired. An application to the Supreme Court of Tennessee for certiorari produced a ruling from that body on September 3: "We are of the unanimous opinion that the question is fully foreclosed by the U. S. Supreme Court. The application is denied." The state Supreme Court granted a re-hearing, and in a comprehensive opinion on October 3, it said: "The plain fallacy of this insistence is that the Segregation Statutes referred to are not now in full force and effect, the same having been declared unconstitutional in Brown v. Board of Education...."

The Tennessee court cited the following opinion, which had been rendered by the Supreme Court of North Carolina:

"In the interpretation of the Constitution of the United States, the Supreme Court of the United States is the final arbiter. Its decision in the Brown case is the law of the land and will remain so unless reversed or altered by constitutional means. Recognizing fully that its decision is authoritative in this jurisdiction, any provisions of the Constitution or statutes of North Carolina in conflict therewith must be deemed invalid."

It noted that the Supreme Courts of Florida and Oklahoma had reached similar conclusions. The Texas Supreme Court also, as we had earlier in this chapter, had invalidated that state's school segregation laws.

The Kasper trial dragged through two weeks of November. Crowds, mainly of Kasper sympathizers packed the courtroom as a stream of witnesses -- and the irrepressible defendant -- recalled events of early September and revived bitter controversy in the town. Acquitted November 20, amid loud cheers, Kasper immediately announced plans to continue his fight against school integration in Tennessee.

A political contest now began to rage around the school segregation issue, the White Citizens' Council backing extremist candidates for mayor and alderman. Meanwhile White Youth Councils, organized by juvenile Kasper devotees, introduced a new rancor and unrest within Clinton High School. A handful of these young white supremacists who had been out of school since early September now returned -- mainly, it seemed for the purpose of making life unbearable for the Negro students.

As tension increased, inside now as well as outside of the high school, a nervousness which was not present in the earlier anarchy, was apparent among the Negro community and the Anderson County school board. Wednesday, November 29, the Negroes, after their long brave attendance record, stayed out of school. But they were not ready to give up. The school board was. In a fatuous hope of calling off the desegregation attempt, the board suggested to the Negroes that they be transferred back to the segregated Negro high school in Knoxville. The Negro parents would have nothing to do with this "voluntary withdrawal plan." Friday five Negro students started to the school again, but now the youngsters, seeing a truck and adults standing ominously in front of the building were frightened away. Negro parents appealed to the school board for protection of their children. Chairman R. G. Grossno said he knew of nothing it could do. On September 3 the board ~~wrote~~ sent a letter to United States Attorney General Herbert Brownell in which it declared:

> Considerable confusion has arisen as a result of the Board's conscientious attempt to comply with the Court's order abolishing segregation while at the same time the federal authorities fail to enforce the same Court's injunction forbidding anyone, including students, from interfering with the integration.
>
> ...The Board feels that under no circumstances should the school authorities be expected to police the carrying out of such an order -- but rather it is a matter for the appropriate federal authorities. Local FBI agents and United States district attorney's officers... for some unexplained reason are oblivious to the internationally-known Clinton integration problem.
>
> The Anderson County School Board must know whether the Department of Justice intends to continue lack of enforcement of the Federal Court injunction. If so, it might become necessary to close the Clinton High School so long as we are under court order to abolish segregation.

It is imperative that we hear from you within five days so that we may plan accordingly.[6]

Tuesday, September 4 -- Election Day -- saw another of those Clinton incidents which flashed across the nation. Rev. Paul W. Turner, a 33-year-old white clergyman who had preached for eight years at the First Baptist Church, Clinton's largest church, had sent word to the Negro children that if they wanted to return to school he would come and walk with them. Tuesday morning, the Reverend Turner, accompanied by two fellow townsmen, Sidney Davis and Leo Burnett, met six Negro boys and girls on a hillside nearby and carried them past about fifty jeering whites safely into the school. As they walked away, after the three adults had separated, half a dozen plug-uglies fell upon Turner and beat him. Blood stained the sidewalk and spattered on the car against which he was leaning when police came to his rescue. (Though his nose bled profusely, his injuries -- several minor cuts on the face -- proved slight.)

News of this barbarity spread rapidly through the community. It had an undoubted effect upon the town election: apathy at the polls in the morning was changed to waiting lines of voters in the afternoon. But the election results reflected more than sympathy with a beloved clergyman: they proved that in spite of all the poison that had been spewed in its midst, Clinton remained basically healthy. All of the extremist candidates were badly defeated. James B. Meredith, its candidate for mayor, received only 343 votes to 1,241 for T. Lawrence Seeber, a respected and moderate former county judge.

Added to the events of that crowded election day, principal Brittain announced over a loud-speaker at noon that Clinton

High School would be closed until further notice. A delegation headed by Mayor Lewallen conferred with the federal district attorney in Knoxville and, at the latter's instance, Judge Taylor ordered the arrest of sixteen persons on charges of violating his injunction against interference with school desegregation. While the writs were being drafted, Attorney General Brownell in Washington was responding to the school board's call for help. He announced that the Federal Bureau of Investigation had been ordered to investigate the Clinton case and promised that the federal government would prosecute "all persons" who attempted to block public school desegregation as ordered by a federal court. During the next two days federal marshals rounded up the sixteen named by Judge Taylor.

Brownell also said, however, that responsibility for the protection of students rested with state and local authorities, and that "this is fully understood and recognized by the governor of Tennessee." Governor Clement confirmed this, saying: "I have had no official request from officials of Anderson County or Clinton. I am still of the opinion that the state of Tennessee and its local authorities should handle their own problems and that the federal government should not unnecessarily intervene."

On December 10 the school opened again, with the Negroes in attendance. In what Time magazine described as "one of the most forthright Southern law-enforcement performances thus far in the desegregation struggle,"[7] County Attorney Eugene Joyce lectured the students sternly in Clinton High School auditorium, warning them that misconduct in the school would be "dealt with severely and swiftly." None of a serious nature was reported thereafter.

Space

We move ahead of our larger Southern story now to carry the reader to the end of Clinton's travail, and its terminal tragedy. Excepting minor incidents during the winter and spring of 1957, the little Tennessee community disappeared from the headlines of out-of-town newspapers for nearly two years. Occasional racist visitors made unsuccessful attempts to blow the embers of dissension into flame again. Retired Admiral Crommelin, came from Alabama to address a White Citizens' Council meeting; Kasper and Carter returned for a joint appearance. But segregationist rallies were mild now and drew only several hundred people at the most. Violence was underground, when it occurred and the authors were rarely apprehended. Of several dynamitings, one destroyed a Negro restaurant and damaged thirty Negro homes; Clinton white citizens raised funds to repair the damage. A Negro student, a 21-year-old senior, with a "poor scholastic record," charged with striking a white boy and drawing a knife, was expelled from Clinton High School. Another Negro boy stood, with no unpleasantness, among the graduating class of May 1957. The sixteen Clinton defendants on federal contempt charges were acquitted or released on probation.

Kasper was in and out of jails in Clinton, Knoxville, Nashville and Washington, D.C. and his trials, retrials and appeal hearings consumed much of the time of state and federal courts. He settled down to a long imprisonment only in November 1957.... When the United States Marshalls left Knoxville to carry him to the federal prison in Tallahassee, Florida, he was observed to be carrying a copy of Mein Kampf!

Eight Negroes entered Clinton High School in September 1957 -- "without a taunt or a jeer." A year of quiet descended upon the little town. School-opening in September 1958 was similarly tranquil, with eleven Negroes in school. Clinton appeared to have been forgotten by the sowers of discord.... But this was not quite the case.

Early in the morning of October 5, 1957, Clinton High School was shattered by three dynamite blasts and its classrooms were reduced to rubble. The perpetrators of the outrage were never discovered.

Officials at Oak Ridge promptly offered the use of an empty school building. On October 9 the Clinton students, driven in fifteen buses -- Negroes included -- resumed classes in their improvised place of education.

Efforts to secure federal funds for rebuilding the school met with complications and little success. Columnist Drew Pearson called for nationwide contributions and in mid-December he presented the Anderson County school board with a check for $27,000. Private contributions eventually reached nearly $50,000, from 3,617 individuals. Insurance yielded $73,000. The federal government finally found it possible to contribute $45,000 from funds for areas under the impact of federal installations. The apparent niggardliness of the federal contribution was resented by Anderson County citizens who felt, not without reason, that their ruined high school was havoc of a war between Southern fanatics and the federal judiciary. The school rejected a proferred contribution of $14,200 from the Tennessee state treasury "on principle." "We feel,"

Chairman Crosano said, "that this is a federal responsibility."[8] However, in the spring of 1959 the county sold $500,000 of bonds and went forward with plans for rebuilding and enlarging the school.

Clinton High School opened in September 1960 in its new building. Fourteen Negro students now attracted little notice. It was a festive occasion. Four hundred local citizens and visiting celebrities gathered at a dinner in the high school cafeteria. Drew Pearson, introduced by editor Wells, was the principal speaker. All America, Pearson said, "stands in need of the sort of courage and determination shown by the people of Clinton."[9]

Chapter 9

Three North Carolina Cities and Nashville

Negroes were admitted for the first time to previously all-white public schools in 1957 in five Southern cities: Charlotte, Winston-Salem and Greensboro in North Carolina; Nashville, Tennessee; and Little Rock, Arkansas. These were all situated in the Upper South, and they were comparable in many ways, including size.

Their population within corporate city limits ranged by the 1960 census from 107,813 in Little Rock to 201,564 in Charlotte. When its populous environs are taken into account, Nashville was the largest, with a total of 399,743 inhabitants. The metropolitan area population of the other four was: Charlotte, 272,111; Greensboro, 246,520; Little Rock, 242,980; and Winston-Salem, 189,428. The proportion of Negroes to the total population within corporate limits, widely regarded as a useful measure of the magnitude of the local race relations problem -- was in each case as follows: Nashville, 37.9 per cent; Winston-Salem, 37.1 per cent; Charlotte, 28 per cent; Greensboro, 26 per cent; and Little Rock, 23.5 per cent.

One disturbance in North Carolina, small, but ugly and much publicized, and the bombing of a school in Nashville by unknown fanatics, together with the staggering events in Little Rock -- on top of the disorders at Sturgis, Mansfield and Clinton the previous autumn -- gave a widespread impression of rebellious violence, approaching anarchy, in the South, and aroused the deepest pessimism. It was indeed during the thirteen months from August, 1956, through September, 1957, that disorder in connection with public school desegregation reached its apex. Nevertheless, the desegregation operation itself in Nashville was not conspicuously disorderly; and press reports agreed that the break-through in North Carolina "proceeded with relative calm."

Hostility to school desegregation had been expressed in North Carolina in much the same manner as elsewhere in the South, but the volume of resistance agitation was somewhat less in comparison with the sobering influences at work in that state. Dr. Frank P. Graham, who had been president of the University of North Carolina, governor and United States senator and was then a mediator for the United Nations, supported the Brown decision vigorously. Irving Carlyle, of Winston-Salem, a former state senator, was a rare example of a Southern politician who not only accepted the desegregation ruling, but became a crusader for compliance with it. Two literary celebrities, Harry Golden, of Charlotte, and playwright Paul Green, of Chapel Hill, were voluble enemies of every kind of race discrimination. The constructive attitude of the state administration was more than matched by that of the press. No important daily newspaper in North Carolina descended to inflammatory opposition and most of them counseled orderly adjustment to the Brown ruling. In the three cities where public school desegregation was first essayed, the local newspapers rendered invaluable service in preparing the public for the change. Three of their editors -- C. A. McKnight, of the Charlotte Observer; Reed Sarratt, of the Winston-Salem Journal; and Henry Kendall, of the Greensboro Daily News -- were noted students of the Southern race problem; McKnight was the first editor, and Sarratt is the latest editor, of the Southern School News.

Fifty-eight Negro children filed applications for admission to white schools in June: forty-one in Charlotte, nine in Greensboro, seven in Winston-Salem and one in Raleigh. All of these applicants were eliminated except twelve; the Raleigh application was rejected. The Charlotte, Greensboro and Winston-Salem school boards, which decided to take the perilous desegregation plunge, followed identic schedules and took frequent counsel together. Negro pupils were assigned to white schools: five in Charlotte, six in Greensboro and one in Winston-Salem.

With fresh memories of Sturgis, Mansfield and Clinton, the school boards moved toward the showdown with no little trepidation. They announced the assignments of simultaneous meetings Tuesday night, July 23. In opening the Charlotte meeting, a board member, Richard Brown, called upon the Almighty: "We pray for those who disagree. Enter into their minds and hearts, grant them enlarged understanding, patience and forbearance.... Place thy protecting arm around our children." Afterwards, a spokesman for the "North Carolina Patriots, Inc." presented a spectacular petition said to bear 16,000 signatures and pointed a threatening finger at Charlotte board members while he denounced this "ungodly thing;" a majority of some forty visitors present applauded. In Greensboro about seventy-five heard a North Carolina Patriot deliver a vehement oration -- "You shall be condemned, vilified, damned and cursed!" [1] In Winston only four visitors attended the school board meeting, where a Patriot protested with more restraint.

In Charlotte and Greensboro segregationists attempted to block school integration by state court injunctions -- without success. The North Carolina Patriots, Inc., was a somewhat dignified relative of the Citizens' Councils, headed by Dr. Wesley George, a University of North Carolina professor; it was cool toward the likes of John Kasper -- who, be it noted ~~by the way~~, appeared on the scene. Out of jail for the time being, Kasper visited each of the three cities a few days before school-opening. His coming was hailed by officials and the press in the spirit of a Winston-Salem Journal editorial, headed: "Unwelcome." An audience of about two hundred gave him a jeering reception in Winston-Salem, about three hundred heard him in Greensboro and about four hundred listened impassively to his harangue in Charlotte. Ku Klux Klansmen also appeared in Charlotte, but they folded up their robes and dispersed when police broke up their picket line. On September 3, Governor Hodges warned against "any lawlessness or violence" and, in answer to a reporter's question, did not rule out the use of the National Guard if it should be needed to preserve order.[2]

The opening of schools and the integration of the Negro pupils on September 4 was anti-climactic. Press dispatches agreed that the North Carolina break-through "proceeded with relative calm." Disturbances occurred at Harding High School in Charlotte in connection with the arrival and departure of its one Negro student, Dorothy Counts. When Miss Counts walked home, she was pursued by a rowdy crowd of juveniles

-- indoctrinated by adult racists --jeering, spitting and throwing pebbles, sticks and paper balls. A white girl, who spat in Dorothy's face, and a white boy, who threw a stick, were arrested. However, Negroes entered three other white high schools in Charlotte without incident. There was some heckling but no suggestion of violence in Winston-Salem and Greensboro. Disorder in all three cities was almost entirely limited to the first day, although Miss Counts continued to be made uncomfortable in Harding High School.

Photographic excellence and an exceptional view through the camera lens of the distressing little scene in Charlotte gave the world an exaggerated impression of turmoil in North Carolina. It was a striking example of the manner in which the dramatic, the colorful and the photogenic in school desegregation crises often received a degree of publicity inconsistent with a balanced appraisal of events. (Southerners who felt their region was undeservedly being given a bad name sometimes accused television and news camera men of "staging" incidents.) The essential news from North Carolina was that white schools in three cities had admitted Negro pupils without serious public disorder.

The Dorothy Counts incident spoke eloquently nonetheless, while it offered one of the finest opportunities for expressive photography that the commotion in the South had produced. Dorothy was the fifteen-year-old daughter of the Rev. Herman L. Counts, an instructor at Johnson C. Smith University. A comely young lady of unmistakable gentleness and breeding, in a neat plaid dress, she walked in front of the bawling mob with a quiet dignity that made theories of Negro inferiority seem grotesque. A Charlotte Observer columnist, Hays Gary, was inspired to comment in verse, under the heading: "Her Skin Was Dark And Her Head High." His poem read in part:

> They spat and she was covered with it;
> Spittle dripped from the hem of her dress;
> It clung to her neck and arms and she wore it.
> They spat and they jeered and screamed;
> Debris fell on her shoulders and around her feet;
> And the posture of the head was unchanged.
> That was the remarkable thing.
> And, if her skin was brown, you had to admit her > courage was royal purple.[3]

Photographers met the challenge with distinction. Dorothy's walk home from school carried her all over the United States, to London and Paris, and around the world. One of the photos won an international award.

To the dismay of many, after one week, Dorothy Counts -- seeing no hope of enjoying tolerable relations with her white schoolmates -- withdrew from Harding High School and enrolled in a bi-racial private school in suburban Philadelphia.

Nashville received more attention from John Kasper and the Ku Klux Klan, as well as from more respectable segregationist organizations, than the North Carolina cities; and at the same time longer and more thorough efforts were made in the Tennessee capital to condition the public for the change. The issue was fervently contested there on both sides and from every angle. Nashville, with such noted universities and colleges as Vanderbilt, Fisk, Scarritt and Peabody -- all biracial to some extent -- was a renowned study center for Southern problems; it was the home of both the Southern School News and the Race Relations Law Reporter. The city's large Negro community was progressive and politically alert; Negro participation in public affairs in Nashville was unique among Southern cities: two Negroes sat in the city council and one on the board of education. The city had already witnessed successful desegregation in the Catholic ~~public~~ parochial schools, the public library, the municipal golf courses and the railroad station.

One of the city's two daily newspapers, the afternoon Banner, fiercely attacked the desegregation rulings. The press of Tennessee was predominantly critical of the Brown decision. But two newspapers were outstanding in their call for orderly adjustment to it. One of these was Nashville's morning paper, the Tennesseean. The other was the Chattanooga Times (related by family ties of publishers to the New York Times), which labored diligently to combat resistance sentiment in Chattanooga and the South.

Though Governor Clement had vetoed several earlier pro-segregation bills, when the legislature met in January 1957, he endorsed a school bill package which included a pupil assignment plan and a measure called in Tennessee the "School Preference Law." The latter, resembling a "Freedom of Choice Plan," adopted in Alabama the year before, was a specious device which theoretically would set up three school systems and allow parents to choose for their children between white or Negro schools, according to their race, and integrated schools. It required little imagination to see that in the South such a scheme would result in little -- or, more probably, no -- change in the existing segregated pattern (and the law would be invalidated in September by a federal district court). At the same time, Clement was more forthright than any other Southern governor in upholding the Supreme Court decision and in urging a sympathetic approach to the problem of the Negro. In his address to the legislature he said this was not only America's greatest crisis, but "our greatest opportunity;" and: "...We must not overlook the fact that the Negro is equal to the white in the eyes of the law and in the sight of God..." In a letter to the chairman of the Anderson County school board a few weeks later the governor said:

"I am sure you are aware of the fact that no gubernatorial or legislative action can overturn a decision of the U. S. Supreme Court."[4]

The admission of some Negro pupils to white schools in Nashville became a definite prospect in January 1957 when Federal District Judge William E. Miller gave tentative approval to a school board proposal to begin compliance with the Brown decision with the desegregation of all first-grade pupils the following September. This plan -- the impact of which was greatly reduced by a liberal transfer privilege -- was the germ of what would become the "Nashville Plan" of one-grade-a-year desegregation. Judge Miller retained jurisdiction of the case and instructed the school board to submit a plan for desegregation of the other eleven grades by December 31.

William A. Bass, the superintendent of schools began meeting in April with principals, supervisors and both white and colored Parent-Teacher Associations in pursuance of a school board resolution, to "inform, elucidate and help solve problems which may grow out of the effort...to comply with the ruling..." Many Nashville clergymen asked their congregations to accept school desegregation in a "Christian spirit." Not all of them were willing to meet the issue squarely in their churches, but, as was often the case in this controversy, ministers' courage rose when they assembled in clerical meetings. Moreover, a divinity school and several church-related colleges and some denominational headquarters had brought to Nashville an exceptional number of ministers who did not have to answer to local congregations for their liberal views. The Nashville Ministers Association and the Association of Churches addressed letters to all Protestant clergymen, suggesting that they help prepare the public in statements, sermons or, at least prayers for the children, parents and teachers involved. The Association arranged helpful television programs. Catholics and Jews were also active. The Nashville Community Relations Conference, a bi-racial organization formed the previous year, labored effectively to mobilize public sentiment behind the desegregation move. It secured six hundred signatures to a memorial of support for it which was published in the press, along with the names of the signers, many of whom were well known religious, educational business and civic leaders. Sixteen other organizations supported the memorial and added 350 more names before it was presented to the school board. Literature both pro and con circulated in abundance.

On the segregationist side, a Parents' School Preference Committee and the Tennessee Federation for Constitutional Government urged that the school board abandon its desegregation plan and fall back on the recently-enacted Tennessee legislation; the petition they presented to the school board bore 6,000 names! The Ku Klux Klan and John Kasper confronted the embattled school board with harsher demands. These, by the way, were not congenial collaborators. Kasper's extremist friends had been steadily deserting him, and now the KKK told him to "go back to New Jersey;" he was ordered away from a Klan meeting and Klansmen chased him out of a neighboring restaurant. The rallies of the KKK generally drew a handful instead of the thousands anticipated in Klan advertising, but Klansmen were blusteringly persistent -- and Kasper no less.

The latter addressed himself especially to the poorer white quarters of Nashville, where he found abundant scope. During the first half of 1957, Kasper's battered convertible had traveled much on the roads connecting Clinton, Knoxville and Nashville, while he attended to the exigencies of police, courts and jails, and filled the intervening time with agitation to keep the white race pure and the Negroes segregated. "I'll never desert the white race in Tennessee," Kasper said, "until the outcome of our struggle is crystal clear and spells victory over the race mongrelizers."[5] Sometimes in Nashville he stayed at the home of the Reverend Fred Stroud, pastor of a "Bible Presbyterian Church" (not affiliated with other Presbyterian bodies), who gave Kasper his blessing. Stroud was himself a busy segregationist agitator, he proclaimed: "The Lord is on our side." Asa Carter from Alabama also found time to pay Nashville a visit. Representative James C. Davis of Georgia -- he of the District of Columbia school investigation -- came to address the Tennessee Federation for Constitutional Government and urged that Nashville parents boycott the public schools and send their children to private schools.

The desegregation plan provided for first grade pupils to be assigned first to schools indicated by the residential pattern without regard to race, but Negro pupils assigned to schools in which they found themselves in a racial minority were permitted to transfer back to predominantly Negro schools, and a similar privilege was extended to white pupils. As was to be expected, all the white pupils elected to stay in predominantly white schools, and most of the Negro pupils chose the easier and safer course -- not without an element of intimidation -- of continuing to attend effectually segregated schools. However, nineteen Negro pupils held to their assignments to white elementary schools. That was the extent to which the pattern of segregation was broken. When the schools opened on September 9, the nineteen entered five schools along with whites -- without incident other than some minor scuffling of pickets with police and the arrest of several white women for throwing rocks. Crowds which gathered at several places that night were more obstreperous -- one group was addressed by Kasper -- but police had the situation well under control.

Shortly after midnight of school-opening day -- early on September 10 -- a dynamite blast was heard in East Nashville. One wing of Hattie Cotton School, a previously all-white elementary school which had admitted one six-year-old Negro girl, had been demolished. (The damaged rooms were replaced four months later at a cost of $71,000.) When daylight came and the news spread, Nashville was seized with a degree of panic. Police deployed before the desegregated schools and barricades were erected on the streets a block away from each. Hattie Cotton was closed; attendance at the other six desegregated schools was down to less than 40 per cent of normal. During a day of tension, 29 arrests were made.

But within a week street barricades had been removed, attendance at the desegregated schools had risen to approximately 90 per cent -- with eleven Negro children still in schools with whites -- and the situation had returned to normal.

From the first news of the Hattie Cotton School bombing, fingers of suspicion pointed at Kasper -- who had talked of "the shotgun, dynamite and the rope." [6] He was arrested along with half a dozen other suspects; but evidence definitely linking him, or any one else, with the crime was never found. Kasper faced plenty of charges nonetheless. His adventures with police and courts reached a crescendo at this point. Arrested in a general crackdown on trouble-makers, he was charged with vagrancy, loitering and two counts of disorderly conduct; posting $2,000 bond and walking toward his car, he was arrested again and charged with illegal parking; this called for an additional bond of $500. Twelve hours later he was pulled from his bed and arrested by a constable and taken to the jail of Davidson County (which shares jurisdiction with Nashville,) on the charge of inciting to riot. Before he could settle down in this jail, city police "borrowed" him to be tried and convicted in the city court on the first charges; temporarily short of cash now, Kasper paid a visit to the city workhouse. When he raised the $200 city court fine, he was hustled back to the county jail once more; in the county court he was indicted by a grand jury for inciting to riot, scheduled for trial in November and placed under a $2,500 bond. A few days later he was taken briefly from the county jail to appear as a defendant in a hearing in the federal district court, which resulted in an injunction forbidding him and nine others named, and their followers, to interfere "by acts of trespass, boycott or picket with the free operation of the schools." On September 18 Kasper's attorney showed up with $2,500 in cash and he was released from the county jail. He climbed into his convertible and left immediately for Knoxville.

The mystery of how Kasper was never long in want of funds intrigued many. Questioning him on the point was likely to be as futile as this dialogue between Kasper and the prosecutor in the Nashville city court:

Q. Do you have a check here issued to you, showing how you are paid?

A. I don't have any financial records.

Q. Then how are you paid?

A. On the basis of what needs to be done.

Q. What do you mean?

A. All the funds are available to me and the organization. I am not on a salary basis.

Q. When was the last time you drew a check?

A. None of your business.

(Interruption from the judge: Yes it is. Answer the question.)

A. I never drew a check.

Q. Are you paid in cash? How are you paid?

A. In cash.

Q. By whom?

A. By the finance committee of the councils.

Q. Who is on it?

A. Lots of folks.

And so on and on. Evidently, some well-to-do racists were ready to put up money to keep Kasper in circulation. It was revealed that cash for the last-mentioned $2,500 bond was advanced by Lee Foster, a building contractor, of Knoxville.

Spence

Little Rock dominated the news now. In that city soldiers stood guard around a high school with instructions from Governor Faubus to prevent the entry of Negro pupils whom a federal court had ordered to be admitted to it. While John Kasper was fretting in the Davidson County jail, the governor of Arkansas and the President of the United States were conferring tensely in Newport, Rhode Island, -- in an historic collision of state and federal authority. Withdrawal of the forces under the command of the governor would be followed by uncontrolled rioting and the arrival of a detachment of the United States Army to restore peace and insure compliance with the orders of federal courts. But before we move to that exciting theater, it behooves us to observe the evolution of the Nashville Plan, which would be widely studied and copied; and to look ahead briefly to the progress under it that would keep Nashville in the forefront of Southern cities in the elimination of segregation in public schools.

The Nashville school board was under a federal district court order to submit by December 31, 1957, a plan for abolishing segregation in the remaining eleven grades. Under heavy local pressure, the board attempted to abandon the grade-a-year desegregation principle and submitted a plan based largely on the state's School Preference Law, which had already been declared unconstitutional. At the same time the Negro plaintiffs in the original Nashville school desegregation suit petitioned the court to order an end to segregation in all grades the following year. In January, 1958, the court rejected the latest school board proposal, and in April the board committed itself formally to a program of desegregating one higher grade each year until all segregation should be eliminated. This plan was allowed by the federal courts to stand.

The schools opened in September, 1958 -- with both first and second grades desegregated -- in complete tranquility. Only a handful of Negro pupils accepted their assignments to mixed schools during the first two years, then a concerted movement in the Negro community caused a dramatic increase in the number of Negroes in school with whites. During six years, the year-by-year totals of Negro pupils in previously all-white schools in Nashville were: 1958, 34 in two grades; 1959, 41 in three grades; 1960, 183 in four grades; 1961; 270 in five grades; 1962, 363 in six grades and 1963, in seven grades.[7]

Little Rock

The events of September 1957 in Little Rock, Arkansas, made the name of that city familiar to all the world. For many months afterward among ordinary folk in Bombay, Nairobi or Singapore, when the United States was mentioned the city that came first to mind was not Washington or New York, but Little Rock. Informed foreign observers were concerned over the constitutional crisis in the most powerful nation on earth; millions of people overseas received impressions of Negro children being first barred by soldiers from a public school and later escorted through a hostile mob into that school by other soldiers, and of Negroes being beaten by white men on the streets of an American city.

The flood of Little Rock news, comment and pictures both at home and abroad was swelled by the protraction of the situation of defiance of federal authority. A state governor persisted for eighteen days in preventing by military force, the execution of an order of a federal court, affording abundant time for publicity and debate over that posture from every conceivable angle; a tense week-end and a day of rioting followed; then troops of the United States Army arrived on the scene. There were twenty-two days of suspense before the conatitutional issue was thunderously decided in favor of federal authority. It is easy to observe in retrospect that the journalistic output on Little Rock would have been less overwhelming -- and much grievious damage would have been averted -- if events had moved with greater dispatch.

The task of the historian would certainly be easier if the source material were less massive and discordant. Writing now, however, eight years after the crisis, subsequent events and a marked change in the Southern temper have joined with a quieter sifting of evidence to make for clarity and concensus in our appraisal of what happened at Little Rock. The possibility of peaceful integration of public schools, at least on a token scale, has been demonstrated in many Southern cities; extremist sentiment has markedly subsided; and many erstwhile defenders of the Arkansas governor have withdrawn from that side of the debate.

An elementary fact that needs to be borne in mind in any examination of the Little Rock events is that the National Guard detachment which was called into service by the governor of Arkansas, was at the time a state, rather than a national, military force. The National Guard is a reserve component of the United States Army and is supported mainly by the federal government; but, except when it is formally called into federal service, it retains the status of state militia and is under the command of the governors of the several states. It is normally, and properly, called upon by state governors when the public order is seriously threatened. From this distance detached observers generally agree that the danger in Little Rock at the beginning of September 1957 was not sufficient to justify Governor Orval Faubus in walling out the National Guard as a public safety precaution. But it is more apparent also since the smoke has cleared away that the questions of calling out the National Guard and withdrawing the National Guard -- to which so much passionate argument was directed -- were irrelevant to the central issue. Deploying guardsmen around Central High School may have been -- and probably was -- unnecessary; but it was constitutionally correct. The impropriety, or the rebellion, lay in the orders which the troops were given to carry out.

If the guardsmen had been used to protect the school and its pupils in complying with federal court orders, as the governor of Tennessee had used the National Guard at Clinton -- and as Representative Brooks Hays urged upon the governor of Arkansas -- a totally different chapter of history could have been written. It is interesting, if fruitless to dwell on the hypothetical consequences of this "if:" the Little Rock experience would surely have been recorded as one more instance of orderly adjustment to the Brown ruling; and, elsewhere in the South, instead of a stiffening of resistance, we would probably have witnessed some acceleration of the movement toward school desegregation.

When the Arkansas National Guard blocked the execution of a federal court mandate, Harry S. Ashmore, a distinguished author, then editor of the Little Rock Arkansas Gazette, urged that it should be promptly federalized, and its orders changed -- a remedy which would have placed a minimum of onus upon Governor Faubus. This move was considered in Washington, but, as Congressman Hays -- who played an active mediatory role throughout the crisis -- recalls in his book A Southern Moderate Speaks, Presidential Assistant Sherman Adams was "not convinced that federalizing the National Guard was the answer." This step was taken only after the withdrawal of the detachment sent by Faubus, and the subsequent explosion, along with the dispatch of regular Army troops -- as a final act in the drama. Often obscured in the talk about a governor's duty to preserve order, the paramount question in Little Rock was whether military force could be used by a state to nullify the law of the land.

The issue was further clouded by the impression widely given by the deployment of federal troops that "bayonets" were being used to ram integration down the throat of the South." It was inevitable that this interpretation would be given it in many quarters; but it was made more emphatic by the circumstances that action to assert federal authority was taken only after -- and ostensibly inspired by -- a riotous popular demonstration of opposition to school integration. The troop action appeared to be directed against the populace rather than against a rebellious governor.

The Little Rock move was not a "break-through" from a state point of view. Negroes had already been admitted to previously all-white public schools in five Arkansas districts -- without incident, excepting some minor disturbances in the town of Hoxie. All state-supported institutions of higher learning in Arkansas were open to Negroes. The Little Rock school board had announced its decision to comply with the Brown ruling in May, 1954, six days after the decision was handed down. A year later it had adopted a plan of gradual integration, under which senior high school grades would be desegregated in September 1957. The remaining classes would be desegregated during a six-year period thereafter, with the lower classes the last to be affected. Students assigned to schools in which they might be in a racial minority were to be permitted to transfer. Twenty-seven Negroes who applied for admission to white schools ahead of the schedule, in 1956, were rejected; when NAACP attorneys complained, federal courts upheld the Little Rock school board plan.

The emotional climate of Little Rock with respect to the segregation question before the pyrotechnics of September 1957, was comparable to that in the four other Upper South cities whose experiences were related in the previous chapter. Similar agitation had taken place in Little Rock on both sides of the segregation question, but it had involved a somewhat smaller fraction of the community and was less heated, for instance, than that in Nashville. In the March school board election Little Rock voters had elected two supporters of the desegregation plan by 2-to-1 majorities over two opponents of it. John Kasper, who had considerable talent for detecting potential trouble centers, had not found the prospects of turmoil in Little Rock sufficiently promising to draw him away from Nashville; nor had the Ku Klux Klan appeared. The most disturbing incident had been a visit to Little Rock by Governor Marvin Griffin of Georgia, who addressed 350 persons -- "a courageous bunch of patriots" -- at a $10-a-plate Capital Citizens' Council rally two weeks before school-opening. In a vitriolic speech, Governor Griffin pointed to the "steadfast" resistance to school integration in Georgia, and said he would use the highway patrol -- indeed, "enlist every white man in Georgia" -- if necessary, to prevent racial integration in that state. The Georgia governor's speech undoubtedly did much to stimulate the mobilization of resistance elements when Faubus's spectacular maneuvering began, but at the end of August no signs of upheaval were visible.

Born January 7, 1910, in Madison County in the hills of northwest Arkansas, Orval Faubus had risen from humble beginnings; but he was by no means a "hillbilly": in 1957 he was an urbane and personable executive, with a fairly creditable record first as state highway director and later, for nearly three years, as governor. He was not a true segregationist from the point of view of the Deep South: he voiced acceptance of the Supreme Court ruling as the law of the land, and his criticism of desegregation moves was mainly on the scores of method and timing.

The first conspicuous sign of Faubus's obsession with the danger of violence in Little Rock was on August 29 when he testified in the county chancery court in a suit brought by the segregationist "Mothers' League of Central High School" to block the admission of Negroes to that school. Predicting "violence bloodshed and riots" then if integration should proceed as scheduled, he said he had personal knowledge of increased sales of knives and revolvers to Negro and white students. (Neither school and police officials nor newspaper men were able later to verify the latter statement.) However, Chancellor Murray J. Reed concluded: "In view of the testimony... and particularly in the opinion of Governor Faubus, I feel that I can only grant the injunction."[1] Chancellor Reed's ruling was nullified the next day by the federal district court, which ordered the school board to proceed with its plan of gradual integration and issued a blanket injunction against any interference.[2]

The degree of sincerity in Faubus's attitude at this point is difficult to measure. He had not encouraged the Georgia governor's visit -- which, he said, was "one thing that triggered" a change in sentiment; he did not attend the Capital Citizens' Council rally, though he entertained the Griffin party afterward at the governor's mansion. Faubus was habitually prone to seize upon a rumor that came over the telephone, or that some unimportant individual brought to his office, and broadcast it without investigation. Less charitable observers suspected that some of these rumors were creatures of the governor's imagination or -- like FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover in a later instance -- described the practice as "disseminating falsehoods."[3] At any rate the rumors circulated were generally calculated to serve some purpose, and it began to be his apparent purpose to create an impression of impending violence. As to just when Orval Faubus caught the vision of himself as the idolized hero of Southern Resistance we can only speculate, but from early September on his words and actions could not have been more skillfully designed to achieve that alluring distinction.

Nine Negro pupils had been assigned, under federal court orders, to Little Rock's Central High, which had an enrollment of approximately 2,000, and which had been open hitherto exclusively to white children. Classes were scheduled to begin on September 3. It will be an aid to clarity, and bring out the salient points in the constitutional debate, if we trace the course of the crisis from here on in day-by-day bulletins, relying for much of the story on excerpts from the verbal exchange.

Monday, September 2

Monday night troops of the Arkansas National Guard suddenly appeared at Central High School and surrounded it. An hour later Governor Faubus announced this move in a radio-television speech in which he said in part:

Units of the National Guard have been, or are now being mobilized with the mission to maintain or restore the peace and good order of this community. Advance units are already on duty on the grounds of Central High School.

I have informed Chief Lindsey, director of the Arkansas State Police, of the developments and he is now mobilizing a force to act as an arm of the State Militia in maintaining or restoring the peace and order of the community and to act in every way possible to protect the lives and property of the citizens of Pulaski County.

This is a decision I have reached prayerfully. It has been made after conferences with dozens of people and after the checking and the verification of as many of the reports as possible.

The mission of the State Militia is to maintain or restore order and to protect the lives and property of citizens. They will act not as segregationists or integrationists, but as soldiers called to active duty to carry out their assigned tasks.

But I must state here in all sincerity, that it is my opinion -- yes, even a conviction, that it will not be possible to restore or to maintain order and protect the lives and property of the citizens if forcible integration is carried out tomorrow in the schools of this community. The inevitable conclusion, therefore, must be that the schools in Pulaski County, for the time being, must be operated on the same basis as they have been operated in the past. [4]

Tuesday, September 3

Monday had been a holiday, Labor Day. Acceding to a school board request that they stay away for the present, no Negroes attended the school on Tuesday.

Little Rock was now in newspaper headlines throughout the world, and news and camera men were swarming there.

The mayor of Little Rock, Woodrow W. Mann said of the governor's action the night before:

.....

The people of Little Rock recently had a school board election and elected by an overwhelming vote the school board members who advocated a projected court-approved Little Rock plan (of gradual integration).

The governor has called out the National Guard to put down trouble when none existed. He did so without a request from those of us who are directly responsible for preservation of peace and order. The only effect of his action is to create tensions where none existed.

I call the governor's attention to the fact that after almost a week of sensational developments brought about by his own action, the Little Rock police have not had a single case of interracial violence reported to them. This is clear evidence that the governor's excuse for calling out the Guard is simply a hoax.[4]

That night Federal Judge Ronald N. Davis ordered the school board to "put in effect forthwith the plan of integration...."

Wednesday, September 4

The nine Negro pupils sought to enter the school and were stopped by Faubus's soldiers. The Negro children were accompanied by two Negro clergymen, Rev. Z. Z. Driver and Rev. Harry Bass, and two white clergymen -- Rev. Will Campbell, of the National Council of Churches, and Rev. Dunbar Ogden, Jr., president of the Little Rock Ministerial Alliance. They were told that the Negroes were barred by order of the governor. A crowd of whites watched and jeered. However, since the troops were carrying out its wishes, only minor harassment of the retreating Negroes required the intervention of guardsmen. The National Guard force numbered only 270, but, having only nine Negro children to repel, that was more than enough.

The scenes at the school were profusely photographed and reported. The first of the Negro children to be turned back was an attractive 15-year-old girl named Elizabeth Eckford. In order to find an exit from the barricaded street this dainty little miss had to walk a 100-yard gauntlet of sneering, threatening demonstrators -- before many cameras. Some of the photos resembled those of Dorothy Counts in Charlottesville and rivaled them in circulation.

The day's rumors included one that federal marshals or agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation would escort Negroes into the school. If they should try to do that, State Adjutant General Sherman Klinger said, "a bunch of resolute boys are going to resist." But no such federal-state confrontation occurred.

Judge Davies asked the United States attorney general to order an investigation.

Governor Faubus sent a telegram to President Eisenhower which read somewhat like a message to a hostile foreign government and tended further to erect the image of himself as the embattled Southern champion of state rights. Typical Faubus "rumors" were included. The governor's telegram said in part:

> ...The question at issue at Little Rock this moment is not integration vs. segregation. Peaceful integration has been accomplished for some time in the University of Arkansas, state-supported colleges, and in three more of our largest public schools -- Fort Smith, Ozark, Van Buren. It is impossible to integrate some of our schools at this time without violence. The Supreme Court recognized that conditions in each community must be considered and I have interpreted your public statements to indicate that you are in agreement with this premise.
>
> The question now is whether or not the head of a sovereign state can exercise his constitutional powers and discretion in maintaining peace and good order within his jurisdiction, being accountable to his own conscience and to his own people.
>
>
> I am reliably informed that federal authorities in Little Rock have this day been discussing plans to take into custody, by force, the head of a sovereign state. This would be in complete disregard of the constitutional guarantees of the separation and independence of the three branches of government and the rights and powers of a state. As the duly elected governor and representative of the people of Arkansas, I can no more surrender these rights than you could surrender the rights of the duly elected chief executive of our nation...
>

I have reason to believe that the telephone lines to the Arkansas executive mansion have been tapped -- I suspect the federal agents. The situation in Little Rock and Arkansas grows more explosive by the hour. This is caused for the most part by the misunderstanding of our problems by a federal judge who decreed "immediate integration" of the public schools of Little Rock without hearing any evidence whatsoever as to the conditions now existing in this community. The situation is further aggravated by the impending unwarranted interference of federal agents. If these actions continue, or if my executive authority as governor to maintain the peace is breached, then I can no longer be responsible for the results. The injury to persons and property that would be caused -- the blood that may be shed will be on the hands of the federal government and its agents. The splendid progress we have made in Arkansas the past few years toward meeting our problems of race relationship will have been completely and utterly destroyed... As governor of Arkansas I appeal to you to use your good offices to modify the extreme stand and stop the unwarranted interference of federal agents in this area so that we may again enjoy domestic tranquility and continue in our pursuit of ideal relations between other races.

Time is the essence of the situation with which I am confronted. May I have the assurance of your understanding and cooperation.

Thursday, September 5

The President replied the next day:

Your telegram received, requesting my assurance of, understanding of, and cooperation in the course of action you have taken on school integration recommended by the Little Rock School Board and ordered by the United States District Court pursuant to the mandate of the United States Supreme Court.

When I became President, I took an oath to support and defend the Constitution of the United States. The only assurance I can give you is that the federal Constitution will be upheld by me by every legal means at my command.

There is no basis of fact to the statements you make in your telegram that federal authorities have been considering taking you into custody or that telephone lines to your executive mansion have been tapped by any agency of the federal government.

At the request of Judge Davies, the Department of Justice is presently collecting facts as to interference with or failure to comply with the district's court order. You and other state officials -- as well as the National Guard which is, of course, uniformed, armed and partially sustained by the government -- will, I am sure, give full cooperation to the United States District Court.[5]

Faubus promptly telegraphed:

Mr. President:

Thank you for your telegram in reply to my appeal for your understanding and cooperation in connection with my efforts to preserve the public peace and good order in this community. I have notified the United States District Attorney and the FBI that my personal counsel, William J. Smith, and the director of Arkansas State Police, Herman Lindsey, are available to discuss certain evidence upon which I acted to preserve the public peace. I shall cooperate in upholding the Constitution of Arkansas and the nation.[5]

Saturday, September 7

The Little Rock School Board went back to the federal court with a request for a temporary suspension of the order to admit the Negro pupils. Judge Davies rejected the petition with feeling. He quoted the above statement of Mayor Mann, and said in part:

What did the testimony this morning disclose?...

The testimony and arguments this morning were, in my judgment, as anemic as the petition itself; and the position taken by the school directors does violence to my concept of the duty of the petitioners to adhere with resolution to its own approved plan of gradual integration in the Little Rock public schools.

It must never be thought that this court has not given careful consideration to this problem and all that it entails, but it must never be forgotten that I have a constitutional duty and obligation from which I shall not shrink. This court is not persuaded that upon the tenuous showing made by the petitioners this morning that it should suspend enforcement of the petitioners' plan of integration.[5]

(According to the Associated Press, newspapers around the world were now giving space to reports and pictures of troops barring Negro children from the school in Little Rock. The London Daily Chronicle said "the scenes have been nauseating and pitiful." The Tokyo News wondered "why this problem should arise in the United States, the champion of democracy." Radio Moscow deplored "the shameful spectacle.")

Monday, September 9

Mayor Mann was serving the last four months of his term before the inauguration of city manager form of government -- which he had opposed -- and was a controversial figure. Eight of the ten aldermen turned against him in his feud with the governor and signed a statement commending Faubus for "calling out the National Guard... to protect the lives and property of our people."5

The governor issued a statement sharply critical of Judge Davies (who had arrived from North Dakota within the fortnight to fill a vacancy.) Noting that the judge had quoted the mayor's statement, he said: "Mayor Mann is a discredited, repudiated public official;" and "as proof of the grave error made by the judge," he quoted the statement of commendation from the eight aldermen. Then he further set forth his own position:

> The Constitution does not say that the nine Negro children denied admittance to the Little Rock Central High School last Wednesday morning must be permitted to attend this school at this time. The Supreme Court said that integration of the public schools should proceed with "all deliberate speed." This meant that the Supreme Court recognized that integration could be accomplished in some communities in days, in other communities in weeks, in other communities in months, and still other communities may require years for a period of transition.
>
> The Constitutions of the state of Arkansas and of the United States imposed upon me the duty to maintain the public peace and to use the militia if, in my judgment, it is necessary. I cannot abdicate my office and let a federal judge substitute his judgment for mine on this issue. If he has a right to substitute his judgment for mine on this issue, then he has the right to substitute his judgment on all issues involving duties imposed upon me as governor of Arkansas...

As further evidence that I am not opposing integration, as such, I think that each of you will realize that the dearest things to any individual are his sons and daughters. My son leaves this day to begin tomorrow's classes in an integrated state college in Arkansas.[5]

On the same day Judge Davies received a report from the FBI on why the federal court order had not been carried out, and he asked the United States Department of Justice, acting as friend of the court, to begin injunction proceedings against Faubus, Major General Sherman T. Clinger, commander of the Arkansas National Guard, and Lieutenant Colonel Marion E. Johnson, commander of the Guard detachment at Central High School.

(The New York Times reported from Rome that the Vatican newspaper, Osservatore Romano, in one of its rare comments on the situation in the United States said that people who believe in racist theories should be banned from political life and that race discrimination "runs counter to nature, to character, to aspirations and to the laws of the United States....")

Tuesday, September 10

The Department of Justice asked the court to enjoin the governor and the two Guard officers, "their officers, agents, servants, employees, attorneys, and all persons in active concert or participation with them" from interfering with the execution of the court's orders by "units of the Arkansas National Guard or otherwise."[5]

The date for this courtroom collision of the state's chief executive with federal authority was set for September 20.

(The Toronto Globe and Mail said: "The theory, assiduously spread by the Communists for decades, that the United States is the inveterate enemy of all colored people everywhere is likely to win much wider support than ever before." A cartoon in the London Evening Standard showed Governor Faubus hurling a guitar at a clock labeled "progress." In Budapest, Hungary's Communist premier, Janos Kadar, said: "Those who tolerate that a people should be persecuted because of the color of their skin have no right to preach human liberty and human rights.")

Wednesday, September 11

The hearing on the Department of Justice petition for a restraining injunction against Faubus along with General Clinger and Colonel Johnson had been set for September 20 and summons had been served on the governor and the two officers.

Congressman Hays was now busy trying to arrange a meeting between the governor and the President. He conferred frequently with Faubus and by telephone with Presidential Assistant Sherman Adams in Washington. The proposal was accepted at both ends, and it was decided that the request for the conference should come from the governor. Hays helped the governor in drafting the following telegram, which was sent to the President on September 11:

> I have accepted summons from the United States District Court, Eastern District of Arkansas, to appear before that court on September 20, to answer certain allegations in litigation affecting the high school in Little Rock. Recognizing that we jointly share great responsibility under the federal Constitution, I feel that it is advisable for us to counsel together in determining my course of action as chief executive of the state of Arkansas with reference to the responsibility placed upon me by the state and federal constitutions.

The United States District Court has already entered an order relative to the integration of the high school in Little Rock, and this order has been affirmed by the Circuit Court of Appeals.

All good citizens must, of course, obey all proper orders of our courts and it is certainly my desire to comply with the order that has been issued by the District Court in this case, consistent with my responsibilities under the Constitution of the United States and that of Arkansas.

May I confer with you on this matter at your earliest convenience? 5

President Eisenhower, though in constant touch with the White House, was vacationing at the time at Newport, Rhode Island -- a circumstance which aroused some criticism. (Columnist Walter Lippman wrote: "It is necessary to say... that during this grave business he ought not to be away from Washington, but at the center of things, where he can really keep himself informed and advised.") The President answered Faubus immediately with this brief message:

I have your telegram in which you request a meeting with me. Would it suit your convenience to come to my office on the naval base at Newport either Friday afternoon, September 13, at 3 o'clock, or Saturday morning, the 14th at 9 o'clock? If you would let my office know your method of transportation to the Newport area, my staff will arrange to have you met and brought to the base. 5

(The Associated Press reported: "The Soviets built a somewhat fictional radio drama around a real-life Negro schoolgirl of Little Rock and broadcast it to schoolrooms in the Soviet Union. The program was a dramatized account of racial violence terrorizing a Negro schoolgirl named Elizabeth Eckford... trying to get into a desegregated school in Little Rock." The Egyptian government made use of the news from Little Rock in its broadcasts to the Budan. The Budapest Esti Hirlap taunted: "We would like to invite the members of the five-nation UN committee (which recommended condemnation of the Soviet Union) to make a study trip up the Arkansas River...."

Friday, September 13

The Saturday hour was agreed upon for the conference. Friday the governor and his private secretary, accompanied by Congressman Hays, flew to Providence, Rhode Island. Hays recalls in his book: "No one representing the governor of Rhode Island or the mayor of Providence was on hand to welcome us. There were curious crowds but no cheering. It was rather pathetic to see Governor Faubus looking vainly for some sign of enthusiasm...."

Saturday, September 14

At Newport Saturday morning President Eisenhower talked privately in his office with Governor Faubus for about fifteen minutes. Afterwards the two joined Hays and Adams in the reception room for a talk which lasted nearly two hours. At the President's suggestion, Attorney General Herbert Brownell and Presidential Press Secretary James Hagerty came in for the last part of the discussion.

Among details of the conversation, revealed with the President's approval, Hays recalls that Eisenhower said to Faubus: "I do not criticize you for calling out the Guard -- our only difference is that I would have given them different instructions."

Saturday afternoon the President issued this statement:

At the request of Gov. Faubus of Arkansas, I met with him this morning in a constructive discussion regarding the carrying out of the orders of the federal court in the matter of the high schools of Little Rock.

The governor stated his intention to respect the decision of the United States District Court and to give his full cooperation in carrying out his responsibilities in respect to these decisions.

In doing so, I recognize the inescapable responsibility resting upon the governor to preserve law and order in his state. I am gratified by his constructive and cooperative attitude at our meeting. I have assured the governor of the cooperation of federal officials...

I am sure it is the desire of the governor, not only to observe the supreme law of the land but to use the influence of his office in orderly progress of the plans which are already the subject of the order of the court. 5 and the governor of Arkansas issued this:

The President and I have had a friendly and constructive discussion of the problem of compliance with court orders respecting the high schools of Little Rock. This trip to Newport has been worthwhile from my point of view. I recognize that the situation called for clarification and I assured the President of my desire to cooperate with him in carrying out the duties resting upon both of us under the constitution of Arkansas with the requirements of the federal Constitution.

I have never expressed any personal opinion regarding the Supreme Court decision of 1954 which voted integration. That is not relevant. That decision is the law of the land and must be obeyed.

At the time, it is evident even from the language of the decision itself that changes necessitated by court orders cannot be accomplished overnight.

The people of Little Rock are law-abiding and I know that they shall have my support. In so doing, it is my responsibility to protect the people from violence in any form.

As I interpret the President's public statement, the national administration has no thought of challenging this fact. In meeting this obligation, it is essential in proceeding to implement the orders of the court that the complexities of integration be patiently understood by all those in federal authority as well as others.

Expect to obey valid court orders. In this they

When I assure the President, as I have already done, that I expect to accept the decisions of the court, I entertain the hope that the Department of Justice and the federal judiciary will act with understanding and patience in discharging their duties. 5

(The Edinburgh Scotsman said: "The duty of the President is clear. He must maintain the law...." The Sidney Morning Herald said: "The time for compromise is clearly at an end." The Manila Herald: "It is a test right in America's home grounds to determine how really sincere the American people are in their avowals of equal justice and fair play -- a doctrine repeatedly dinned into the ears of their allies by American leaders." The Mexico City Novedades: "Arkansas's Faubus is a coarse exponent of a trend that would put to shame the most backward countries on earth." The Times of Indonesia: "Americans should ask themselves... whether Governor Faubus should not be hauled before the Un-American Activities Committee for alienating half the world from the United States." And Al-Shara, of Beirut: "America Verges on Civil Rebellion.")

Thursday, September 19

Soldiers continued on guard against the entry of Negro pupils into Central High School, although, after the first week, the patrol had been reduced to less than fifty men and demonstrators were even fewer. The governor asked Judge Davies to remove himself from the bench Thursday for the hearing on the petition for injunction against Faubus et al., because of "a personal prejudice against this respondent." The motion was denied. 5

Friday, September 20

At the beginning of the hearing in the federal court, the governor and the Guard officers, through their attorneys, filed a motion to dismiss, declaring:

> (a) The petition is in truth and in fact an attempted action against the sovereign State of Arkansas...
>
> (b) This court is wholly without jurisdiction to question the judgment or discretion of the respondent, Orval E. Faubus, the governor of Arkansas, and other respondents subordinate to him, in performing their duties made mandatory upon them by the Constitution and the laws of Arkansas... [5]

When this motion was denied, the governor's attorneys stalked out of the courtroom.

As the hearing proceeded, the federal government called eight of the 105 witnesses it had subpoenaed, including the school superintendent, the mayor and the chief of police of Little Rock, the principal of Central High School, the president of the school board and three of the nine Negro children. No evidence that violence was imminent came from any of the witnesses.

Judge Davies concluded that the desegregation of Central High School had "been thwarted by the governor of Arkansas by the use of National Guard troops." He said: "It is equally demonstrable from the testimony presented here today that there would have been no violence in carrying out the plan of integration, and that there has been no violence." He ordered the respondents to cease "obstructing or preventing... the attendance of Negro students" at the high school. [6]

Three hours later Faubus ordered the guardsmen to leave the school. In a broadcast that evening the governor said in part:

> ...I have tried to follow a course that would preserve and maintain the peace and order in Little Rock and in the state.

The calling out of the Guard and every order to its commander was designed to achieve that purpose. Now that a federal court, however, has chosen to substitute its judgment for mine as to how the peace and order should be preserved, I must temporarily at least abide and therefore I have issued orders that all units of the Arkansas National Guard stationed at the high schools in Little Rock be removed therefrom as soon as this can be accomplished...

Now that my authority to preserve and maintain the peace and good order of this community has been so curtailed by this unwarranted action of Judge Davies, I can only offer a fervent prayer that the same thing will not happen here that has happened in other states in recent years...

...If by their own volition the Negroes would refrain from seizing upon that (court declared) right to (attend the school) until such time as there is assurance that it can be accomplished in a peaceful manner as it has been in other sections of the state it would be an act of prudence and good judgment that would be applauded by a vast majority of the people...

I appeal now for reason and clear thinking and good order... The public peace will be preserved... [6]

Saturday, September 21

Commenting in Washington, President Eisenhower called the National Guard withdrawal "a necessary step in the right direction," and expressed confidence that the federal court orders would be executed promptly and without disorder. The New York Times had said on September 8 in "The News of the Week in Review:" "If he withdraws the National Guard so that the Negro students can enter the high school, the battle will be over." But with the tension and unrest which had been generated by this time the withdrawal of the Guard left a dangerous law enforcement vacuum in Little Rock. Noting earlier rumors of a possible troop withdrawal, Mayor Mann had asked the governor to notify him "24 hours before such withdrawal is effected" in order that "proper preparations" might be made. Now, without warning, the responsibility for keeping the peace fell upon the mayor. Mann issued a confident statement saying that a "strong" force of police would be on hand at the high school to prevent any interference with orderly integration. Privately he expressed concern that the approximately one hundred city police available might not be able to cope with the situation.

Governor Faubus left by plane to attend a Southern Governors' Conference at Sea Island, Georgia. Stopping over in Atlanta, he attended a football game, along with several other governors, as a guest of Governor Griffin. When Faubus was introduced over the public address system at Grant Field, the crowd rose and cheered -- the hero image was taking shape. Asked by a reporter if he believed there would be violence in Little Rock Monday, the governor answered: "I think so."

Sunday, September 22

The mayor spent most of Sunday conferring with Congressman Hays -- and with a larger group which included Superintendent of Schools Vigil Blossom, Chief of Police Marvin H. Potts, Assistant Chief Gene Smith, editor Ashmore, former Governor Sid McMath and Ed Dunaway (Winthrop Rockefeller's attorney) -- over the problem of maintaining public order when schools opened on Monday. Among various possibilities explored, efforts were made to secure the aid of United States deputy marshals at Central High School. Many have observed that if federal marshals in plain clothes had been used instead of soldiers to insure the orderly execution of the court order the spectacle would have been vastly less provocative. In later years federal marshals would in fact be used on a large scale to enforce desegregation rulings.

But Attorney General Brownell decided against it.

Monday, September 23

The soldiers assigned by the governor to prevent the admission of Negroes to Central High School having been withdrawn, a white mob accomplished the same purpose by vicious and prolonged rioting. Many received an exaggerated impression of the magnitude of that convulsion. No one was seriously wounded. Maximum estimates placed the number in the crowd around the school at one thousand, and less than half of these were active participants; a few scattered fanatics drove through the city during the day seeking Negroes to harass. But the city was not in turmoil: more than 99 per cent of the people of Little Rock went quietly about their normal occupations. It was a shocking exhibition nonetheless, and it was conveyed swiftly and voluminously to the world. Cameras played on scenes of violence for half a day, while reporters gathered material for a hundred pen pictures of personalities and incidents.

The law enforcement contingent numbered only about 150, of whom 100 were city police and 50, state police. (With 100 additional men -- federal marshals, for instance -- the mob could have been held in check.) The brunt of the struggle was borne by the city police, many of whom had friends among the rioters and shared their feelings; one patrolman walked away from his job and turned in his badge, but most of them, led by Assistant Chief Gene Smith, labored with stubborn courage. At one point a handful of rioters cleared the wooden barricade in front of the school, but a dozen policemen slowly forced them back. Outside the barricade the mob was completely out of hand.

The crowd was beginning to gather around the school by 7 a.m.; it increased steadily as the morning wore on and excitement mounted. Rioting started when the final buzzer sounded for school classes at 8:45. The Negro children were slipped into the school by the delivery entrance. When this was discovered, the cry went up: "The niggers are in our school!" --and the mob was seized with a screaming, howling frenzy. Any Negro was attacked on sight but "Yankee" and Negro reporters were special targets of segregationist fury -- of which several correspondents of Life magazine and four representatives of Negro publications were conspicuous victims. The most widely circulated photos were those of Alex Wilson, Negro editor of the Memphis Tri-State Defender, whose stoic dignity while being beaten, knocked down and kicked in the stomach was impressive. At 11:30 school authorities decided to remove the Negro children for safety, and this was accomplished in police cars. When the announcement was made over a loudspeaker that the Negroes had been removed, the tumult began to subside.

Phone calls to the White House for help had received replies which were unilluminating but tersely suggestive of impending action. That afternoon the President issued the following proclamation:

> I want to make several things very clear in connection with the disgraceful occurrences of today at Central High School in the city of Little Rock: They are:
>
> 1. The federal law and orders of a United States District Court, implementing that law, cannot be flouted with impunity by any individual, or any mob of extremists.
> 2. I will use the full power of the United States, including whatever force may be necessary to prevent any obstruction of the law and to carry out the orders of the federal court.

3. Of course, every right-thinking citizen will hope that the American sense of justice and fair play will prevail in this case. It will be a sad day for this country -- both at home and abroad -- if school children can safely attend their classes only under the protection of armed guards.

4. I repeat my expressed confidence that the citizens of Little Rock and of Arkansas will respect the law and will not countenance violations of law and order by extremists.

Whereas certain persons in the state of Arkansas, individually and in unlawful assemblies, combinations, and conspiracies, have wilfully obstructed the enforcement of orders of the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Arkansas with respect to matters relating to enrollment and attendance at public schools, particularly at Central High School, located in Little Rock school district, Little Rock, Arkansas, and

Whereas, such willful obstruction of justice hinders the execution of the laws of that state and of the United States, and makes it impracticable to enforce such laws by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, and

Whereas, such obstruction of justice constitutes a denial of the equal protection of the laws secured by the Constitution of the United States and impedes the course of justice under those laws;

Now, therefore, I, Dwight D. Eisenhower, President of the United States, under and by the virtue of the authority vested in me by the Constitution and statutes of the United States, including Chapter 13 of Title 10, of the United States Code, particularly Sections 332, 333 and 334 thereof, do command all persons engaged in such obstruction of justice to cease and desist therefrom, and to disperse forthwith... [6]

From Sea Island Governor Faubus grieved at "the thing I sought to prevent happening," and called upon the people of Little Rock "to do everything possible to restore calm." But Governor McKeldin of Maryland said: "Governor Faubus wrote the book, set the stage and directed the play for today's unhappy occurrences in Arkansas." [7]

Tuesday, September 24

The Negro students stayed at home Tuesday, and in the wake of the President's proclamation, only about two hundred demonstrators gathered at the school. Some of the only eleven arrests made were of persons recognized as participants in the violence of the previous day.

Secretary of Defense Charles E. Wilson called the 9,936 officers and men of the Arkansas National Guard into federal service and rushed one thousand men of the 101st Airborne Division of the Regular Army to Little Rock. The first group of five hundred men flew from Fort Campbell, Kentucky, and arrived at the Little Rock Air Force Base near the city in mid-afternoon. At nightfall twenty-six vehicles, including trucks, half-tracks and jeeps -- filled with troops dressed in battle fatigue -- drove up to Central High School.

Returning to Little Rock Tuesday afternoon Faubus said on arrival: "I feel like MacArthur. I have been relieved." (A few days later he would compare himself with General Robert E. Lee. An earlier reference to his "crucifixion" had suggested a more extravagant comparison.)

President Eisenhower had said in a press conference as late as July 17: "I can't imagine any set of circumstances that would ever induce me to send federal troops into a federal court and into any area to enforce the orders of a federal court, because I believe that the common sense of America will never require it." Now in a radio-television address to the nation the President said in part:

> For a few minutes I want to speak to you about the serious situation that has arisen in Little Rock....
>
> .....
> In that city, under the leadership of demagogic extremists, disorderly mobs have deliberately prevented the carrying out of proper orders from a federal court.

Local authorities have not eliminated that violent opposition and, under the law, I yesterday issued a proclamation calling upon the mob to disperse.

This morning the mob again gathered in front of the Central High School of Little Rock, obviously for the purpose of again preventing the carrying out of the court's order relating to the admission of Negro children to the school.

Whenever normal agencies prove inadequate to the task and it becomes necessary for the executive branch of the federal government to use its powers and authority to uphold federal courts, the President's responsibility is inescapable.

In accordance with that responsibility, I have today issued an executive order directing the use of troops under federal authority to aid in the execution of federal law at Little Rock, Arkansas. This became necessary when my proclamation of yesterday was not observed, and the obstruction of justice still continues.

It is important that the reasons for my action be understood by all citizens.

As you know, the Supreme Court of the United States has decided that separate public educational facilities for the races are inherently unequal and therefore compulsory school segregation laws are unconstitutional.

Our personal opinions about the decision have no bearing on the matter of enforcement; the responsibility and authority of the Supreme Court to interpret the Constitution are clear. Local federal courts were instructed by the Supreme Court to issue such orders and decrees as might be necessary to achieve admission to public schools without regard to race -- and with all deliberate speed.

.....

Proper and sensible observance of the law then demanded the respectful obedience which the nation has a right to expect from all the people. This, unfortunately, has not been the case at Little Rock. Certain misguided persons, many of them imported into Little Rock by agitators, have insisted upon defying the law and have sought to bring it into disrepute. The orders of the court have thus been frustrated.

.....

At a time when we face a grave situation abroad because of the hatred that communism bears toward a system of government based on human rights, it would be difficult to exaggerate the harm that is being done to the prestige and influence, and indeed to the safety, of our nation and the world.

.....

...If resistance to the federal court orders ceases at once, the further presence of federal troops will be unnecessary and the city of Little Rock will return to its normal habits of peace and order and a blot upon the fair name and high honor of our nation in the world will be removed.

Wednesday, September 25

The nine Negro children entered Central High School under troop escort. Major General Edwin A. Walker, commander of the Arkansas Military District, who directed the federal military operation, explained his mission to the press and lectured the white students before the arrival of the Negroes with fatherly sternness. (This distinguished soldier, who carried out his unpleasant assignment in Little Rock with notable efficiency, would figure in a sadly contrasting role in another desegregation crisis five years later.)

A sullen calm descended upon Little Rock.

Almost nobody was entirely happy over the use of the United States Army ~~in the crisis~~ to enforce a school desegregation order. The South seethed with indignation. The rest of the nation reacted in the main with a somber feeling of relief that the President had finally acted. There were divergent views of Eisenhower's performance during the earlier stages of the crisis, but a remarkable degree of unity in approving the use of military force in the situation which had developed on September 24.

Approval was expressed by the two living former presidents, Hoover and Truman, President Eisenhower's recent Democratic opponent, Adlai Stevenson, by many other public figures of both political parties, and by most of the press.

In foreign countries, where Little Rock had been prominent in the news since the end of August the climactic events were followed with avid interest. Some of the earlier damage was offset by the exhibition of American military might being used to protect the rights of colored citizens. A Voice of America official told the United Press that foreign reaction to the crisis had been growing "sharper in tone and more disturbed." The Voice now broadcast news of the troop intervention and President Eisenhower's radio-television speech in 43 languages. The United States Information Agency sent the text of the address to its seventy posts abroad for distribution.

Governor Faubus nourished the growing bitterness in Arkansas with scurrility and canard. He accused federal troops of "bludgeoning innocent bystanders, with bayonets in the backs of little girls and the warm, red blood of patriotic American citizens staining the cold, naked unsheathed knives;" and charged that teen-aged school girls had been taken by the FBI "and held incommunicado for hours of questioning." He addressed -- and gave to the press -- a letter to General Walker saying that he had "received a number of complaints from parents, mostly mothers, about your troops accompanying the girl students into their dressing rooms." The charges were hotly denied.

There was a universal desire, in which the Administration expressly joined, to see the federal troops withdrawn from Little Rock at the earliest safe date. The Southern Governors' Conference appointed five of its members to negotiate with Faubus and the President to this end. One of the five, Griffin, of Georgia -- who praised Faubus's procedure -- did not serve. The four others reached an understanding with Faubus and the President under which the former would give certain public assurances, after which the latter would order the troop withdrawal. On October 1 the White House issued the following statement:

> The President today met with four members of the committee representing the Southern Governors' Conference. These members were Governor LeRoy Collins of Florida, Governor Luther Hodges of North Carolina, Governor Theodore McKeldin of Maryland and Governor Frank Clement of Tennessee.
>
> At the meeting the governors informed the President that the governor of Arkansas had authorized them to state that he is prepared to assume full responsibility for maintaining law and order in Little Rock, and, in connection therewith, will not obstruct the orders of the federal courts.
>
> The President stated that upon a declaration on the part of the governor of Arkansas that he will not obstruct the orders of the federal courts and will, in connection therewith, maintain law and order in Little Rock, the President will direct the secretary of defense to return the command of the Arkansas National Guard to the governor. Thereupon, as soon as practicable, all federal troops will be withdrawn. [8]

Within two hours Governor Faubus issued this statement:

> At a meeting of a committee representing the Southern Governors' Conference this afternoon at the White House, the President was informed at my request that it has never been my intention to obstruct the orders of the federal courts, that the orders of the federal courts will not be obstructed by me, and that I am prepared, as I have always been, to assume full responsibility for maintaining law and order in Little Rock.

This has been consistently my stand and viewpoint throughout the controversy.

On the basis of this assurance, the President has declared that the Arkansas National Guard will be returned to my command and thereafter as soon as practicable all federal troops will be withdrawn.

I now declare, that upon withdrawal of federal troops, I will again assume full responsibility, in cooperation with local authorities, for the maintenance of law and order, and that the orders of the federal courts will not be obstructed by me.[6]

President Eisenhower found this statement unsatisfactory. The four governors said that the wording was changed from the text previously agreed upon. Governor McKeldin termed it "ignominious doublecrossing." The precise changes were never fully revealed, -- to avoid embarrassment in further efforts which might be made -- but the President said in a press conference on October 3: "The message that came back must be read as a whole, and you will find that all the way through it says, 'As I have intended from the beginning,' meaning that anything stated in the telegram merely took the situation back to where it was before the federal troops arrived."

The President then issued this statement:

The statement issued this evening by the governor of Arkansas does not constitute in my opinion the assurance that he intends to use his full powers as governor to prevent the obstruction of the orders of the United States district court.

Under the circumstances the President of the United States has no recourse at the present time except to maintain federal surveillance of the situation.

I want to commend the governors representing the Southern Conference for their cooperative attitude at their meeting today. I hope they will continue their efforts, as will the federal government, to bring about a basis for the withdrawal of the federal forces in Little Rock and for the orderly carrying out of the orders of the district court.[8]

A wave of sympathy with Faubus spread over the South, rising to boundless acclaim in extreme segregationist circles; the governor's soaring popularity in Arkansas would be attested by unprecedented majorities in coming elections. Southern bitterness toward President Eisenhower went beyond verbal fulminations; in Arkansas a United States Savings Bond committee chairman and several Selective Service Board members resigned; Governor Timmerman of South Carolina resigned his commission as a member of the United States Naval Reserve. Thoughtful segregationist leaders in most of the South drew from Little Rock the salutary lesson -- which would have a quiet effect upon future decisions -- that all the power of the federal government stood behind the rulings of federal courts; and the counsel, "Remember Little Rock" -- though it only aroused anger now -- would within a few years be found a cogent argument for proceeding with court-ordered school desegregation. But the immediate effect was to embarrass or silence "moderates," increase race tension and strengthen the position of the advocates of resistance in every political situation.

By the end of October the Negro pupils were attending Central High School without escort, and on November 27 the last Regular Army troops were withdrawn from Little Rock. A progressively shrinking detachment of the federalized National Guard continued its surveillance until the school year ended on May 27, 1958. Eight Negro children remained in school throughout the year, and one of them graduated with the remainder of his class.

The School-Closing Experiment

Nineteen fifty-eight was a year of virtual standstill in the movement toward the termination of public school segregation in the South. Even the scattered desegregation initiatives in western Texas came to a halt before an obstruction erected by that state in 1957: its legislature prescribed that state school funds would be withheld from any district in which desegregation should be undertaken without a prior expression of approval by a majority of the voters in a referendum election. In Little Rock, Arkansas, and in three Virginia cities, schools serving approximately 16,000 pupils were closed to prevent the admission of Negroes to them. The action in Virginia was a part of a bold program of so-called "massive resistance," the manifestations of which for long periods -- between violent outbreaks elsewhere -- had dominated the news from the South.

There was no violence in Virginia -- a fact which citizens of that state of all shades of opinion on the segregation issue recall with justifiable pride. Virginia went through the cycle of hesitant acceptance of the Brown decision at first blush, then fierce defiance of the ruling and, finally, relatively substantial compliance with it, entirely without serious disorder. There was never a riot, or a bombing -- not even a fisticuff -- over the issue in the Old Dominion. Yet Virginia during the first four years after the Supreme Court's 1954 decision was probably more influential than any other state in setting the South upon a course of resistance to it; anguish, other than physical, was also suffered by many Virginians during that experience. With Kilpatrick's interposition and Byrd's Southern Manifesto Virginia threw down the gauntlet; and, as if in response, the initial procedure for enforcement of the desegregation ruling was focussed mainly on that state: the NAACP was more active and had a larger membership in Virginia than in any other Southern state and far more desegregation suits were in litigation there. At the legal and dialectic level, Richmond, the Southern Confederacy's capital, and Virginia, the home of General Robert E. Lee, became once more the battleground in a struggle between North and South. The nostalgic implications of Virginia's position as the northernmost bastion of this twentieth century Southern rebellion gave a sentimental stimulus to its own political leaders and a certain authority to the Virginia example in the eyes of other Southern states. "If Virginia surrenders," Senator Byrd declared -- "if the Virginia line is broken, the rest of the South will go down too." 3

It is interesting to note that one Southern state, Virginia's contiguous neighbor North Carolina, was little impressed. A contrast in the general attitudes of those two traditional rivals has impressed many observers, including Arnold Toynbee. 1 For example, North Carolina makes liberal use of the state's credit in developing highways and other public improvements, while Virginians cling to a "pay-as-you-go" policy and warn that North Carolina is moving down a primrose path to fiscal bonfire. Similarly North Carolina approached the problems posed by the Brown decision in a spirit disdainfully out of harmony with Virginia's "massive resistance." North Carolina adopted no interposition resolution, and local option -- which was anathema to the massive resistance proponents -- was the cornerstone of the North Carolina plan. In the South as a whole Virginia enjoyed an unique prestige -- due perhaps to Virginia leadership in its diminished present as much as to its illustrious past. The Old Dominion had long been ruled by a genteel, respected line of politicians, and Harry Byrd was a Southern favorite, fondly put forward from time to time as a possible candidate for President of the United States. When the leaders of sedate, conservative Virginia defied the United States Supreme Court, other Southerners felt more comfortable in doing so.

Resistance to the Brown decision was a natural impulse of many in the South, but the precise thing called "massive resistance" was both in name and concept a Virginia product. In its broadest reach it aimed at establishing a united front among the eleven former Confederate states. Senator Byrd regarded the Southern Manifesto as "a part of the plan of massive resistance we've been working on," and envisioned the possibility "that some form of action" could "be accepted as a pattern for all." [2]

Another connotation of massive resistance -- one which had a greater impact upon the course of events -- was the concept of total resistance, or a united front within each state. Paradoxically, the foremost champions of local option at the state level sought to extinguish local option on this issue at the level of smaller governmental subdivisions. Even before local option was suppressed by Virginia legislation, any county or city which showed signs of moving toward adjustment to the desegregation ruling incurred wrathful criticism and cries of "betrayal." When near the end of 1955 the school board of Arlington County drew up a tentative plan for desegregation of that county's public schools, the state legislature punished it by taking away the county's privilege of electing its school board by popular vote. A dozen counties in western Virginia, where the small Negro population presented only a minor problem, were thinking in terms of compliance with the desegregation ruling until the heavy hand of massive resistance descended upon them. A similar compulsion to conform to the lowest common denominator of race prejudice in a state prevented many other communities in the South from clearing their comparatively easy desegregation hurdles, it remains a major obstacle to beginnings of compliance with the Brown decision in the Deep South.

Virginia's massive resistance was written into law -- into twenty-three laws, to be specific -- in a special session of the legislature, convened for the purpose in September 1956. After a year of defiant fulminations, in which moderate voices were almost silenced, a majority of the legislators came prepared to vote for almost any bill that was thrown into the hopper if it was designed to prevent desegregation or harass the NAACP. It did not prove to be an impressive majority in the initial test. House Bill No. 1, was a proposal of Governor Stanley and had received the bulk of the advance publicity; it cut off state school funds from any district in which any Negro child should be admitted to a white school. This key bill received 61 to 37 votes in the House of Delegates, but it passed the Senate by only 21 to 17, and an eighteenth opposing senator, who was ill, let it be known that he would have attended the session if his vote should have been decisive. However, the test demonstrated that the massive resistance faction was in firm control and little opposition was offered to the remaining twenty-two bills.

It is interesting in passing to examine the vote at the test which cleared the track for the massive resistance legislation. The twenty-one senators voting for House Bill No. 1 represented districts containing little more than one million of the state's 2,581,555 white inhabitants (by the 1950 census); Virginia Negroes opposed the legislation with practical unaniminy. With a more equitable pattern of legislative apportionment, which the Supreme Court has since required, the massive resistance aberration might conceivably have gone no further. There is, indeed, much evidence to support the speculation that adjustment to the Brown decision would have been easier in Virginia than elsewhere in the South if the ruling political organization had decided to point the state in that direction. Catholic parochial schools and state institutions of higher learning were desegregated early in Virginia without incident; Negroes represented only 22.2 per cent of the state's population and in twenty-one counties and three cities Negro residents ranged from none at all to five per cent of the total population; and across the border in Maryland, West Virginia and the District of Columbia compliance had begun promptly after the Brown decision was handed down. A large element -- and by far the most articulate element -- of Virginians rallied to the banner of massive resistance with enthusiasm, but there is reason to believe that the reckless adventure was never favored by a majority of the people of that state.

The twenty-three bills in the massive resistance package passed by the Virginia legislature in September 1956 included sixteen enactments dealing directly with the school segregation problem and seven aimed at the NAACP. One of the former was actually more drastic than House Bill No. 1: it would block school integration before the point of withholding funds could be reached. This Senate Bill No. 56 contained many complicated provisions which no one clearly understood, but the heart of it was the blunt command that in the event of the enrollment of any child of another race, "such school is closed and removed from the public school system." Another measure established a three-member board with the responsibility for assigning all pupils to public schools throughout the state. In the event somehow that some white children might still find themselves with only integrated public schools to attend, the compulsory school attendance law was repealed. A plan was adopted to help finance private school education with tuition grants to pupils from public funds, but this was to run into legal difficulties which would prevent the grants from being available to meet the need for which they were intended when public schools were closed.

During the next two years Virginians watched -- nervously in the communities involved but with only casual interest elsewhere -- while NAACP lawyers pushed doggedly on with litigation in federal courts for desegregation of schools in five Virginia districts. In November 1957 State Attorney General J. Lindsay Almond, Jr. was elected to succeed Stanley as governor. Committed to "oppose with every faculty at our command, and every ounce of our energy, the attempt to mix white and Negro children in our classrooms"[4] -- and aided by the furor over Little Rock -- Almond received 65 per cent of the popular vote; his Republican opponent was Ted Dalton, an enemy of massive resistance. Dissent was voiced by a few thoughtful leaders, including former Governor Colgate W. Darden, but sentiment publicly expressed continued to be overwhelmingly in support of the massive resistance program. No major newspaper except the Norfolk Virginian-Pilot spoke out boldly against the school-closing plan. Yet few really believed that schools would be closed: most people felt that something -- no one could say what -- would happen to avert that calamity. In a glibly vague way, champions of massive resistance contemplated resort to private schools, but no significant steps were taken to expand the state's private school facilities. Although the Defenders of State Sovereignty and Individual Liberties (the Virginia version of Citizens' Councils) were instrumental in the setting up in May 1958 of an organization, called the Virginia Education Fund, for promoting private school projects, it aroused little public interest and its fund solicitations brought only a meager response.

By the summer of 1958 the litigation in the Norfolk, Charlottesville and Arlington County cases seemed clearly headed for final, unappealable court orders to desegregate schools come September. Moderates had been largely silenced or driven underground, but Arlington County, in the metropolitan area of Washington, D. C. -- and it had been conspicuously cold toward massive resistance -- become aroused. An Arlington Committee to Preserve Public Schools was launched and quickly rallied several thousand members. (It was the nucleus of a similar statewide organization which would develop after school-closing began.) There was talk of plans for massive demonstrations, even a taxpayers' strike, if Arlington schools should be closed by the state. But to the vast relief of the massive resistance leaders an Arlington explosion was to be averted by a district court ruling of September 17 allowing that county to postpone desegregation until mid-term. (A suit for the desegregation of schools in Newport News had been complicated and delayed by the merger of that city with the neighboring city of Warwick.)

The showdown came first in an unexpected quarter. In little Warren County in northwest Virginia court action on a suit for school desegregation was consummated with a dispatch which remains a record for the South. Twenty-two Negro pupils applied for admission to Warren County High School in July; when their applications were rejected by the State Pupil Placement Board on August 29, NAACP lawyers filed the suit in the federal district court in their behalf the same day; on September 8 Judge John Paul granted an injunction requiring the plaintiff's admission to the school; and on September 12 -- just two weeks after the suit was filed -- the order was made effective immediately by a refusal of stay by Judge Simon E. Sobeloff of the Circuit Court of Appeals. (The action was affirmed by the full appeals court on September 27) The Negro students were immediately enrolled in Warren High School effective Monday, September 15, and a few hours later the lightning struck. That Friday evening, September 12, at 8:30 p.m. reporters were handed copies of the following notice which Governor Almond had sent to Superintendent Q. D. Gasque and the Warren County school board.

> Under compulsion of an order issued by the U.S. District Court for the Western District of Virginia, both white and colored children have been enrolled effective September 15, 1958, in the Warren County High School, located in the county of Warren.
>
> Pursuant to the provisions of Chapter 9.1 of the Code of Virginia, the Warren County High School is closed and is removed from the public school system, effective September 15, 1958, and all authority, power and control over such school, its principal, teachers, other employees and all pupils now enrolled or ordered to be enrolled, will thereupon be vested in the Commonwealth of Virginia, to be exercised by the governor.
>
> Accordingly, by virtue of the authority vested in me as chief executive of the Commonwealth of Virginia, I will thereupon assume all power And control over such school and hereby request all local officials and all citizens to cooperate with the Department of State Police and local law enforcement officers in the protection of public property and the security of public peace and order.
> You are requested to forthwith notify all teachers and other personnel connected with such school, and all parents and other persons having the custody and care of all pupils enrolled or ordered to be enrolled in such school, of this action.

One thousand Warren County children were left with no school to attend. Meanwhile the legal machinery ground inexorably on to ~~peremptory~~ desegregation orders and the harsh implementation of massive resistance in Charlottesville and Norfolk. On September 19 Governor Almond paraphrased his message to the Warren County school authorities and closed two Charlottesville schools, locking out over 1,700 pupils; on September 27 he closed Norfolk's six white high schools with an aggregate enrollment of approximately 10,000.

These schools were not closed at the instance of the pupils or the parents involved, but in pursuance of an act of the Virginia legislature. The parents now set about frantically to find schools for their children to attend. Some who could afford the expense placed them in regular Virginia private schools, but the few dozen vacancies in these were quickly filled. Displaced Virginia students were sent to private or public schools as far away as Connecticut and California; exiles from Norfolk schools were scattered over twenty-nine states. (Ironically some of the displaced white students from Virginia were accommodated in racially integrated schools!) The emergency was met most efficiently in Charlottesville, where two alert civic organizations organized classes in a new private school and in churches, homes and miscellaneous vacant buildings for more than 1,300 pupils. But by mid-October less than half of Norfolk's 10,000 displaced pupils had found schooling, and in Warren County only 162 of the schoolless children had been accommodated in improvised classes.

The liquidation of the public school system, which massive resistance enthusiasts had held out as an acceptable alternative to racial integration, had begun; presumably it might go on district by district as Negro plaintiffs and federal courts moved. But the showdown, when it came, revealed how largely the massive resistance furor had been an emotional outlet rather than a matter of realistic planning. The state was not prepared for any substantial changeover to private schools. Where, for instance, were the private schools? It would take many years and hundreds of millions of dollars to provide private schools for Virginia's 800,000 school children. Millions would be needed to provide adequately even for the students now locked out of public schools.

At 4:30 p.m. of that Friday evening, September 12, several hours before Governor Almond framed his notice to the Warren County school board, Governor Faubus signed a proclamation closing the four high schools of Little Rock. School doors were shut there to 3,698 pupils by the 1958-1959 registration -- 2,071 at Central High School, 731 at Hall, 717 at Horace Mann and 179 at the Technical High School. Unlike the Virginia action, Faubus's order affected Negroes as well as whites: Horace Mann High School was a segregated school for Negroes.

The Little Rock move differed from the long-premeditated operation in Virginia in other ways. Faubus found his authorization in a bill which the Arkansas legislature had passed in a special session the previous month; it had lain on his desk until he signed it into law on that same fateful Friday, September 12. His provocation was a refusal of the Supreme Court to allow a two-and-a-half-year suspension of racial integration at Central High School, which a federal district court had granted earlier.

The year's experience had far from reconciled the Little Rock populace to the mixing of white and Negro school children. In seeking the court's permission to withdraw the Negro students and postpone integration, the school authorities had reported "chaos, bedlam and turmoil," at Central during the past year; they testified that there had been thirty "nuisance fires" in the school building; that search parties had been organized on twenty-three occasions to look for hidden bombs; that firecracker explosions had been a constant distraction; and that two hundred pupils had been suspended and three expelled. They attributed the public hostility largely to the attitude of the governor and the legislature. (School board chairman Wayne Upton testified in court that a consideration of the board in proposing January 1961 as the date for resumption of integration was the belief that by that time Governor Faubus would no longer be in office!) The Arkansas statute required that school-closing should be followed within thirty days by a referendum on the question of school integration. In the election, which was held on September 27, only the five polling places in Negro neighborhoods showed majorities for integration; the vote was 19,470 "against" and 7,561 "for."

The governor said that "feelings" were "more intense" than when federal troops surrounded Central High School, and that, if the troops should return, "they would be met this year by the cold fury of the people...." Faubus, running in the August primary for an unprecedented third term, had received more votes than any other candidate for governor in the history of Arkansas -- 264,346 out of a total of 383,904 votes cast.

Little Rock delayed longer than the Virginia cities in settling down to private school improvisations through faith in an illusory scheme for simply transferring the high schools from public to private operation. In two broadcasts urging a vote against integration in the September 27 referendum, Governor Faubus had assured his hearers that this simple changeover plan was "sound and workable" and one to which "the advocates of the so-called 'law of the land' can have no objection." Accordingly, two days after the September 27 referendum, the school signed a contract leasing the school properties to a newly-found "Little Rock Private School Corporation." But the United States Circuit Court of Appeals quickly issued an order blocking the transfer to the private school group. Uncertainty existed for another six weeks -- although hopes faded under repeated extensions of the restraining order -- until the appeals court on November 10 issued a formal decree enjoining the school board from "taking any further steps or action, without the approval of the District Court, to transfer possession, control or operation, whether directly or indirectly, of any of the senior high schools or any other property or facilities of the Little Rock School District, to any organization or person, for carrying on any segregated school operations of any nature;..."

However, due to greater public excitement and the fame which Faubus and the city had achieved the year before, Little Rock was somewhat more fortunate than the Virginia cities in raising funds to get private schools started. A fund-raising campaign was conducted by mail from the governor's office and contributions were received from sympathizers far and near: checks for $11,100 and $18,071 respectively were sent by two groups in Louisiana; a number of Mississippi communities sent smaller sums; $18.15 came from a group in Johannesburg, South Africa. By the end of October about $150,000 had been collected. Arkansas was also able, after some delay to make tuition grants available to displaced students at the rate of $172.66 per year per pupil, according to a specified formula; the state began sending out payments late in November.

On October 21 the Little Rock Private School Corporation started classes for seniors in a building purchased from the University of Arkansas by a wealthy friend of Faubus for $50,900, and some juniors and sophomores were accommodated later in two hurriedly purchased warehouses, bringing the corporation's total enrollment to about 850. Protestant churches -- Baptist, Episcopal, Methodist and Presbyterian -- carried the biggest pupil load; the "Baptist High School," meeting in two churches, enrolled about four hundred. Approximately 650 white students were attending schools outside the city, including 449 in nearby county schools. By the end of October two thirds of the white students were in classes of some kind. As for the Negro high school students, about two hundred were able to enroll in segregated county schools, but nearly all of the remaining five hundred were left without schooling of any kind. Of the original nine Negro pupils who had attended Central High School, the five remaining in the city took the correspondence courses offered to high school pupils by the University of Little Rock.

The thought of resort to segregated private schools as an ultimate recourse when federal court desegregation orders could no longer be warded off had been harbored by many in all sections of the South. Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina and South Carolina, as well as Virginia and Arkansas, had legislation which could be used to close public schools at which racial integration might be imminent or might have taken place. (After the occurrences of September 1957, Florida, Texas and Virginia adopted further so-called "Little Rock laws," requiring the closing of any schools patrolled by federal troops.)

Much of the school-closing legislation elsewhere had been patterned after Virginia's and Virginia was the first to carry into effect a statewide plan. The Virginia experiment, therefore, was watched with particular interest. During the initial hysteria in that state some enthusiasm had been expressed, even by the students and parents affected, over the move, but dissatisfaction mounted as the novelty of improvised classes wore off. The few private schools and all the makeshift arrangements fell far short of meeting the emergency. Little Warren County, though late getting started, in the end came nearest to finding classes for all of its displaced pupils; a single organization, launched in the spirit of a civic enterprise -- and with much outside help -- succeeded in setting up a segregated "Mosby Academy" and was providing schooling for 780 pupils by the end of the year. But in Norfolk, Virginia's largest city, 3,000 children were deprived of any schooling at all, and over 4,000 were attending loosely organized tutoring classes -- meeting in twenty-seven churches and synagogues and in basements, attics, living rooms and the like. Many classes had been organized simply by groups of mothers, who would bring together a dozen or two dozen children, then find a teacher and a classroom for them. There was no evidence that the state, or even, for the most part, the communities affected, were grappling realistically with the stupendous problem of establishing private schools for masses of children.

A few enthusiasts, like the Richmond News Leader, argued that a proliferation of private schools, with their release from uniformity of curriculum and philosophy, was a desirable end even apart from the aim of preserving racial segregation, and suggested that the South eventually might have this crisis to thank for an educational advance. Out of the confusion following the closing of public schools several more or less permanent private schools did emerge in the Virginia districts affected. But they served only a fraction of the local school population, and no broad trend developed. The Little Rock Private School Corporation would dissolve after the 1958-1959 school term. Elsewhere in the South there had been no rush to private schools. The Southern School News, in its edition of November 1959, published the results of a survey which showed that a steady, but not a sensational, growth of private school enrollment in the South over the previous five years. The recent opening of a few new private schools in the Atlanta metropolitan area and in Montgomery, Alabama, was attributed in part to a fear of racial integration -- or a fear of closed public schools. Reports from most Southern states, however, indicated that such increase in private school enrollment as had taken place had not been significantly affected by the segregation controversy.

The school litigation in Little Rock -- which had raised hopes of a suspension of integration, then dashed them with the order which triggered school-closing -- ripened in a stern and sweeping opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States. Designated Cooper v. Aaron (after William G. Cooper, a school board member, and after John Aaron, a Negro student) it was the most important pronouncement of the high tribunal on public school desegregation next to the Brown rulings of 1954 and 1955.[6]

Incidentally, the Department of Justice -- where Brownell had been succeeded by Attorney General William P. Rogers -- was prepared to use federal marshals in the Little Rock school crisis in the fall of 1958. Over one hundred were on hand in early September to help insure an orderly operation if Faubus had allowed Central High School to reopen with the Negroes in attendance.

The Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals had reversed the district court's decision[7] allowing a "temporary delay" of integration at Central High School and the case had gone to the Supreme Court on further appeal. After a lengthy review of the whole Central High School integration story the appeals court had said: "We say the time has not yet come in these United States when an order of a federal court must be whittled away, watered down, or shamefully withdrawn in the face of violent and unlawful acts of individual citizens in opposition thereto." [8]

The Supreme Court order of September 12 was a simple affirmation of the appeals court decision, with the promise: "The expression of the views supporting our judgment will be prepared and announced in due course."

The opinion which the Supreme Court handed down September 29, three times the length of the original Brown decision, reviewed the whole story of the school desegregation attempt in Little Rock and then strengthened and amplified the court's earlier rulings, with the broad picture of Southern resistance plainly in view. As for the predicament of the Little Rock school board the court said:

> One may well sympathize with the position of the Board in the face of the frustrating conditions which have confronted it, but regardless of the Board's good faith, the actions of the other state agencies responsible for those conditions compel us to reject the board's legal position.
> .....
> The Constitutional rights of respondents are not to be sacrificed or yielded to the violence and disorder which have followed upon the actions of the Governor and Legislature.

The gentle tone of the 1954 and 1955 rulings was gone now, along with some vagueness. To an armful of Southern plans for circumvention of the desegregation ruling the court struck a crushing blow.

> In short, the Constitutional rights of children not to be discriminated against in school admission on grounds of race or color declared by this Court in the Brown case can neither be nullified openly and directly by state legislators or state executive or judicial officers, nor nullified indirectly by them through evasive schemes for segregation whether attempted "ingenuously." Smith v. Texas, 311 U.S. 128, 132.

Since the 1954 decision John Marshall Harlan, William J. Brennan, Jr., and Charles Evans Whittaker had been appointed to fill Supreme Court vacancies. The opinion was signed by each member of the court, an unprecedented move to emphasize the justices' unanimity and determination, and the court observed:

> The basic decision in Brown was unanimously reached by this Court only after the case had been briefed and twice argued and the issues had been given the most serious consideration. Since the first Brown opinion, three new Justices have come to the Court. They are at one with the Justices still on the Court who participated in that basic decision as to its correctness, and that decision is now unanimously reaffirmed....

Justice Felix Frankfurter -- "while unreservedly participating with my brethren in our joint opinion" -- ~~[illegible]~~ appended an individual concurring opinion, from which several of the dicta of this sage and erudite jurist are excerpted below:

> Violent resistance to law cannot be made a legal reason for its suspension without loosening the fabric of our society.

> Local customs, however hardened by time, are not decreed in heaven.

> Compliance with decisions of this court, as the constitutional organ of the supreme law of the land, has often, throughout our history, depended on active support by state and local authorities. It presupposes such support. To withhold it, and indeed to use political power to try to paralyze the supreme law, precludes the maintenance of our federal system as we have known and cherished it for one hundred and seventy years.

Representative Brooks Hays, who had labored to avert the Little Rock explosion in September 1957, was rewarded for his moderation by defeat at the polls in 1958. A veteran congressman of extraordinary popularity in the nation -- and hitherto in his district, which included Little Rock --Hays survived the Democratic primary, but lost by a few votes in the November election to a write-in candidate and an uncompromising segregationist, Dr. Dale Alford.

The Agony of the South

The gesture of abandoning public education testified no less than the rioting to the depth of the emotions which the Brown decision had aroused in the South. But neither the one nor the other gave more than an inkling of the sinister malaise which had seized a gallant and gracious people.

The outbreaks of domestic violence that attended school desegregation were not the bloodiest which the nation had seen even in the twentieth century. (No one as yet had been fatally injured in a riot.) Freedom to the Free, the report of the Civil Rights Commission on the one hundredth anniversary of the Emancipation Proclamation recalls: "...During the last six months of 1919, there were some 25 race riots. During July there were three days of violence in the Nation's Capital. Later in the month, Chicago fell victim to 13 days of lawlessness. The state militia was called out on the fourth day of the rioting. The Chicago death toll was 38 -- 15 whites and 23 Negroes...."

But the Southern challenge to federal authority in the 1950's was graver than any that had arisen before since the Civil War; and with this kind of rebellion a fever had spread over the disaffected regions -- a fever of conformity to a single line of thought and purpose and intolerance of dissent -- which was reminiscent of its pre-Civil War reaction to the Abolitionist movement. A deterioration, not of public schools but of public enlightenment in a broader sense, and a popular distortion of human values, were accompanying afflictions.

That liberties were taken daily with history, sociology, anthropology, theology and current news to prove the segregationist thesis was not alarming in itself. There are controversial areas, in which views on one side, even extreme views, of course, are properly to be heard. But, unless the other side is allowed equal opportunity for expression, an intellectual imbalance results and inaccuracies of fact remain uncorrected. In the South in the late 1950's speakers opposed to racial segregation, however learned or distinguished, were scorned and seldom permitted to be heard; books which challenged racist theories were removed from school libraries, and teachers who questioned the wisdom of defying the Supreme Court's desegregation ruling were silenced or dismissed. In human relations, kindness and brotherly behavior -- if they crossed the racial line -- came to be regarded, not as virtues, but as transgressions; segregationists found even clergymen to support the assertion that "the so-called Fatherhood of God and brotherhood of man was repudiated by Christ...."[1] The words "liberal" and even "moderate" had become terms of reproach.

Meanwhile persons, white or colored, who protested against these things were persecuted in a variety of ways. The sickness was most pervasive in 1958 and early 1959; a cleansing breeze began to blow across the northern marches and headed southward in 1959, but the malady lingered and worsened for several more years in the Deep South, and in large areas it is present in a malignant form today.

Hodding Carter, said in an address in Nashville, Tennessee, in May 1957: "...The first amendment to our Constitution is probably in more danger in the South today than are either our white or Negro children." Those who spoke out against resistance to the Supreme Court decision, or even called for constructive discussion of the problem, found themselves in uncomfortable and embarrassing situations, or even in physical danger. A dissenter from the segregationist line often found former friends unwilling to associate with him; even if privately sympathetic, they feared the consequences of this identification. An outspoken dissenter was likely to be harassed by insulting phone calls and might find rocks thrown in his window or garbage piled on his doorstep; in some instances hostility was expressed in dynamite explosions.

In a decision invalidating three of Virginia's "anti-NAACP laws" a federal court described the situation existing in that state in 1958 in the following language:

> ...The agitation involved in the widespread discussion of the subject, and the passage of the statutes by the Legislature, have had a marked effect upon the public mind, which has been reflected in hostility to the activities of the plaintiffs in these cases. This has been shown not only by the falling off of (NAACP) revenues, indicated above, but also by manifestations of ill will toward white and colored citizens who are known to be sympathetic with the aspirations of the colored people for equal treatment, particularly in the field of public education. A number of white people who attempted to give aid to the movement by speaking out on behalf of the colored people, or by taking membership in the Association, or joining the complainants in school suits, have been subjected to various kinds of annoyance. When their names appeared in the public press in connection with these activities, they were besieged day and night by telephone calls which were obscene, threatening, abusive, or merely silent interruptions to the peace and comfort of their homes. Letters and telegrams of like nature were also received. Some of these persons found themselves cut off by their friends and made unwelcome where they had formerly been received with kindness and respect. Two crosses were burned near the homes of two of them; an effigy was hung in the yard of a white plaintiff in a school case, and a hearse was sent to the home of the colored president of the Norfolk branch of the Association during his absence "to pick up his body."[2]

Many agencies were working against race discrimination in the South now. Among the mainly Negro organizations, in addition to the NAACP, the Congress on Racial Equality, or CORE, established in 1943, was increasingly militant and would soon be in the forefront of campaigns to end segregation in transportation facilities and places of public accommodation. The National Urban League, which had fought against discrimination in the United States since 1910, placed its major emphasis upon securing equal employment opportunities for Negroes. A dynamic fourth Negro organization, the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, had grown out of the bus boycott in Montgomery, Alabama; it was devoted to the philosophy of non-violent protest preached by its founder, the Rev. Martin Luther King.

Apart from the predominantly Negro groups, a score of organizations generally bi-racial, but in which white people -- many of them Southerners -- took a leading part, had offices in the region and were engaged in combatting race discrimination. These received their funds from membership dues and individual contributions, from churches and trade unions and above all from the philanthropy of national foundations. Only a small fraction of their financial support came directly from the South.

Otherwise the Southern Regional Council was, by name and charter, strictly Southern: its officers and the eighty members of its bi-racial board, as well as most of its full-time staff of about fifteen, were all from the eleven Southern and two border states. Affiliated with it also were seven bi-racial Councils on Human Relations in various Southern states.

A number of denominational religious organizations had departments, committees or societies devoted to work in this field. The National Conference of Christians and Jews strove for tolerance with respect to both religion and race. The Department of Racial and Cultural Relations of the National Council of Churches of Christ contributed to the cause in many ways and particularly in the rare ability and modest dedication of its chief Southern representative, the Rev. Will D. Campbell.

Two of the national organizations which concerned themselves most with the Southern problem were the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai Brith and the American Friends Service Committee. The Quakers had been known for their efforts on behalf of the Negro for a century and a half; in this crisis they labored systematically to ease tensions and prepare communities for the abandonment of segregation. The Anti-Defamation League, with offices in Richmond, Atlanta, Miami, New Orleans and Houston, engaged in much valuable research and campaigned unceasingly against racial injustice. The American Jewish Committee was also active.

Jewish organizations had a two-fold concern over the segregationist furor in the South. Anti-Semitism was officially disavowed by the Citizens' Councils, but it was preached by many racist individuals and publications. Mysterious dynamite explosions damaged Jewish community centers in Miami and Nashville in March 1958 and wrecked a Jewish temple in Atlanta the following October.

The number of these reformers was still tiny in comparison with the multitude of aggressive segregationists, but they crusaded openly, and they were subjected to criticism and harassment in varying degrees. Many were vilified or derided in segregationist publications; they had difficulty sometimes in obtaining office space; some were arrested on trumped-up charges and briefly imprisoned.

Apart from the active personnel of organizations committed to the fight, many men of moderate or liberal views in the South wrestled with the dilemma of whether to speak out and take the consequences or to compromise or remain silent in the hope of being able to exert a salutary influence in private or at some later stage of the crisis. Newspaper editors feared loss of circulation, politicians feared loss of votes, clergymen feared loss of communicants -- if they deviated from segregationist orthodoxy. And these were not entirely selfish considerations: readers, voters and hearers were needed if they were to retain any influence.

No group suffered more anguish than the white Christian ministers. Many felt when public school segregation was outlawed by the Supreme Court that a problem partaking so much of morals and conscience, and so rooted in the hearts of men, was logically one for the clergy, and that the pastors of churches should lead in preparing Southerners for the change. It seemed at the outset that the clergy might assume that responsibility. Two days after the appearance of the Brown decision on May 19, 1954, the General Board of the National Council of Churches of Christ in the United States of America hailed the Supreme Court's pronouncement as offering the "promise of further steps for translating into reality Christian and Democratic ideals." In June the Southern Baptist Convention recognized that the decision was "in harmony with the constitutional guarantee of equal freedom to all citizens, and with the Christian principles of equal justice and love for all men." The General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States (Southern) affirmed that "enforced segregation of the races is discrimination, which is out of harmony with Christian theology and ethics and that the church ... should lead rather than follow." [3] Episcopalians, Lutherans, Congregationalists -- virtually all major Protestant denominations -- at the administrative level, took similar positions.

The Roman Catholic hierarchy strongly supported the Brown decision, and steps were taken to accelerate the removal of racial barriers in the remaining all-white Catholic hospitals and parochial schools. Catholics are rare in most sections of the South, but the metropolitan area of New Orleans has one of the largest concentrations of Catholic communicants in the United States. The desegregation of the huge parochial system in that city would be delayed until 1962, but Archbishop Joseph F. Rummel began early to prepare his archdiocese, declaring in 1956 that "racial segregation is morally wrong and sinful." In November 1958 the Catholic Bishops of the United States expressed the earnest and prayerful hope "that responsible and sober-minded Americans of all religious faiths, in all areas of our land, will seize the mantle of leadership from the agitator and the racist...." [4]

Jewish leadership and all major Jewish organizations supported the Brown decision, some of them campaigning militantly for compliance with it.

But Southerners were not easily to be led in this matter, even by their spiritual leaders. The Charleston, South Carolina Presbytery, representing thirty Presbyterian churches in the area, withheld its financial support from the National Council of Churches and urged the Presbyterian General Assembly to withdraw from it. More or less similar action was taken by a number of Baptist, Methodist and Presbyterian Churches in the South. Some repudiated the stand taken by the national church bodies of their own denomination; many Baptist churches disassociated themselves from the pronouncement of the Southern Baptist Convention. The Mississippi legislature passed a law -- of questionable constitutionality -- to permit local congregations to withdraw from their parent bodies and retain church property. Striking out in other directions, a South Carolina Methodist Men's Club applauded the actions of Governor Faubus and Governor Almond "against the un-Christian and evil forces of the Supreme Court and the federal government...;"[5] and the Carolina Baptist Fellowship, an organization of ministers, took Evangelist Billy Graham to task for his pro-integration leanings.[6]

A number of ministers, though a tiny minority of the Southern clergy, joined the segregationist chorus. The Right Reverend Albert S. Thomas, retired Episcopal bishop of South Carolina, was among those defending segregation,[7] and Rev. James P. Dees, pastor of the Statesville Episcopal Church, headed North Carolina's principal segregationist organization.[8] Important meetings of Citizens' Councils and like groups were rarely without a clergyman to invoke God's blessing on their deliberations.

Some ministers championed segregation fervently and with apparent conviction. The obsolescent myth that God, through Noah, through Ham, through Canaan, had put a curse upon the Negro race -- so widely used to defend slavery in the South before the Civil War -- was brought out now and then; but the Tower of Babel story and a collection of New Testament passages were more popular -- did not St. Paul himself say that "God hath made of one blood all nations of all men... and determined... the bounds of their habitations." Other ministers used more mundane arguments, or merely decried the desegregation movement itself as being a source of contention and strife.

A very large group of clergymen in the late 1950's admitted privately that segregation was morally wrong, took that position freely in meetings of known moderates and joined fellow clergymen in public pronouncements condemning it -- yet avoided mention of the subject from their own pulpits. They contributed to the impressive lists of signers of ministerial pleas for sanity which came forth in Richmond, Atlanta, Dallas and other Southern cities. Apart from personal considerations, these ministers endured what the Rev. Robert Paul Sessions described as the "dreaded agony... of having to chose between protecting the organized church we love and proclaiming the universal gospel we believe." For, as this Arkansas pastor observed: "There are places in the South where a clergyman's forthright advocacy of even gradual integration might mean not only his own dismissal but the wholesale withdrawal of members from his church."[9]

At the same time the South abounded in examples of ministers who preached the gospel of interracial brotherhood with saintly, and often heroic, dedication; and of clergymen who labored openly in organized efforts to combat race prejudice. In the infinite variety of local situtions many such ministers were able to hold their congregations; but many others were forced to seek pastorates elsewhere -- generally outside of the South. A Methodist minister in Alabama, Presbyterian, Baptist and Episcopal ministers in Georgia, a Presbyterian minister in Mississippi, Baptist ministers in Arkansas and Virginia -- indicated disapproval of segregation and were forced out of their pastorates in well-publicized incidents. The approach to the subject in these instances generally had been mild: one pastor had opposed the circulation of segregationist literature at a laymen's meeting; another had written an article advocating a "creative contact between leaders of both races," and one had proposed a panel discussion of the segregation problem at a joint meeting of white and Negro ministerial associations. Other liberal clergymen aroused antagonism among their congregations that necessitated their "voluntary" resignation; many were separated from their pastorates as being "ineffective" or "doctrinally unsound," when the dissatisfactions arose from their failure to uphold racial segregation.

The persecution or the ouster of the pastor was often due to an aggressive element, not a majority, of the congregation. Writing in the New York Times Magazine of September 27, 1959, Ralph McGill Had sharp words for these rebellious laymen and their prompters:

...These all-out segregationists unhesitatingly put the separation of the races ahead of Christian teaching law or moral principle.

With an example before them of public officials' defiance of the courts on school integration, they find it easier to bomb churches and schools, to defy Christian teaching and church policies and to make life miserable, if not impossible, for any minister who seeks to follow his conscience, secular law and church policy. Publications by extremist states' rights groups and White Citizens Councils repeatedly urge that "weak-kneed preachers" be "whipped into line" by the withholding of contributions. They sneer at the clergy of all faiths, saying, "Money talks and they all listen."

In an address to a Southern Presbyterian Men's Convention, held in Miami in mid-October of 1957, Governor Collins of Florida unburdened himself in a manner rare for a Southern political leader of this period:

Last spring in our State Legislature a resolution was introduced in the heat of all this racial controversy. It was a resolution that struck at the very vital concept of law and government. It was anarchistic in its very nature. It defined all those things that we as patriots have tried to preach and practice over the years. I took the position that passage of that sort of legislation would stultify our state. I so hoped that some bar association, lawyers who knew better, in our state or somewhere, would say, "Don't do that!" But the mob was howling, so they washed their hands of it and they said, "See to it yourself."

Months back in one of our towns here in Florida we had a woman doctor, one of our public health doctors who served three towns. She needed to have a conference with the Negro nurse who worked under her supervision. All of her day was filled with appointments and she couldn't find the time for that conference, so, she asked the Negro nurse to meet her in the back of an eating place downtown where they could have a sandwich and discuss their work. And they did meet and they ate a sandwich together as they discussed professional matters.

The people heard about it and the mob gathered. Citizens went down to the county commissioners of the town and of the other two counties and cried, "Fire her! She has violated the traditions and customs of the Southland. Fire her!"

Where in that situation were our Presbyterians? Where were our Methodists? Our Episcopalians? Where were all of our churchmen? Where were all of our people who are dedicated to this proposition of All for Christ? Did they go before these county commissioners and say, "Don't! This is wrong!"?

> No, they called for the bowl, and they washed their hands, and they said, just as Pontius Pilate said, "The blood of this innocent, righteous person won't be on my hands. See to it yourself." And she was fired, to the everlasting shame of our citizens. 10

In politics we have already seen how largely hostility to the Brown decision dominated the business of government in the eleven Southern states. Here the obsession of respected leaders with evasion and chicanery was symptomatic of the general malaise. With a disingenuousness which became routine, innumerable plans were advanced for excluding Negroes from white schools "for reasons other than race." The sophistry that race segregatin was not in fact practiced -- to which even university presidents lent themselves -- was sometimes used to defend the status quo in federal court litigation.

In electoral contests the issue of race segregation was paramount; and the question generally was not whether a candidate was for or against segregation, but which candidate was most blatantly and uncompromisingly prepared to cling to segregation at all costs. The expression "niggering" was used in some sections of the Deep South to denote the kind of appeal to race prejudice which a lower order of politicians found effective in getting votes. At more respectable levels the execrations were focussed on the NAACP, the Supreme Court, "liberals and do-gooders" and, in 1957-1958, the federal troops at Little Rock. It might be said that the fiery, anti-integration fulminations which politicians felt were necessary must have been a reflection of voter sentiment. But that is not an entirely accurate assumption. Unquestionably a majority of white Southerners preferred segregation, how many were prepared to flout federal court orders, however, and go to reckless lengths to prevent the admission of any Negro to any white school nobody knew. What concerned the politician was the fact that it was the aggressive extremists who made the most noise -- and brought the most voters to the polls. The harassed moderate was likely to cast only his single, silent vote.

The diligence of segregationists in fostering race prejudice and stifling dissent oppressed Southern education from the grammar school to the university level.

The professor faced a dilemma similar to that of the clergyman. Many members of university and college faculties who abhorred the prevailing hysteria felt they could serve best by exercising caution and continuing in their jobs; but many others resigned, and some were dismissed. To teach history, sociology, political economy or law with fidelity both to truth and to the Citizens' Council syndrome was patently impossible. The Southern School News reported fifteen instances of white professors leaving Southern universities apparently because of their liberal views. These were only the most publicized cases; a large number with liberal views on the race question left the South without announcing their reason for doing so. It was not hard for professors to find employment in a freer atmosphere. Jim Hall, writing in the Montgomery Advertiser (of August 26, 1957) attributed "the loss of some thirty or more top-notch educators" from the faculty of the University of Alabama following the Autherine Lucy incident in part to "the letters and telegrams students and faculty get signed by the Ku Klux Klan and persons claiming membership in the White Citizens' Councils; the midnight threats and voices who identify themselves as members of the KKK; the numerous letters 'threatening' the school if it ever integrated" -- and "the many meetings the Klan held menacingly close to the University campus, at which University professors and students were denounced as 'pinko', 'red,' 'brainwashed,' and 'Communist.'"

Following the resignations in 1956 of Dr. Douglas S. Ward, acting dean, and Dr. B. J. Chandler, associate professor, of the school of education at the University of Virginia -- two who had openly advocated gradual desegregation of Virginia's public schools -- Colgate W. Darden, Jr., the university's president and a former governor of the state, said: "....If I were a non-Virginian, I don't think I'd want to come in here for the next ten or fifteen years. I don't blame these men." [11]

A number of professors were forced to leave when their liberal leanings on the segregation issue were revealed in an article written for publication in a magazine or in a lecture delivered at some distant place. Yet it is not to be inferred that many college presidents, or even trustees, willingly sacrificed liberal professors or yielded without a struggle to extremist pressure. In the Deep South, where most of the ousting occurred, some university officials fought stubbornly and with much diplomacy in unpublicized battles with politicians and leaders of segregationist groups to defend the intellectual integrity of their institutions. As a result, some valued professors were able to stay with their classes even though they persisted in voicing liberal convictions.

Liberal initiatives on the part of students met with cautious reprimand from university authorities and harsh reprisals off the campus. A minority, but in some colleges a very substantial number, did not share the segregationist craze, and some of them threw aside restraint. Raymond L. Morton, a 23-year-old English major, wrote in the Gamecock, the student newspaper at the University of South Carolina: "Speak we must, else the throat choke and burst with silent truths.... Unconsciously, we have been smothered and strangled with tradition, the so-called 'Southern' tradition, a backward-looking and odious attitude.... For several years I have been a page in the State Legislature.... Arrested by the decision of 'nine old men' on the United States Supreme Court, they are intent on circumventing...." (He was quickly fired from his job as a page in the state legislature.) 12

A frequent source of faculty and student resentment was the canceling by university authorities -- under extremist pressure -- the speaking engagements of lecturers when their disapproval of race segregation was discovered. The Rev. Albert Kershaw, a noted Episcopal divine from Ohio was invited to speak during "Religious Emphasis Week" of 1955 at the University of Mississippi. When it was learned that the clergyman, who won $32,000 in a television quiz program, had donated the sum to the NAACP, the invitation was withdrawn. The student newspaper, The Mississippian, reflecting a spirit of independence still present among the students of

"Ole Miss," protested: "...Students attend a university to increase their knowledge, gather information through freedom of speech and inquiry, and formulate their own opinions. How is this possible when they are coddled like children?..."[13] But in the state capital, the Jackson Daily News called the young editors to order, saying: "The Citizens' Council of Mississippi has asked that the invitation be withdrawn because it sincerely believes that any man who gives aid or comfort to the NAACP is an open enemy of the Southern way of life and is arrayed in opposition to the things we hold near and dear.... There is no escape from the logic of that reasoning."

The intimidation of administrators and teachers in white public schools was almost complete. A few teachers were dismissed or "not re-hired" at the end of the term; state law in some cases required the dismissal of any teacher advocating integration. A white-haired 64-year-old schoolteacher in Georgia was dismissed (although reinstated after an outcry over such treatment of a beloved figure) for allowing a white lad to ride home on a bus with Negro children after the bus carrying white children had left. After the dominant attitude hardened, it was rare indeed that any murmur against the prevailing trend was heard among white public school personnel. Most of these public servants, who could not well do without their generally modest teacher salaries, were careful to avoid any mention of the subject; though those who upheld race segregation, of course, were unmolested.

Intimidation of Negro educators focussed on preventing school personnel and college faculty members from joining the NAACP or participating in other pro-integration activities. A number of teachers were dismissed because of their refusal to sign statements inquiring as to NAACP membership. Some lost their jobs due to the fact that members of their families had signed petitions seeking admission to white schools.

Many school libraries were investigated and "purged" by governmental agencies and private organizations to see that children did not have access to "subversive" literature. Books expressing views liberal on the subject of race relations or critical of "the Southern way of life" -- even views generally accepted outside of the South -- were considered "subversive." The Georgia board of education rejected a textbook on sociology which had been recommended by its professional textbook committee because, according to the newspaper report, it taught "that the white people are unfair to the Negroes in elections, in school facilities and in recreation facilities." The banned book was Our Changing Social Order, by Ruth Wood Gavian, H. A. Gray and Ernest Groves.[13] The two houses of the South Carolina legislature adopted a concurrent resolution asking the State Library Board to take out of circulation "certain books, such as The Swimming Hole... that are inimical to the traditions and customs of our state." The Swimming Hole is an illustrated children's book which depicts white and colored boys swimming together. In supporting the resolution State Senator Gressette said such books "only confuse and warp the thinking of our young people." Asked if the resolution "wouldn't cover magazines and newspapers," Gressette replied: "As for myself I stopped subscribing to the Saturday Evening Post, Time, Life and other publications," favoring compliance with the Brown decision.[14] Time, Life and Look were banned from high school libraries in several Louisiana parishes. A New Orleans Citizens' Council warned parents that a history textbook was being prepared for use in the eighth grades, in which "Booker T. Washington and George Washington Carver are hailed as heroes and saviors of the South, but evidently the author could find no whites worthy of mentioning." The school board announced that the book (The United States -- Story of a Free People, by Samuel Steinburg) would not be considered.[15] Even in Virginia, the South's northernmost state, pressure was exerted on school authorities to keep library offerings "pure." On March 14, 1958, the Staunton River District, comprising the PTA's of five Virginia counties, adopted what the segregationist magazine The Virginian termed "a set of constructive resolutions which should serve as a model to similar groups throughout the nation." The resolutions exhorted parents to:

> (2) Read carefully all textbooks being taught in high school and grades for any instances of author depreciation of Southern heritage or its past and present leaders;...
> .....
> (6) Search into the background, aims and goals of all youth or young people's movements and organizations, directly or indirectly associated with education, which attempt to destroy Southern social customs.

Under Citizens' Council pressure, the state board of education of Mississippi in October 1959 withdrew from circulation a film on tolerance, which had been used by the audio-visual division for six years. The film entitled "The High Wall," was one made by the Anti-Defamation League and had been donated by the state B'nai B'rith. The latter's president, Robert Besser, commented... "No one found anything objectionable in the film when we presented it to the state six years ago, but, of course, that was before the Citizens' Councils were organized." 16

Among the commercial television stations many national programs dealing with segregation and the race problem were withheld from Southern viewers.

The Citizens' Councils, the official organ of the Citizens' Councils of America prepared "A Manual for Southerners," which was published serially during 1957 in that publication. This instruction was addressed to school children; installments were introduced with an editorial note such as: "The portion appearing in this issue is for use in grades 3 and 4. However, there are many adults who might benefit from a review of these fundamental truths." -- or: "The purpose of this series is to impart to our children (and some adults too) a true understanding of their origins and the reasons for our bi-racial society."

After several installments of the series, The Citizens' Council said in its May 1957 issue:

> Public reaction to "A Manual for Southerners" has been both keen and widespread, indicating great concern with this long-neglected field of education.
>
> If you want your local Citizens' Council to undertake a project that will get some real results, why not suggest that copies of your official paper containing sections of "A Manual for Southerners" be requested from this office for distribution, with permission of the teachers of course, to elementary school pupils in your community?
>
> Some Councils have since last fall made it a project to mail copies of The Citizens' Council to the high school seniors in their counties during their senior year.
> Several teachers are requesting bundles of The Citizens' Council for classroom discussion as monthly current events assignments.

The authors of the "Manual" had difficulty in stretching a limited number of "truths" over so lengthy a series and the little nuggets of racist doctrine, which appeared about twenty-five to an issue, were endlessly redundant. A few selected paragraphs, which give the gist of this indoctrination, are quoted below. They are of interest as indicating in simple language the thinking of many thousands of white Southerners and the kind of instruction imparted -- more at home than at school -- to their children.

> God put the white people off by themselves. He put the yellow, red, and black people by themselves. God wanted the white people to live alone. And He wanted the colored people to live alone. That is why He put them off by themselves.
>
>
> God made so many different things. He must like for things to be different. And we must keep things as God made them. Races of men are different colors. Some people do not think God made men different. But we know God did make men different.
>
>
> You do not go to the same schools. You do not swim in the same swimming pools. Negroes use their own bathrooms. They do not use the white people's bathroom. The two races do not sit together on the city bus. If you are white, you go to a white man's show. A Negro goes to his own show. We do not live side by side. The Negro has his own part of town to live in. This is the Southern Way of Life. This is the way Negroes and whites can live in the same land. We do not live together.
>
>
> "Why do some people want us to live together?" you will ask? They want to make our country weak. If we are not happy, our strong and free country will grow weak. Did you know our country will grow weak if we mix our races? It will.
>
> .....
> One thing that made the Americans so mad at England was her terrible idea of slaves. English merchants wanted to make money. They bought Negro slaves from Negro masters in Africa and brought them to America to sell them. The Americans said, "We do not want black men in our country. They will not be happy among white people, and we will not be happy among them." But King George wanted his merchants to make money. So the Americans were made to buy the Negro slaves.

.....

Many white parents saw that Ike's government is going to force the races to mix in Washington. So these parents took their unhappy children and moved out of Washington, D.C. And Negroes are moving to our nation's capital by the thousands. Before the races were mixed, Washington schools had many more white students. Now that the races are mixed, our capital's schools are mostly black. Do you blame the white people for moving away from a city where they were forced to go to school with Negroes?

.....

But the Race-Mixers are forcing us to mix our races in America. Most of the people don't want to mix the races. So you see, the Race-Mixers are like the Communists. They are a few men who want to make the rest of our people be slave to them and do as they say. These people are trying to change our way of life. They know we will be unhappy if we change. Then our country will not be strong.

.....

Some of you have been told that you are not a Christian if you don't want to mix with another race. This is not true, either. The Bible teaches you to keep the races pure. In Acts 17:26 you can read God's plan about the races. It says that God segregated (separated) the races by putting them in different parts of the world.

.....

The first civilized nation in the world that we knew about was Egypt. The Egyptian people of that time were pure white people. So you see that the white people built the first civilization on earth. These Egyptian white people were careful to build a strong nation they could be proud of. Even today we are surprised at some of the wonderful things they did.

But about the time the Egyptians had built a wonderful country, they brought Negro slaves among them. It was not long before the Race-Mixers of those days began saying the slaves should be set free among the white Egyptians. And finally the Egyptians set the Negro free, cleaned him up, and taught him in their schools.

Now you can already guess what happened to the Egyptian nation. Since the races were mixed, the people began marrying one another. Then the Egyptian race was no longer pure, and their nation was no longer strong. A mixed race is weak and all confused, and this makes the country weak, as we have already learned.

Let's look at another very great civilization in the early world. This civilization grew in India. But the people were white people just as you and I are. They were not the Indians you see in India today. They were called Hindus.

The Hindus built a very beautiful, high civilization and a strong nation. They kept themselves segregated from the negroid natives who lived around them. But just as always, the Race-Mixers got busy and said the negroid natives ought to be free among the white Hindus. So finally the white Hindus let the natives go free among them, cleaned them up, and educated them in their white schools.

You can surely guess by now what happened to the High civilization of the white Hindu. He began to marry the cleaned and educated native, and so his race was mixed. What happens to a race when it mixes with another race? Well, the Hindu race became weak, and the nation was no longer strong and beautiful.

If this is not enough to show that Race-Mixing is not good for us, let's look at still another great white nation that fell because it mixed its people. This civilization was Greece. Again the white man built a civilization that could not be beaten. Again the Race-Mixers got busy. And again the white people set the slaves free among them, cleaned them up, and educated them in their schools.

You understand now why the races should not mix and why we Southerners want to keep our own Way of Life. And you must learn your lessons well so that you can help keep your race and nation pure. As long as we are pure, we can keep a strong nation which we can be proud of. We can enjoy the nation George Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and many other Southerners helped to build for us to live in. We do not want the Race-Mixers and Communists to take our country from us.

Not only was the South separated in many ways from the mainstream of national life and thought, but there was in varying degrees in Southern states an atmosphere of actual alienation from the rest of the country, particularly as it was represented in "the government in Washington." A non-Southerner sojourning in Mississippi or Alabama often felt as if he were in a foreign land. The federal government, under both Republican and Democratic administrations, was referred to by many Southern politicians as if it were a foreign power. Perhaps it would be closer to the precise concept to say that segregationist agitators pictured the South as still a component of the American Union, but standing firm alone against a nefarious and largely foreign conspiracy which had seized control of the nation. Many actually believed the frequent assertions "that the enemy has taken over completely in Washington, D.C. -- and that we are right now living under the Communist Revolutionary Government."17

In 1959 The Citizens' Council undertook to identify the composite "enemy" of the South. Under the heading "HERE IS THE ENEMY," in its August issue, it listed seventy-four national organizations and agencies, public and private; in its November issue, under the heading: "HERE IS THE ENEMY -- PART II," it listed thirty-three. The first was described as "the official list of organizations appearing in House and Senate committee records as favoring 'civil rights' and anti-South force legislation during 1957 and 1959." The organizatinns in the second list were said to have been "the source of the 'civil rights' planks in both the Democratic and Republican platforms." Allowing for some repetition, the aggregate comprised nearly one hundred national groups. Organizations primarily concerned with civil rights were cited of course, but the list as a whole was a startling revelation of how largely the Citizens' Councils had assumed an attitude of belligerancy toward the government and people of the United States.

Blacklisted were twenty-seven national Protestant, Catholic and Jewish church and religious organizations. The National Council of Churches was included, "The Methodist Church" was listed as such.

Thirteen labor unions were listed; also the National Newspaper Publishers Association, and the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks!

The Government of the United States was represented in the camp of the "enemy" by the following:

Commission on Civil Rights

Department of the Air Force

Department of Health, Education and Welfare

Department of Justice

Department of Labor

Department of the Treasury

General Services Administration

Housing and Home Finance Agency

Interstate Commerce Commission

President's Committee on Government Contracts

(The enemy status of the Supreme Court and the federal judiciary was apparently taken for granted.)

Rifts in the Clouds

Nineteen fifty-nine, the fifth year after the Brown decision, marked a faintly discernible turning point in Southern resistance. In Virginia, which had been a conspicuous bellwether, the attitude of both government and public underwent a dramatic change: from this year onward the state which had led the parade of defiance was to set an example to the rest of the South of quiet but progressive -- though still only token -- compliance with the Supreme Court ruling. Little Rock, with relatively minor disorder, resigned itself to the admission of Negroes to two white high schools, and the walls of public school segregation were breached in another Southern state, Florida. More convulsions and one virtual insurrection were still to come in the Deep South; but the nerving image of a solid seven-state front with Virginia in the vanguard was shattered, and the ultimate futility of resistance was brought home to an ever-increasing number of thoughtful Southerners.

The intolerable situation which the closing of public schools precipitated led to vigorous and steadily growing movements of protest both in Little Rock and in Virginia. The movement in the former was spearheaded by a Women's Emergency Committee to Open ~~Public~~ Our Schools, and that in Virginia by the Committees for Public Schools which grew out of the Arlington County initiative. These organizations, composed of white citizens, favored compliance with federal court orders in preference to closed schools, but their membership range was greatly broadened by their insistence upon standing "neither for integration nor for segregation, but for education." As time went by they were joined in the fight by many individuals and groups.

Public pressure and court action converged to bring the climax first in Virginia and saw the collapse of that state's famous program of massive resistance. Committees for Public Schools were formed in Charlottesville, Norfolk and Warren; the Charlottesville Committee quickly reached a membership of one thousand and that in Norfolk enrolled 6,500. Then alarmed citizens elsewhere in the state rallied to the movement and early in December a Virginia Committee for Public Schools was set up with an office and staff in Richmond. Dr. J. L. Blair Buck -- a former official of the state department of education, who had retired in 1956 with a sharp denunciation of massive resistance -- was appointed coordinator of the statewide organization. Groups of clergymen in the affected districts protested early, as did two liberal statewide organizations, the Virginia branches of the American Association of University Women and the League of Women Voters. The white Parent-Teacher Associations, with their mass membership, approached the issue, which so directly concerned them, with temerity and mixed sentiments. Some of their most articulate leaders approved of the school-closing escape from racial integration; moreover, Virginia P-TA's are traditionally loyal to state policy and rarely express themselves on controversial matters other than those of their own school districts. Nevertheless, when the P-TA's met in their annual convention October 20, they listened to a fiery clarion call to massive resistance from the governor, then rejected a resolution in support of that policy and adopted one urging local option -- albeit with close votes in each case. When white schoolteachers met ten days later in the convention of the Virginia Education Association they adopted by overwhelming votes vote a resolution expressing "grave concern" and calling for continued operation of the public schools.

The moderates were coming out from under ground, and no group was in a better position to sense the fact than the Virginia press. Somewhat abruptly and in seeming concert during October and early November most of the state's leading newspapers turned against the massive resistance program. The Lynchburg News and the Lynchburg Advance became aggressively critical; the Roanoke Times and the Roanoke World News declared the time had come for a change; the Norfolk afternoon Ledger-Dispatch, which, unlike its morning contemporary, had supported massive resistance, and the Charlottesville Daily Progress joined the procession. On November 11 the editor of the Richmond News Leader, which had beaten the drums of massive resistance more loudly than any other major newspaper, sounded a call to retreat. In an address to the Richmond Rotary Club, Jack Kilpatrick said: "I believe that new laws must be devised -- speedily devised -- if educational opportunities are to be preserved and social calamity is to be averted." The Richmond Times-Dispatch and the News Leader followed through editorially the next day in the same tenor. To excited reporters who hastened to the Governor's office for comment, Almond said: "I am going to stay with the statutes of Virginia as long as they are vital." But the usual denial of any mitigation of massive resistance was not forthcoming.

Not all of the agitation was on one side; a large element that feverish autumn still supported the school-closing program. In Norfolk the issue was disputed with particular acrimony. Countering the propaganda of the Committee for Public schools, the racist Defenders of State Sovereignty, in the words of the Ledger Dispatch, were "saturating Norfolk residents with a barrage of home-delivered literature." The mayor and city council of Norfolk were staunch massive resisters. In November these city fathers decided to submit the school question to popular vote. The proposition presented to the voters was not an attractive one: it warned that if the closed schools were reopened with Negroes enrolled, state financial support would be forfeited and all school patrons in the city would have to pay "substantial tuition." Only some 22,000 of the city's 300,000 inhabitants went to the polls. Nevertheless the results were arresting; approximately sixty per cent of the votes were cast against reopening the schools.

One powerful element of the body politic in Southern states, the financiers and corporation executives, strove anxiously to avoid the nettle of desegregation controversy; but they followed it privately with no little interest, and events in Virginia aroused grave concern in this quarter. Whatever the personal preferences of Virginia business men in the matter of interracial association, massive resistance from an economic point of view was proving the rankest folly. The state was paying $172,000 a month in pay for idle teachers and other costs of closed schools in Norfolk for instance, and talk of a more extensive abandonment of public education raised acutely disturbing questions relative to school properties and several hundred million dollars of school bonds. Meanwhile the confusion and uncertainty were frightening new industry away from Virginia, while North Carolina, with all schools in normal operation, was enjoying an unprecedented industrial boom. Early in December twenty-nine of the state's most influential business leaders gathered at a quietly pre-arranged dinner conference in Richmond with the governor, the lieutenant governor and the state attorney general; Almond was still noncommital, but their firm protest moved the governor on toward the inevitable policy change.

Actually, a step taken earlier by his administration suggested that Almond may have foreseen the failure of massive resistance from the beginning of school-closing. In the excitement of early September, this move attracted little attention. State Attorney General A. S. Harrison, the governor's closest adviser, filed a suit requesting the State Supreme Court of Appeals to require State Comptroller Sidney C. Day, Jr., to issue warrants for payment of tuition grants. The attorney general explained that "the proceeding will test the validity of what is commonly known as the 'school-closing law' and the 'fund cut-off law,' for under both of these enactments tuition payments... are envisioned." The dubious legislation was thus placed at the mercy of the state court. When the time came, it would be easier to abandon massive resistance on a signal from Virginia's own highest tribunal than in obedience to federal court orders! Samuel H. Williams, president of the Virginia Bar Council, was appointed to represent the comptroller and to marshal arguments against the legislation in question.

Six weeks later federal legal action was also set in motion. After a petition had been filed and withdrawn by the attorneys for the seventeen Negro pupils in Norfolk, a group of white citizens, prompted and financed by the Norfolk Committee for Public Schools, filed suit in federal court declaring that closing certain Norfolk schools while permitting other schools in the state to remain open constituted a denial of "equal protection of the laws." It is interesting to note that in the two litigations which would be fatal for Virginia's stand against the mingling of Negroes with whites in public schools neither the NAACP nor any Negro had a direct part.

The two crucial suits moved along through the briefs and hearings of litigation more or less simultaneously. Meanwhile a desegregation move in another city and a further school-closing initiative in Norfolk engaged the attention of federal courts. NAACP attorneys had filed suit on September 5, seeking the admission of fourteen Negro pupils to five white schools in the city of Alexandria. In a hearing in January Judge Albert V. Bryan directed the Alexandria school board to go ahead and act on the Negro applications without discrimination. In Norfolk on January 13 the jaundiced city council voted to withhold funds for the operation of any public school grades above the sixth.

This move would have added nearly two thousand to the ten thousand displaced white pupils, but the unconcealed object was to bar five thousand Negro children also from public schools. "Seventeen Negro children," Mayor W. Fred Duckworth said, "are keeping ten thousand white children out of school!" On a petition filed by the Norfolk Committee for public schools on behalf of both the whites and the Negroes affected Federal District Judge Walter E. Hoffman quickly put an end to this proceeding.

The state and federal courts weighing the school-closing legislation delivered their opinions both on the same day, January 19. (It is of casual historic interest that this crucial day in a maneuver of state resistance to national authority was the birthday of the great Confederate hero General Robert E. Lee.) Rumors had circulated for several weeks that January 19 would be the day, and public suspense was at its peak.

The Supreme Court of Appeals delivered its judgment at 10:30 A.M.: the petition was denied -- the massive resistance legislation was invalidated! School-closing, cutting off funds from integrated schools and tuition grants as a part of the plan were all declared unconstitutional by the state's own supreme court. Virginia was depicted by a Washington Evening Star cartoonist as exclaiming: "Et tu, Brute!"

The state court, having concluded that "certain provisions of the acts... violate the Constitution of Virginia," found it unnecessary to "consider the questions whether these acts likewise violate the provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment to the federal Constitution as interpreted by the recent decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States...." It took occasion to "deplore the lack of judicial restraint evinced by that court in trespassing on the sovereign rights of this commonwealth" and observed: "It was an understandable effort to diminish the evils explicit from the decision in the Brown case that prompted the enactment of the statutes now under review." But it held that the requirement of the Virginia Constitution for the state to "maintain an efficient system of free public schools throughout the state" meant "that the state must support such free public schools in the state as are necessary to an efficient system, including those in which the pupils of both races are compelled to be enrolled and taught together, however unfortunate that situation may be."

Later the same day the three-judge federal district court in Norfolk listed the school-closing statutes and the governor's Norfolk school-closing order and declared them all "in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States and therefore void."

It remained for Governor Almond to face the state legislature and tell it that the massive resistance posture could no longer be maintained. But first he made one unfortunate further gesture of belligerency -- a mistake from every point of view. In a fiery radio-television speech on the evening of January 20 he thundered: ".... To those who would... embrace a new moral code declared by nine men in Washington...; to those who would substitute strife, bitterness, turmoil and chaos for the tranquility and happiness of an ordered society;... -- to all of these and their confederates, comrades and allies, let me make it abundantly clear for the record now and hereafter, as governor of this state, I will not yield to that which I know to be wrong...."

What caused the unhappy governor to make such a speech at this juncture is a question for psychologists. Almond himself said apologetically a year later it was the fact that "I was tired -- harassed and under strain...." To the many who were hoping to hear that the war was over the broadcast was a heart-breaking disappointment; those who wanted to keep up the fight were crudely unprepared for the coming disillusionment. In the opinion of the Richmond News Leader the speech "removed any doubt that his administration might shift from the massive resistance stand." Relations between Almond and Senator Byrd had cooled during the winter as Almond appeared to be faltering in his determination to resist; the two were soon to become completely estranged. But the day after the broadcast Byrd paid his one last compliment: "The notable speech of Governor Almond last night will further stiffen the resistance."

Nevertheless -- having added immensely to the difficulty and embarrassment of his task -- Almond's performance when the General Assembly met in special session January 28 was a masterpiece of extrication from an impossible situation. The drama was enhanced by the suspense with which the legislators -- many of them eager to fight on -- waited upon his words. It was not yet known which way the governor would turn. But all doubt was removed when he read slowly and clearly from his written text.

> It is not enough for gentlemen to cry unto you and me: "Don't give up the ship!" "Stop them!" "It must not happen." or "It can be prevented." If any of them knows the way through the dark maze of judicial aberration and constitutional exploitation, I call upon them to shed the light for which Virginia stands in dire need in this her dark and agonizing hour. No fair-minded person would be so unreasonable as to seek to hold me responsible for failure to exercise powers which the state is powerless to bestow.

A majority of the two chambers welcomed the governor's decision to retreat. His recommendations for immediate action, which were adopted with near unanimity, appealed to both sides: repeal of the compulsory school attendance law, a law making bombing threats a felony and a tuition grant plan independent of school appropriations, which would start payments flowing at last; but a spate of proposals from die-hards to halt school desegregation were easily beaten down. Almond expressed his intention to appoint a commission to study a new approach to the school problem and asked the General Assembly to recess until that commission should be ready to report.

Though this business was attended to before the weekend, nervous legislators insisted upon staying in session through Monday, February 1 -- just in case. The first public school integration was scheduled to take place on that day and many expected "violence and bloodshed." Four Negro children were to be admitted to Stratford Junior High School in Arlington, where no schools had been closed, and the six closed high schools in Norfolk were to be reopened with seventeen Negroes in attendance. The event proved anti-climactic. Although elaborate police precautions were taken, no crowds gathered, and the Negro children entered school with their white classmates in both cities without interference or disorder. Massive resistance had come to an end. When eleven Negro children were admitted to schools with whites in Alexandria nine days later it attracted little attention.

In the Charlottesville and Warren County situations the denouement was delayed until the beginning of the next school term. In the former the school board had voted on January 26 to reopen the closed schools and desegregate them whenever required by the federal courts and a cooperative city council had endorsed the school board's action. Impressed by this spontaneous demonstration of good faith, Circuit Judge Simon E. Sobeloff permitted that city, while reopening the schools, to wait until September before inaugurating its desegregation plan. In Warren County the federal court was less considerate and a sensational "boycott" resulted. There nearly all of the displaced high school pupils were pursuing their courses in a respectable private school system, and the opposition of the white community to a change-over in mid-term was almost unanimous. When the Warren County High School was ordered reopened nevertheless, only the twenty-two Negro applicants enrolled. The white parents who refused to transfer their children to the school were hailed as heroes by segregationists far and wide; the legislature of Alabama applauded their "courageous action;" the Richmond Times-Dispatch found "Warren's stonewall refusal to surrender... a bright spot... in the gloomy annals of the five-year constitutional crisis." But four hundred white pupils were to return to Warren High School and the Negroes were to enter white schools in Charlottesville -- without incident -- in September.

A change in the atmosphere in Virginia was already apparent as spring came in. A widespread feeling of relief was suggested by the results of a newspaper poll conducted after Almond's address to the legislature: two out of three expressed approval of his new stand. The Virginia Committee for Public Schools now boasted a membership of over 22,000 and its advice and aid were sought by many politicians. People who had felt massive resistance a mistake were no longer afraid to say so; many also felt that a great load had been lifted and were glad to turn their thoughts to other things.

But there was to be one more struggle over the issue in the General Assembly. When that body recessed on February 1, the members of the Old Guard of massive resistance, the hard core of the Byrd machine, left the chambers with lamentations -- "There's a sickness in my heart," one said. But they came back when the legislature reconvened March 31 determined to act the drama out to the end; if massive resistance could not be resuscitated, they would at least die with their boots on. The result was a tumultuous and inconclusive session. One bastion of massive resistance was still intact -- the State Pupil Placement Board -- responsible for the assignment of all pupils in the state to their public schools. In practice this duty had been discharged by merely stamping thousands of assignment forms submitted by local school authorities with a sharp eye to see that no Negro by any possible chance was placed in a white school. The board had never assigned a Negro to a white school, and, of its own volition, it never would. To frustrate this reliable device with local option was viewed by the die-hards as a horrendous proposal, and here the battered massive resistance bloc rallied for its last stand. In the minds of some it was another last stand for an embattled South. At one point in the debate two massive resisters -- one of them, State Senator Harry Byrd, Jr. -- displayed a large painting of Robert E. Lee! The fight ended in a draw.

Local option had been one of the recommendations of the forty-member study commission set up by Governor Almond, called the "Perrow commission," after its chairman, State Senator Mosby

G. Perrow, Jr. The other recommendations, a more elaborate tuition grant plan and further aids to private schools, were readily adopted. All these together were proclaimed as the "Freedom of Choice Plan." (Any pupil who objected to attending his public school would be free to choose a private school and receive a sum of money toward his expenses.) The local option proposal was mild in the first place: a cumbersome procedure to enable localities to withdraw from the jurisdiction of the Pupil Placement Board. Yet this passed the senate only by a vote of twenty to nineteen, and the opposition was successful in securing a postponement of the date for its coming into effect to March 1, 1960 -- in the hope that the provision might be repealed in the meantime.

But none of this mattered very much. As months went by, the action of federal courts and the march of events would leave any resistance mechanism by the wayside. Members of the Pupil Placement Board told a federal court in Norfolk in September that they could not conceive of a situation in which they would assign a Negro to a white school; Judge Hoffman angrily ordered them to do so forthwith. Three months later he issued an order relieving the Norfolk school board of any responsibility for dealing with the Pupil Placement Board. When the latter's segregation watchdogs finally gave up and resigned, Governor Almond reconstituted the board with three members who proceeded voluntarily to assign a few Negroes to white schools. From then on the Pupil Placement Board performed only a limited regulatory function in a slow process of public school desegregation.

Freedom of choice was epitomized -- and, hopefully, constitutional objections were circumvented -- by the tuition grant plan as it emerged from the April session. "Scholarships," or tuition grants, roughly equal to per pupil public school costs, were made available to all pupils who chose to attend qualified nonsectarian schools, anywhere, in preference to the public schools of their districts. Many private school pupils collected the grants even when the public schools which they could have attended were completely segregated. Some actually used the money to attend bi-racial schools. In 1962, 8,518 Virginia children were receiving "scholarships" at a total annual cost -- divided between the state and the localities -- of $2,074,690. In some situations the program tended to syphon off from integrated public schools, ~~modify~~ and mollify hostile elements; but it became more and more expensive and less and less related to the segregation problem -- and increasingly unpopular -- as the years went by.

Senator Byrd said in September 1959 -- when his famous policy was in process of relentless liquidation: "I stand now as I stood when I first urged massive resistance...." He continued to stand there year after year. But in the mystic governance of the Byrd machine the chief's attitude in this particular was no longer one which his followers were required, or expected, to emulate. Massive resistance disappeared from newspaper headlines and from political debate. The very words, "massive resistance" dropped out of common parlance except as critics of that weird program recalled it with ridicule. The admission of Negroes to an additional white school somewhere in the state scarcely made front-page news any more. Local enactments brought compulsory school attendance back in fifty-seven districts. Minuscule though the figures were in comparison with Virginia's total school enrollment, the number of Negroes in previously all-white public schools more than doubled each year. Beginning with 51 admitted during the 1958-1959 school term, the number grew throughout the state as follows: 1959-1960, 103; 1960-1961, 208; 1961-1962, 533; 1962-1963, 1,230; and 1963-1964, .

Nevertheless, in one small Virginia county a long-inflamed boil of hostility burst in 1959 and festered on for four tragic and scandalous years.

In the summer of 1959 Prince Edward County abandoned public education completely. In many ways the Prince Edward saga is separate from, and out of time, with the larger Virginia story. During the first two years after the 1954 Supreme Court decision the believed imminence of school integration in that county contributed to the widespread hysteria, and the action of the Prince Edward governing board in holding up public school funds in 1955 was loudly applauded by Virginia extremists. But that county's schools continued in full operation throughout the massive resistance period and the public school system in the state as a whole was returning to normal when Prince Edward took this melancholy plunge.

In 1959 the school controversy in some form in Prince Edward County was ten years old, and that county had been involved in federal court litigation since 1951. By the time the Supreme Court decision was handed down, a new Negro high school -- the earlier Negro desideratum -- had been erected, at a cost of over $800,000; by 1959, all of the plaintiffs in the desegregation suit had graduated long since or left school. Prince Edward, it will be remembered, was one of the five original Brown cases; the other Southern case was that of Clarendon County, South Carolina. Both of these counties lay in the heart of the rural Black Belt. In any schedule of selective gradualism they would have been among the last places in the South in which to expect adjustment to the anti-segregation ruling.

The private school organization which was formed when the Prince Edward board of supervisors balked at appropriating public school funds in 1955 had remained intact, holding its collections of some $12,000 in cash and $200,000 in pledges -- and the county's resolution to operate no racially mixed schools had, if anything, hardened further -- while the case went back and forth between the district court and the court of appeals. District Court Judge Sterling Hutcheson implemented the Supreme Court ruling with orders to end public school segregation; but -- a native of a neighboring Black Belt county which has a more heavily Negro population than Prince Edward, and deeply conscious of the difficulties of the situation -- was inclined to allow much time before the change needed to be effected. Finally, in May 1959, the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals directed that the district judge order the Prince Edward school board "to take immediate steps ...to permit the entrance of qualified persons into the white schools in the term beginning September 1959."

Without waiting for the district court orders (for which the Negroes did not press and which were not issued until nearly a year later) the county leaders took out their private school system blueprint and launched upon this long-contemplated program of evasion. The board of supervisors cut off funds for public school operation and reduced the county tax rate by 53 per cent. Public education in Prince Edward came to an end.

For nearly all of the county's Negro children it was the end of schooling of any kind. For the white children, the Prince Edward Educational Foundation in September opened two private high schools and six private grade schools in a score of miscellaneous buildings scattered over the county -- stores, churches, Sunday school rooms, private homes, et cetera -- with a motion picture theater for assemblies. Employing sixty-six teachers, most of them from the closed public schools, they accommodated 1,475 of a former white public school enrollment of 1,562. "No trespassing" signs were tacked up on the walls and grounds of the twenty public schools. Upwards of 200 Negro children were sent to schools outside of the county, and crude "training centers" were operated spasmodically by the Negro community for some of those who remained. Public education, or the default of public education would follow substantially that pattern for the next four years.

Anxious to avoid a court challenge, the county shied away from the tuition grants during the 1959-1960 school term; but before the next term began, it went to the aid of the financially hard-pressed private schools not only with tuition grants, but with provision for tax credits up to 25 per cent of tax obligations for amounts contributed to the private school fund (bringing $56,000 into the organization's coffers). However, in view of the fact that public schools were closed and the purpose was the perpetuation of segregated schooling, both of these devices were knocked down by the federal court before the 1961-1962 school term. In the meantime the Prince Edward Educational Foundation erected an attractive little private high school building -- at a cost of some $200,000, plus donations in kind -- which increased the vested interest and tended to give a permanent character to the private school venture.

The population of Prince Edward County, where the economy is largely rural, with a high percentage of homeowners even among the Negroes, was not very mobile. It had increased 3.2 per cent from 1940 to 1950. But the 1960 census showed a decline in the population since 1950 from 15,398 to 14,120. Nearly all of the loss was in the non-white population, which fell from 6,860 to 5,631; the non-white proportion of the total fell from 44.6 to 39.9 per cent. In November 1961 the Prince Edward school board reported to the federal district court the results of a school census which showed that the number of school-age children residing in the county had declined by 449 since 1955, leaving 1,455 whites and 1,573 Negroes. Of these 1,224 whites were still in the private schools and 289 Negro children had been placed in schools scattered widely across the nation.

The Prince Edward County affair was the subject of a stream of news dispatches, of many articles and a few books. Many, including some foreign observers, wondered how an American county could be left entirely without public education. The Virginia Constitution required the state to maintain public schools, but as stipulated in detail, only on a meager scale; state courts found nothing there to compel either the state or the county to appropriate the necessary funds. The performance of the federal district courts, where Judge Hutcheson had been succeeded by Judge Oren R. Lewis, was cautious, dilatory and indecisive where prompt and forceful action was indicated. When in 1962 Judge Lewis finally came to the point of ordering the public schools reopened, he failed to fix a time limit for compliance. In the state house, Albertis Harrison, who had succeeded Almond as governor, was an apostle of "harmony," loath to throw the Prince Edward problem into the lap of the legislature and see the segregation issue raised in state politics again. And the problem was infinitely complicated, Responsibility for public school administration was vested in the local school board. Without new legislation, the state could not move in and operate Prince Edward County's schools. The only group which seemed to have a clearcut plan was the governing board of that county and the sponsors of its private school system; these were determined to stand fast to the end.

(Possible 1963 developments)

In Little Rock, the long crisis which began in 1957 came to an end in August 1959. The public high schools resumed operation with a token degree of racial integration, with relatively minor disorder. The extremist groups, though reduced in number continued to be voluble and virulent for many months; fanatics and hoodlums expressed their resentment in bombings and harassment of "integrationists." The initial admission of Negroes to schools with whites was on a meager scale (only six Negro pupils) and the further progress of desegregation would be painfully slow. But public order and stability were restored; the gradual elimination of school segregation was accepted by most as inevitable; and Little Rock returned to the normal activities and concerns of an American city. In a few years' time much of the bitterness also faded and moderation rose in public esteem. Orval Faubus himself veered toward a course which alienated some of the extreme segregationist groups. When the governor ran for the Democratic nomination for a fifth term in 1962, the segregation issue was subordinated and he attributed his victory to the people's desire "not to wander in the thickets of extremism."

Unlike the Virginia cities, Little Rock bore with the private substitutes for public schools -- and the considerable education vacuum -- to the end of the 1958-1959 school year. The Arkansas Supreme Court ruled in April 1959 that the legislature's duty to "protect the safety and welfare of the people" overrode the constitutional requirement for maintaining public schools and upheld the state's school-closing law; and the federal court order invalidating that law and ordering the Little Rock school board to proceed with its integration plan came only in June. By that time a popular demand for return to the public high schools was unmistakable, and it had the resolute backing of the economic power structure of the city. This development was the more remarkable in view of the incessant opposition, not only of the segregationist organizations, but of Governor Faubus, who denounced every constructive initiative and vilified its proponents.

The Women's Emergency Committee to Reopen Our Schools, with its membership growing to some 1,200, marched in the front line of the crusade from beginning to end. It was joined by most of the Parent-Teacher Associations and later by a proliferation of newly-formed organizations, but most importantly by the Little Rock chamber of commerce. In the return of moderate elements to control of the city, the business community -- which so often has remained aloof from the school controversy in the South -- played an active and, in a sense, a decisive part. As Frank Cantrell, manager of the state chamber of commerce reminded a Rotary Club audience in October 1958, Little Rock's industrial program -- which had bright prospects before September 1957 -- had been brought "practically to a standstill." Home-building had declined 20 per cent; number of new residents coming to the city had dropped 30 per cent. Business men gave early support to the Women's Emergency Committee and some went to work individually in the cause. In January the newly elected president of the Little Rock chamber of commerce, E. Grainger Williams urged consideration of the "cost of public education and the cost of the lack of education," and the chamber began to move as a body. A mild resolution urging that a way be found to reopen the high schools and pointing to the need for better interracial communication brought a barrage of criticism and abuse, and a few members resigned. But the chamber proceeded to take a stronger stand. In March, it recommended reopening the high schools under a pupil placement plan, and declared: "The decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, however much we dislike it, is the declared law and is binding upon us...."

The private school undertaking in Little Rock proved entirely transitory. During the summer of 1959, even before the reopening of the public high schools was an accomplished fact, all of these improvisations passed out of existence. When it graduated 28 seniors on July 10, the Baptist High School announced that it would be converted into a permanent Christian academy if as many as 75 students enrolled on this basis; ten days later, when only 22 had registered and paid the $250 tuition fee, the plan was given up and the money returned. The vestry of Trinity Episcopal Cathedral announced July 20 that its Trinity Interim Academy would continue inactive and recommended that its pupils enroll in public schools. The announcement of the Little Rock Private School Corporation in August came as a general surprise; its T. J. Rainey High School, zealously aided by Governor Faubus and much publicized, was the largest and proudest exhibit of the private school proponents. Although in the midst of adding 28 classrooms to its building, and having enrolled 1,226 pupils, the corporation suddenly declared that it was insolvent and that the school would not operate during the ensuing year. Its president Dr. T. J. Rainey, ~~the corporation's president~~, for whom the school was named, broke the news. His statement noted that in one year of operation the school had received $297,540.10 in donations from people all over the world.

A survey made in the spring by Little Rock School Superintendent Terrell E. Powell showed what had happened to the 3,665 pupils who were locked out of the public high schools. Of the 2,915 white students, 643 were not in any school (though 405 of these were taking correspondence courses provided by the University of Arkansas); the remaining 2,272 were attending miscellaneous schools as follows: T. J. Rainey High School, 714; Baptist High School, 296; special high school classes at Conway Baptist College, 42; special high school classes in a Little Rock kindergarten, 38; Trinity Interim Academy, 30; schools outside Arkansas, 275; and public schools in 124 Arkansas districts, 877. Of the 750 Negro pupils, 376 were not in any school (though an estimated 35 of them were taking correspondence courses), 283 were attending other schools in Arkansas and 91 had been placed in schools outside the state. The total, white and Negro, who remained without any school was 1,019.

The focal point of the drama and the controversy, which raged without respite from school-closing in 1958 to school-opening in 1959, was the Little Rock school board. Fluctuations of public sentiment were registered in the reaction to the moves and pyrotechnics of this body and in the successive changes in its composition through elections, recall elections and appointments. Two months after the opening of the public high schools, the Mothers League of Central High School, angry at the school board's submission to federal court orders, launched a movement for the recall of five of its six members. The favored exception was the ultra-segregationist member Dale Alford, who was campaigning to unseat Representative Brooks Hays. Upon Alford's electinn to Congress, the other five members promptly resigned to give the voters an opportunity to elect an entirely new school board on December 6. Emerging victorious in that election were three moderates from a five-man "business men's slate" -- which Governor Faubus had denounced -- and three of the extremists put forward by the Citizens' Council and favored by the governor. One of the "business men's" candidates elected was Everett Tucker, Jr., chairman of the industrial committee of the chamber of commerce; Tucker, who was elected vice-president, and later president, of the board, was to be largely responsible for engineering the return of the high schools to normal operation.

Virgil T. Blossom was separated from the position of superintendent of schools, which he had held for the previous six years. Blossom had attracted national attention as early as 1955 by his promising plan for the integration of Little Rock schools; he had been in the center of the maelstrom of the past two years; and he was now the target of bitter segregationist criticism and abuse. Fred Graham, the assistant superintendent, and Bill Homstead, business manager of the school system, resigned -- Graham said, "to preserve my health, which has been impaired by the strain and tension of the past two years." Terrell E. Powell, principal of Hall High School, was promoted to succeed Blossom.

The new school board, evenly divided in two opposing factions, moved inevitably into confusion and stalemate. Amid rumors of a contemplated "purge" of moderate school personnel, an effort was made to break the tie by enlarging the board; a bill was introduced in the state legislature to authorize the governor to appoint three new members. Little Rock P-TA's now came vigorously into the fight and joined the Women's Emergency Committee in opposing this bill -- which was defeated.

Only highlights of the months of school board wrangling can be touched upon here, but a fateful crisis was reached May 5. After a deadlocked morning session on that day, the "business men" trio withdrew, assuming that they were leaving no quorum for further business. However, the pro-Faubus trio came back in the afternoon and, declaring that a quorum had been established in the morning, proceeded to indulge in an orgy of extravagant moves. They voted to replace Superintendent Powell with T. H. Alford, father of the Alford who had been elected to Congress, and to separate from their jobs forty-four high school administrators and teachers, who had been alleged to have "integrationist tendencies." (Though the schools were closed, the teachers and principals were still carried on the payroll.)

A law passed by the 1958 special session of the legislature provided for the recall of school board members by popular vote. Opposing groups petitioned for the recall of both factions, and an election was called for May 25. The ensuing campaign brought the issue squarely before the voters. It also put the influence of Faubus, who backed the extremist trio, to a crucial test. Joining the now militant P-TA's and the Women's Emergency Committee, 179 downtown business and civic leaders formed a "Committee to Stop This Outrageous Purge," which acquired the handier nickname, "STOP." On the other side the Citizens' Council, Mothers' League and States' Rights Council rallied in a "Committee to Retain Our Segregated Schools," or "CROSS." The victory of the moderates was decisive: the three Faubus-backed members were removed by a margin of approximately 2,000 votes in each case, and by a somewhat closer vote the three moderate members were retained. The total vote of 25,457 was nearly twice the number cast in the regular school election in December. Observers agreed that the Little Rock problem was not yet resolved, but the results of this election were widely hailed as a major setback for the advocates of reckless resistance; the Miami Herald said it "might well mark a turning point in the struggle over school segregation in the South."

Of the three Little Rock replacements appointed by the Pulaski County board of education in June, two were prepared to cooperate with the moderate incumbents. (It was disclosed that the third had a 1938 conviction for felony which disqualified him and this vacancy was not immediately filled.) Then a harmonious school board of five members promptly expunged from the record all of the actions of the May 5 three-member meeting and proceeded to plan for the reopening of the high schools in a manner acceptable to the federal court.

Alarming evidence of the damage being done to Little Rock's economic health increased the determination of business men to bring the school confusion to an end. In August the Women's Emergency Committee published a comprehensive survey which gave a dismal picture: real estate sales, sale and rental of homes, construction and other business indices had showed a marked decline in two years of turmoil. Though eight new plants with a total value of over three million dollars had opened during the first eight months of 1957, not a single new industry had come to Little Rock since.

On August 1, after a July registration, the school board announced the assignment of three Negroes each to Hall and Central High Schools. Three days later it suddenly announced that Little Rock high schools would open August 12, nearly a month earlier than usual, (The surprise move foiled any plans of Governor Faubus for calling a special session of the legislature.) When the day came, no difficulty was experienced at Hall High School, which opened quietly at 9:30 A.M., with the Negroes in attendance. Obstructionist attention was focussed on Central High School, which opened at 1 P.M. After a rally on the capitol steps and a speech by Governor Faubus, approximately two-hundred pro-segregation extremists marched toward the school, but they were stopped a block away from it and repulsed in a sharp 20-minute scuffle with city police. Two Negro children walked into the school, and no further violence occurred. Twenty-one members of the crowd were arrested, twelve of them teenagers.

In July Governor Faubus had declared that if Little Rock high schools were desegregated for the coming term, it would be done with federal force, "using live ammunition." In a broadcast the night before school-opening and in haranguing the crowd in the morning, he had continued his fulminations; though he said to the crowd on the capitol steps: "I see no reason for you to be beaten over the head today by the forces in the field, or to be jailed. That should be faced only as a last resort, and where there is much to be gained. Honestly, I do not think that should be faced today."

That night, after the schools had been reopened, speaking at a fish fry in the country near Little Rock, Faubus once more denounced the "integrationists, puppets and hypocrites" and made scathing reference to the school board president and the chief of police, Eugene G. Smith, as assistant chief of police, had led the forlorn attempt of the city police force to quell the riot of September 23, 1957; his firm and efficient performance as chief at Central High School on this reopening day won national applause. Faubus compared him to Janos Kadar, the Hungarian puppet of the Russians!

During the night of Labor Day 1959, the second anniversary of the appearance of National Guardsmen at Central High, three dynamite explosions were set off -- one in the driveway of the chief of the city fire department (whose firemen had aided the police on May 12 by spraying demonstrators), another in front of the building which housed the mayor's private office and a third at an office of the public school administration. The swift public indignation which followed completed the discrediting of Little Rock's pro-segregation extremists. The chamber of commerce promptly offered a $25,000 reward for arrest of the dynamiters. Within eleven days five suspects had been arrested; one had been tried, had pleaded guilty, and was starting a five-year prison term. The other four were eventually given three- or five-year prison sentences, though the sentence of one was suspended because of his "material assistance to the state." Testimony revealed that the dynamitings had been planned in a Ku Klux Klan meeting.

In terms of school districts desegregated the dent made in 1959 in the regime of public school segregation in the South was minute. In addition to the five instances in which race barriers were breached in Virginia, and the recovery in Little Rock, token integration was effected in four more North Carolina districts, High Point and Durham and Craven and Wayne Counties; sixteen children of Negro Air Force personnel were admitted with whites to a Rutherford County public school in Tennessee; and two public schools were integrated in Miami, Florida. But the breakdown of resistance in Virginia and Little Rock had a farreaching impact, and the admission of Negro children -- though only a handful -- to public schools with whites in Florida for the first time removed one more from the list of totally resisting states.

In Florida school authorities had not to contend with an obstructionist governor, nor with an official posture of massive resistance; local option was emphasized in that state. Nevertheless, the small beginning made in one district marked a signal turning point, and further ventures in that direction were encouraged by the tranquility and ease with which this hurdle was cleared. It is notable also that the step was taken voluntarily. NAACP attention had focussed on a protracted, and finally successful, suit to secure the admission of Negroes to the University of Florida; the first public school desegregation was filed only in June 1956, and in 1959 no suit had reached the point of definite federal district court orders.

The popular image of Florida as a fast-growing resort state, with a highly cosmopolitan population, led many to expect earlier compliance there with the broad Supreme Court command to end public school segregation. But native Floridians were steeped in Southern tradition and politically powerful, nor was race prejudice uncommon among the multitude which had more recently made Florida its home. The northern section, bordering on Georgia and Alabama -- and including the capital city of Tallahassee -- was in many respects a typical part of the Deep South. Clouding the picture further, an obsolete and fantastically inequitable system of apportionment, which still prevailed, enabled a handful of representatives from old and strongly prejudiced communities to dominate the state legislature.

That body, in a spirit of hostility and defiance, enacted a series of laws -- including a local option pupil assignment law -- designed to prevent desegregation, and set up an investigating committee which harassed the NAACP and other groups favoring compliance with the Supreme Court ruling (though the committee investigated also the Ku Klux Klan, and severe penalties were fixed for bombings). In the excitement following the Little Rock crisis of September 1957, the legislature authorized the closing of public schools in any district in which federal troops might be used to enforce racial integration. But the law-makers stopped short of any general school-closing legislation; Governor LeRoy Collins urged them "never, never, never to set up any plan or device by which our public schools can be closed."

Citizens' Councils flourished for several years in northern Florida and the Tampa area (aided, incidentally by John Kasper), but they failed to enlist a large membership or to take permanent hold. At least seven separate, and often feuding, Ku Klux Klan groups operated at times. The Association of Florida Ku Klux Klans disbanded, revived and disbanded again, W. T. Griffin, its "grand dragon" finally expressing disgust at "intimidations, parades, cross-burnings, mask-wearing and all other public exhibitions to confuse and frighten innocent people." Much "hate literature" was circulated and some of the newspapers were inflammatory in their hostility to the desegregation movement. A number of revolting instances of undercover violence were reported, and Negro efforts in areas other than public education resulted in some rioting in Tallahassee and Jacksonville. But Florida saw no spectacular disorder related to the admission of Negroes to schools with white children. In spite of wide dissemination of germs of racist fanaticism, the singular restraint which attended school desegregation when it came indicated that the bulk of the populace had escaped infection.

A nine-year fight by Virgil Hawkins, a 50-year-old Negro, to enter the University of Florida succeeded in 1958 in breaking the racial barrier for the first time in a state institution of higher learning -- though the long-persevering Hawkins himself failed at last to pass the entrance examinations. Another Negro, George H. Starke, Jr., who applied in 1958, was accepted as a law student. Starke was dropped in February 1960 because of academic deficiency, but yet another Negro was then in attendance, Miss Ester M. Langston -- a Phi Beta Kappa from Fisk University -- and more Negro students would follow. The admission of Starke to classes in 1958 was without disorder of any kind. When his low marks finally necessitated his withdrawal, he said: "The law school and its professors were eminently fair" -- and a professor said there had "never been as much as two minutes trouble because of him."

Governor Collins, who promised in 1954 to "use all the lawful power of the governor's office" to preserve public school segregation and who supported much of the "anti-integration" legislation, managed nonetheless to preach race tolerance and respect for the decision of the Supreme Court. After 1956 he discouraged any further legislation on the subject, and in 1958 he began to hint that "we must be prepared to accept some desegregation." In December of that year he invited public school officials from five counties to a private conference at the governor's mansion in Tallahassee to discuss the possibility of "limited integration." It was suggested that some token compliance with the desegregation ruling would strengthen the state's pupil assignment law against court attack. Collins complained afterward that "no school board was willing to proceed voluntarily with token integration," but Dade County (Miami) school officials who had attended the conference, said they were continuing to study the proposal.

The Dade school board did in fact proceed. It voted unanimously two months later to admit four Negroes come September to Orchard Villa, an elementary school previously for whites only. The four Negro children had completed all of the procedures required under the pupil assignment law, and they resided within two blocks of the school. It was one of the situations where rejection of the Negro applications would have been least defensible. At the same time it was embarrassing as a pilot operation in school desegregation: the neighborhood for several years had been steadily changing from white to Negro, and the trend would now be accelerated. By the summer it was estimated that fewer than seventy children would register for the 450-pupil school and how long any whites would remain was a matter of doubt. In the meantime, almost unnoticed by the public, another situation had developed where school integration was indicated. A new school had been built by the county near the Homestead Air Force Base, to serve the children of military personnel and other children within its district. The school board -- welcoming an opportunity to establish an integration exhibit where it would stick -- announced that the new school would open with both white and Negro children in attendance.

As in other cities approaching the first public school desegregation -- but involving perhaps a smaller faction of the public -- controversy and apprehension mounted in Miami. At Orchard Villa, where trouble was most feared, the teaching staff had been carefully selected and an ex-Marine, Erwin Marshall, had been chosen to provide a "strong man" as principal. Extra precautions were taken by the police when school opened in September. But the event was another anti-climax: there were no disturbances at either school. A Kasper henchman and a Ku Klux Klansman stood outside Orchard Villa and attempted to turn both white and Negro parents away, but without disorder -- and without success. However, only eight white children enrolled at Orchard Villa with the four Negroes! A few days later these were joined by three more white children, bringing the total enrollment at Orchard Villa to fifteen. At the Air Force Base school 741 white and 21 Negro children quietly enrolled.

In October 1959 the school board assigned 379 more Negro children to Orchard Villa; and in December the school, now with an all-Negro faculty was serving 468 Negro and nine white children. The school building was enlarged by the addition of ten new classrooms. In September 1960 when the Negro enrollment exceeded 1,000, the last remaining white pupil withdrew, her parents moving to another neighborhood. However, the school board gingerly extended desegregation to two more white schools, admitting one Negro child to each.

In the fall of 1961 four more Florida counties began token public school desegregation and in Dade County (Miami) 513 Negro children were attending classes with whites in ten schools. In the fall of 1962, 1,168 Negro children were attending school with whites in ten Florida counties and 55 public schools. (1963: ?)

The Banishment of Uncle Tom

The year 1960 is memorable as marking a massive awakening and upsurge on the part of Negroes in the South with a new-found resolve to fight to the end against all forms of discrimination against them. Initial inroads were made with sensational speed upon the pattern of race segregation in areas other than public education; but the path led through stubborn and sometimes violent opposition -- in some sections, through public upheaval, of which the end is not yet in sight. The new spirit was to spread also through the Negro minority in the rest of the United States, and -- though affected only slightly by developments overseas, and devoted to non-violent expression -- would become a part of the rising tide of belligerence among colored races throughout the world.

The militant element before 1960 had embraced only a small fraction of the nearly ten million Negroes in the eleven Southern states. The incessant assertions of Southern whites that the Negroes preferred segregation, that "90 per cent," or "99 per cent" of them were not interested in racial integration, was an exaggerated, if in many cases a superficially honest, appraisal. Few white people ever heard Negroes express a desire to see their children mingle with white children in public schools, and many heard Negro domestics say that integration would only cause trouble. Centuries of meek dependency had taught most ordinary Negroes to say to white people what they thought white people wanted to hear.

And there were, indeed, thousands of Negroes among whom the Supreme Court decision caused no rejoicing. Those of little education or contact with the larger world were slow to grasp its significance, and many who did feared that efforts to secure its enforcement would lead only to grief. Some well-educated Negroes held this latter view. The statements of Negro "segregationists" were so widely quoted by white propagandists as to give an impression that these Negroes were prominent and substantial in number, but they were in fact rare and generally little-known individuals. One Negro intellectual, the novelist Zora Neale Hurston, achieved momentary fame among a Southern public not generally aware of the existence of Negro literati when she said in a letter to the Orlando (Florida) Sentinel in 1955 that she was "not delighted" over the Brown decision. "It is well known," Miss Hurston wrote, "that I have no sympathy nor respect for the 'tragedy of color' school of thought among us, whose fountain-head is the pressure group concerned in this court ruling...." [1] Short of approval of segregation in principle, the philosophy of accommodation and reliance upon the good will of whites for a gradual Negro advance had many thoughtful adherents among the older generation.

J. C. Furnas in his Goodbye to Uncle Tom, published in 1956, noted that American Negroes had made the name of the titular hero of Uncle Tom's Cabin "a hissing and a byword." In its odious connotation the label was unfair both to Mrs. Stowe's loyal paragon of Christian virtues and to many to whom it was lightly applied after the Brown decision. Brash young Negro crusaders used it to express their impatience with many of their elders -- including indiscriminately Negro educators, who were almost invariably sympathetic and often unostentatiously helpful in the civil rights cause. Negroes in public education at all levels were state employees and were dependent upon white politicians, not only for their jobs, but for appropriations and a variety of help needed to carry on the education of Negro youth -- which included the training of future leaders in the fight for Negro rights. Presidents of private Negro universities and colleges needed the support of white trustees and benefactors and on their high pedestal were also under the watchful eye of politicians and segregationist organizations. Some Negro college presidents of prestige and statesmanlike diplomacy were able, nevertheless, quietly to render inestimable service directly in the fight against race discrimination; their advice was often sought by liberals of both races and in the highest official and political circles of the nation. Rufus E. Clement, of Atlanta University, Albert W. Dent, of Dillard University, Luther H. Foster, of Tuskegee Institute, Benjamin E. Mays, of Morehouse College, and Stephen J. Wright, of Fisk University, were distinguished members of this group.

What came to be generally regarded as "Uncle Tomism" was most conspicuous in Mississippi. "White men are still in charge in Mississippi," Percy Greene, the leading "Uncle Tom", often reminded his brethren, counseling that "a friendly relation with white people is still the greatest asset of the Mississippi Negro." In the atmosphere of heavy-handed repression which prevailed in that state, the argument was not without a certain myopic merit. Dr. J. H. White, president of the Negro Mississippi Vocational College told a Negro gathering at Mound Bayou: "I don't believe you are going to throw away your churches, schools, hospitals, businesses, insurances, newspapers... just to sit, eat and ride with a white person."[1] Greene became the most voluble, the most famous and the most reviled of all the "Uncle Toms." Editor of the weekly Jackson Advocate and chairman of the Mississippi Association of Negro Democratic Clubs, he was a rugged, hard-bitten veteran of many battles for Negro causes. He suggested in 1955 that the NAACP "show a willingness to support a formula that will enable the moderate to start a working solution of the problems posed by its hard-won decision," declaring that no solution could be found "in an atmosphere of vituperation, vindictiveness, finger-pointing, name-calling and threats of retaliation."[3] "Uncle Tom Percy Greene," as he did not hesitate to call himself, increasingly attacked the NAACP and in return became a pariah in militant Negro circles. Insisting that "the Southern Negroes do not want public school integration," he became a favorite exhibit of the Citizens' Councils and the segregationist press in support of that contention. Greene's position, and that of some lesser "Uncle Toms," was not unlike that of "collaborationists" in France under the German occupation.

In the South as a whole the "Uncle Toms" were soon submerged in the rising tide of Negro awareness. A Gallup poll in 1957 found 69 per cent of Southern Negroes in favor of enforcement of the school desegregation ruling and only 13 per cent opposed. Although only a bold few were willing to affront the whites with desegregation ~~petitions~~ moves, within the Negro community opposition to segregation had become the only respectable attitude. Indeed, the odium that descended upon the Negro dissenter was not unlike that suffered by the white moderate in an ultra-segregationist milieu. Leaders in the desegregation movement became popular heroes, and the pupils who braved the storm of insult and harassment in the pioneer marches across the segregation line in Clinton, Little Rock and elsewhere were a source of deep pride to the Negro public (a feeling which the dignity and fortitude of those children inspired in all unbiased observers).

By 1960 the masses of Negro Southerners were conscious of the injustice and degradation of segregation in all of its manifestations as never before. And they were no longer resigned to relying for relief entirely upon the NAACP and the federal courts and far less upon white benevolence and the slow processes of time. The Uncle Tom of servility and submission at last was bidding farewell. Yet Negroes generally were still quiescent, as if waiting for a signal. Then the signal came from four Negro college boys in North Carolina.

The inception of the student protest movement was sudden, eminently spontaneous and not without an element of romance. It had been talked, and dreamed, about for three months in dormitory huddles among four freshmen at the Negro Agricultural and Technical College in Greensboro. The young conspirators -- Ezell Blair, David Richmond, Joseph McNeil and Franklin McLain -- were all students in good standing. The plan had been divulged to no one off the campus. The NAACP would aid, and CORE would embrace the movement in due course, but they were taken by surprise at its spectacular beginning.

At 4:30 P.M. on February 1, 1960, the four boys took seats at a lunch counter of a Woolworth department store, ordered coffee and waited until the store closed at 6:30. They were not served. Negroes were not served at "white" lunch counters in the South — not yet. But the idea spread with sensational rapidity. The next day 75 students from A. and T. "sat-in" at Woolworth's, and the performance was repeated daily by growing numbers. Within a week Negroes were staging lunch counter "sit-ins" in Durham, Winston-Salem, Elizabeth City, Fayetteville, Charlotte and High Point — by the end of the month, in Virginia, South Carolina, Maryland, Tennessee, Alabama, Kentucky and Florida.

Avoidance of provocation to violence and even decorum were emphasized by the Negro students who dominated the movement. The writer talked at an early stage with the four boys who started it: they were voluble on the subject of Thomas Jefferson and Patrick Henry and only vaguely familiar with Mahatma Ghandi; but they insisted that demonstrators should be sober, well-groomed (wearing coats and ties) and non-violent. Fellow students were told: "If you can't take insult and injury, stay away." A Tennessee group published a code to govern "sit-ins," which read in part:

> Don't strike back or curse if abused.
>
> .....
>
> Don't block entrances to stores and aisles.
>
> Show yourself courteous and friendly at all times.
> Sit straight and always face the counter.[4]

Southern whites reacted with shock, and anger in many quarters, at these extraordinary performances; and yet an astonishing number were favorably impressed. An elderly lady of segregationist background, seeing Negro students rebuffed at a lunch counter in Raleigh, exclaimed: "How can they refuse to serve such nice, polite young people?" The segregationist editor of the Richmond News Leader said, on February 22, of a "sit-in" in that city: "Here were the colored students, in coats, white shirts, ties, and one of them reading Goethe and one was taking notes from a biology text. And here, on the sidewalk outside, was a gang of white boys come to heckle, a ragtail rabble, slack-jawed, black-jacketed, grinning fit to kill, and some of them, God save the mark, were waving the proud flag of the Southern states in the last war fought by gentlemen...."

As the "sit-ins" multiplied, they were supported increasingly by parades and picket lines. Apart from the demonstration of Negro intelligence and good manners, the movement had a profound effect upon the thinking of white Southerners. Many of them had really believed that "our" Negroes were contented with their lot, that all the agitation was the work of outsiders. Here was unmistakable evidence to the contrary. White student groups and religious bodies, a few in the South and many in the nation, expressed sympathy with the drive to break down lunch counter segregation. At the same time the spectacle of "sit-ins" and picket lines tended to frighten regular customers away from trading centers and caused substantial loss to white merchants, while the task of maintaining public order taxed the resources of municipal authorities. Biracial "mayors' committees" or similar bodies were set up in many cities to seek a solution of the problems -- or, expressed more realistically, to induce merchants to open their lunch counters to Negroes. White clergymen were in the forefront of this work of adjustment.

Governor Collins of Florida in a broadcast on March 20 expressed his opinion that "if a man has a department store and he invites the public generally to come into his department store and trade, then it is morally wrong to single out one department and say he does not want or will not allow Negroes to patronize that one department." In the atmosphere of tension which "sit-ins" had precipitated in Florida Collins moved forthwith to set up a state commission on race relations -- the only such body in the South -- which worked diligently through the remaining eight months of his administration. Significant also was the formation in April of the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee, a mainly Negro organization, which would become a permanent and dynamic addition to the militant organizations in the field. The desegregation of lunch counters in response to the persistent "sit-ins" was painfully slow at the start, but in the late summer the walls of Jericho came tumbling down in many places and within a year some lunch counters had dropped race barriers in over a hundred cities.

When the advance in this area ran into the more difficult strongholds of segregation and the pace slackened, the movement itself only gathered momentum: It broadened its objectives. Segregation and discrimination were challenged in restaurants, theaters, churches, public parks and swimming pools, courtrooms, libraries, museums, art galleries, laundromats, on the beaches and in voter registration, employment and transportation. Economic boycotts were added to the pressure upon merchants practicing race discrimination in service or employment. There was much scattered disorder and some rioting; several thousand arrests were made. But in relation to the provocative nature and the vast sweep of the movement the amount of serious violence was small -- except in an attack upon segregation in interstate bus transportation.

In this last-mentioned undertaking, audacious forays into Alabama and Mississippi -- two fierce citadels of white supremacy which the student movement had barely touched -- had tragic and horrifying results. In May 1961 the Congress of Racial Equality sponsored a bus tour of the South, or a "freedom ride," to test local segregation laws and practices in interstate transportation and terminal facilities. Although Negroes generally occupied the back seats apart from the white passengers in such buses, in most of the South this was no longer required. In fact, segregation of passengers on buses was in violation of the principle laid down in the Brown decision. Relying specifically on that ruling the Interstate Commerce Commission had ordered an end to segregation on interstate railroads and in their terminals. In 1956 the Supreme Court cited the Brown decision in ruling against segregation on local buses in Montgomery, Alabama. In 1962 the high court was to declare: "We have settled beyond question that no state may require segregation of interstate or intrastate transportation facilities."[5]

The "freedom riders," seated in front or at random in the buses, encountered no serious difficulty until they arrived in Alabama. There a week of the bloodiest racial violence in the recent history of that state ensued. A mob met one contingent of "riders" at Anniston and burned the bus with an incendiary bomb; white toughs met another contingent at Birmingham and assailed the "riders" and newsmen and bystanders as well. In the capital city of Montgomery a replacement contingent of "riders" was met at the bus station and beaten with fists and clubs. The score of persons who were injured in several hours of sporadic rioting in Montgomery included John Seigenthaler, a Department of Justice official, who had been designated as a representative of President Kennedy; he was bludgeoned into semi-consciousness while attempting to save a white "rider" from the mob. When local police failed to restore order, federal marshals were sent in; the number of federal marshals in Alabama reached a total of 666. A disturbing feature of the convulsions was the apparent sympathy of many of the police and other authorities with the rioters. At length on May 21 Governor Patterson called out the Alabama National Guard and order was restored.

In Mississippi similar molestation of "freedom riders," by the populace was prevented by heavy police precautions, including the use of the National Guard from the outset. But the "riders" were themselves subjected to harsh treatment by the law enforcement authorities and their "ride" for the most part ended in Jackson jails or in the state prison farm. As contingent after contingent arrived in Jackson, more than three hundred were arrested and convicted -- generally on the charge of "breach of the peace" when they refused to obey police orders to "move on" after entering segregated terminal facilities.

The "freedom rides" aroused both criticism and sympathy in national liberal circles. They drew some distinguished white participation. A party which arrived in Montgomery, Alabama, on May 24, and whose members were arrested the following day, included the Rev. William S. Coffin, Jr., Yale University chaplain and a member of the Peace Corps Advisory Council; the Rev. Gaylord B. Noyce, assistant professor of religion at the Yale Divinity School; and Dr. David E. Swift and Dr. John D. Maguire, professor and assistant professor of religion at Wesleyan University. A biracial group of Episcopal ministers, headed by the Rev. John B. Morris, executive director of the Episcopal Society for Cultural and Racial Unity, joined the "freedom riders" in Jackson, Mississippi, and spent some time in jail there.

The sound and fury of the Alabama violence and the Mississippi jailings echoed through the world's press and radio in protest and sarcasm and grave warnings of Communist gains in the damage to American prestige. Secretary of State Dean Rusk supported a petition of Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy to the Interstate Commerce Commission to adopt more stringent regulations against segregation. The immediate gains of the "freedom riders" in practice were meager and tenuous, but on September 22, 1961, the Interstate Commerce Commission prescribed new rules prohibiting discrimination in seating on interstate buses and requiring each bus to display a sign to that effect; similar action was taken with respect to bus terminals.

A detailed account of the fast-spreading protest movement of the 1960's and its development into a massive revolt of Negro Americans against the incubus of race discrimination would be beyond the compass of this book. The Brown decision was a mighty precursor, but it may have been more a cushion than a causal factor. A stage had been reached in history and in the enlightenment of our Negro minority when it is hard to see how a rebellion could have been postponed. The Supreme Court opinion in the Brown cases told Negroes that their resentment of segregation was supported by the Constitution of the United States and made their aspirations a part of what we like to call the "American dream." The great decision pointed to the possibilities of relief through processes of law when, to many zealots, more dangerous methods might have suggested themselves. It encouraged continued recourse to federal courts, and the greatest of Negro organizations, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, moved rigidly within this channel.

A further fortunate circumstance was the fact that the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, the Congress on Racial Equality and the student organizations, though going beyond court action, were devoted to non-violent methods. Martin Luther King was the most conspicuous personality in the Negro protest movement. This gentle clergyman with an iron will exasperated many Southern whites; demonstrations that he inspired, however non-violent in themselves, were regarded as an incitement to strife and violence and became a nightmare for Southern municipal and police authorities. Liberals also often criticized his strategy and timing. But King's primacy in the eyes of the Negro public was never challenged and the wave of insurgence was dominated by his philosophy. To this he gave ideal expression in a frequently repeated message to the whites: "We will match your capacity to inflict suffering with our capacity to endure suffering. We will meet your physical force with soul force. We will not hate you, but we cannot in good conscience obey your unjust laws.... We will soon wear you down by our capacity to suffer. And in winning our freedom we will so appeal to your heart and conscience that we will win you in the process."[6]

It was not to be expected that a clash on so vast a scale with concepts, mores and local laws would be free from turmoil. But thanks to King's philosophy and a disposition on the part of the federal judiciary -- shared increasingly by the federal executive -- to extend to the Negro minority "the equal protection of the laws," the convulsions have been mild in comparison with those which often have attended the rise of oppressed peoples.

We have endeavored to introduce the reader to this broader Negro movement and we shall continue to observe its outline as it surrounds us in the remaining pages of this book. But the precise judgment of the Supreme Court in the Brown cases was that "racial discrimination in public education is unconstitutional," and we shall be concerned primarily with the impact of the decision in that field.

The Beginning of a Movement of Compliance

In statistical analyses and forecasts of the region's approach to "all deliberate speed" in its compliance with the Brown decision the year 1960 should be taken as the point at which the South began to move. The earlier school desegregation initiatives -- outside of Texas -- however significant psychologically, had been meager and more or less isolated. During the years 1960 and 1961 the number of Negroes in school with whites in Texas increased, in approximate figures, from 3,300 to 5,000; in the ten other Southern states, the number increased from less than 350 to more than 2,600 and the number of school districts desegregated rose from twenty-six to sixty.[1]

Some observers, on the eighth anniversary of the Brown decision, divided the total number of Negroes attending classes with whites in Southern public schools by eight -- ignoring progressive acceleration -- and came forward with dismal and grossly misleading calculations. James Graham Cook began his book The Segregationists with a chapter entitled "1. Introduction -- The 7,288-Year Integration Plan"! He calculated that on the basis of the average annual rate of desegregation for eight years it would take that long to bring the 2,482,170 Negro school children in the ten states into public schools with whites. When he included faster-moving Texas in the calculation, Cook said ".... if the pace of integration were to continue as it has since The Decision, the elimination of school segregation would be accomplished in merely 4,712 years rather than 7,288 years."

Actually it was not until 1960 that anything like "a pace of integration" was discernible and it would accelerate significantly from year to year. The admission of several thousand Negro pupils to schools with whites in the sixth and seventh years after Brown was still a tardy and feeble response to the desegregation mandate, but it was far from being as hopeless as this extravagant arithmetic suggested.

The breaking down of resistance postures in 1960 and 1961 was more impressive than the count of integrated pupils. The wall of segregation was breached in two more states, leaving only Alabama, Mississippi and South Carolina on the totally recalcitrant list. Over the great urban centers, within the limits of token adjustment, the winds of change blew lustily. Negroes were admitted to schools with whites for the first time in five of the six largest cities in the South -- Houston and New Orleans in 1960 and Dallas, Atlanta and Memphis in 1961; in the sixth, San Antonio, two hundred Negro children had been admitted to previously all-white schools in 1955. Miami, which ranks among the largest cities when its populous metropolitan area is taken into account, had begun desegregation in 1959. (Another sprawling metropolis, Birmingham, Alabama, was to be among the last bitter strongholds of resistance.) In a somewhat lower population bracket, public schools were desegregated in Raleigh, North Carolina, (Durham had moved in 1959), Knoxville, Tennessee, and Richmond and Roanoke, Virginia, in 1960; in Tampa, Florida, and Galveston, Texas, in 1961. Violence in this area of Negro advance also subsided. New Orleans was torn with ugly turmoil, but elsewhere in the wide spectrum of desegregation progress the change was made in unbroken public order and tranquility.

Most impressive of all was the growing recognition of the inevitability of change in the broad field of interracial relations. In the fall of 1958 a Gallup Poll had asked the question: "Do you think the day will ever come in the South when whites and Negroes will be going to the same schools, eating in the same restaurants, and generally sharing the same public accommodations? -- and only 53 per cent of the Southerners queried had answered "Yes." When the same question was put to Southerners in January 1961, 76 per cent answered in the affirmative.

Nineteen sixty was also a presidential election year in the United States. Both of the major political parties promised vigorous support of public school desegregation and civil rights. The anti-segregation plank in the Democratic platform was adopted over angry Southern protests, ten Southern delegations issuing a dissenting minority report. At the Republican national convention the fight was between a regular subcommittee, which proposed a milder stand, and two powerful leaders, Vice-President Richard M. Nixon and Governor Nelson Rockefeller of New York, who demanded and secured the strong plank. Each party expressed a determination to end public school segregation, proposed legislation which would empower the attorney general to initiate desegregation suits and greeted the Negro students' "sit-in" movement with expressions of approval of "peaceful demonstrations" or "peaceful assembly" in support of their aims.

Senator John F. Kennedy and Vice-President Nixon, who emerged as the Democratic and Republican nominees for President, and Henry Cabot Lodge, the Republican candidate for Vice-President, all took fervently liberal positions on the race question in the ensuing contest; Senator Lyndon B. Johnson, Kennedy's running mate — himself a Southerner — was more guarded on the subject. In spite of Negro loathing for the Democratic politicians who ruled the South, faith in the liberalism of the party as a whole and in its candidate — aided by gestures of sympathy during the campaign for Martin Luther King, who was in a Georgia jail at the time — appeared to have won a preponderance of the Negro vote for Kennedy.

The Civil Rights Act of 1957 had been the first in 82 years, or since the Reconstruction era. A second was passed in 1960. Both bills were limited in scope and were further emasculated before passage over stubborn Southern opposition. In 1960 the issue monopolized the attention of Congress from February 15 until the bill's final passage on April 8, and Southern Senators broke previous filibuster records with a continuous 125-hour performance. The act which emerged was a disappointment to liberal leaders in both houses. Two provisions which had been recommended by President Eisenhower were rejected: one of these would have given statutory authority to the President's committee seeking to eliminate discrimination in employment by government contract firms; the other would have provided federal aid for communities struggling with the problem of desegregating their public schools and would have stated that the Brown decision was the law of the land. Like its 1957 predecessor, the Civil Rights Act of 1960 was mainly concerned with protecting the voting rights of Negroes; it gave the attorney general the power to defend Negro voting rights in court and authorized the appointment by federal judges of referees to register qualified Negro voters in situations where registration was denied them.

The Eisenhower administration further altered its hands-off policy in its closing days in office by permitting Attorney General William P. Rogers to take over major responsibility for enforcing federal court decrees in the vexing New Orleans crisis. As successive waves of defiant legislation flowed from the Louisiana legislature, the Justice Department took the initiative in obtaining injunctive relief from this kind of interference. Within a few weeks the task was inherited by the Kennedy administration and thereafter federal energies were increasingly devoted to guaranteeing the efficacy of federal court desegregation orders, at New Orleans and elsewhere.

The inauguration of President Kennedy in January 1961 ushered in a new era of recognition of the Negro and of sympathy with his aspirations on the part of the federal government. A number of Negroes were appointed to high office. Robert Weaver was named Administrator of the Housing and Home Finance Agency, a position with responsibilities comparable to those of a cabinet member. Other Negro appointees included two federal district judges and one judge of a United States Court of Appeals, two ambassadors, an Assistant Secretary of Labor, two federal district attorneys, Deputy Assistant Secretaries of State and of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, a Deputy Assistant Postmaster General, a Commissioner of the District of Columbia and an Associate White House Press Secretary. The President's attitude was one of positive support of the Brown decision and of equal opportunity for Negroes in a broad field -- an attitude which, though by-passing Southern members of Congress, began to pervade the official atmosphere of Washington.

We have now observed enough Southern cities in the throes of first adjustment to biracial public schools to have established a certain pattern. In the hostile manifestations of elements who were determined to preserve segregation at all costs, in the tireless labors of citizens who were prepared to accept inevitable desegregation and who strove to preserve public education, in the threats of fanatics and the apprehensions of law enforcement authorities -- and in the relaxation of tensions after the fact of desegregation -- the experience of cities little and big was remarkably similar. Interminable federal court litigation was often, but not always, a part of the ordeal. Crises differed also in the degree and timeliness of recognition by the business community of its interest in public stability. The opposition varied in vehemence and in the proportion of the populace involved. Where violence and rioting occurred, we saw the hand of uncannily effective racist agitators, as in Clinton, or an inflammatory performance by state authorities, as in Little Rock; both of these phenomena plagued New Orleans.

The 1960-1961 desegregation saw the development in the two most difficult situations, those of Atlanta and New Orleans, of save-the-public-schools organizations patterned after those of Virginia and Little Rock. These organizations, avoiding the segregation issue as such, were able to arouse broad opposition to closing the schools as an alternative to desegregation, and other groups in Dallas and elsewhere used a similar approach. When the point of desegregation was reached, a gradual schedule of admitting Negroes to white schools in the first grade only at the outset and to the next higher grade each year thereafter was widely favored. Although this plan was frowned upon by federal courts in some school districts where desegregation had already begun or where no serious emotional problem existed, New Orleans, Houston, Dallas, Galveston, Memphis and Knoxville began by integrating only the first grade with the approval or upon the suggestion of federal district judges; the two Tennessee cities were later ordered to move faster than one-grade-a-year. The business community of Dallas exerted itself early and vigorously on the side of law and order and public education, that in Atlanta moved belatedly but with wholesome effect; the businessmen of New Orleans were tragically too late.

Texas, after the early fumbling in Mansfield, was not again a scene of sensational disorder in public school desegregation, and so large a part of the state had adjusted early to the Supreme Court ruling that many observers classed Texas with the border states in this respect. Before the legislature put a brake on the movement in 1957 by requiring previous approval by popular vote if state school funds were not to be withheld from the desegregating district, 123 out of 722 Texas school districts had removed racial barriers. Although desegregation was extended in school districts which had already taken the first step and referendum approval for initial desegregation was secured in two districts, this enactment largely put a stop to voluntary action. The Galveston school board, for instance, suspended a plan for desegregation which had been scheduled to begin in September 1957. An important result of the Houston crisis in 1960 was a ruling by State Attorney General Will Wills removing this statutory handicap when desegregation was ordered by federal courts.

In spite of the degree of emotional stability on the issue at which Texas had arrived, and which the events of 1960-1961 would attest, the approach of the change in the eastern section with its heavy Negro population aroused considerable apprehension. The event was nervously awaited in the great metropolises of Houston and Dallas; they were the two largest cities in the nation where public school segregation still prevailed. In both of those cities and in Galveston the familiar controversy and protests raged. But Negro first-graders were admitted to classes with whites -- 21 in Houston, 18 in Dallas and 37 in Galveston -- quietly and without incident. In Dallas, the work of business men in a "Dallas Citizens' Council" -- with objectives more or less the opposite of those of organizations elsewhere of similar name -- aided by associations of ministers, lawyers and physicians, were largely responsible for making the initial desegregation what many observers, including NAACP officials, called "a model operation." Dallas had also responded to the student protest movement with the desegregation of forty restaurants and lunch counters.

That city's earlier experience with the school problem was made particularly noteworthy -- and disturbing in relation to the efficiency of the federal judicial system -- by the bizarre performance of two superannuated district judges, volubly out of sympathy with the Supreme Court's decision in the Brown cases, who presided over six years of litigation there. After balking through three district court hearings and four interventions by the court of appeals, Judge William H. Atwell, 88 years of age, at last issued a desegregation order. But in apparent pique, without waiting for a plan to be submitted, he ordered Dallas to desegregate all its schools by the beginning of the next semester, in January 1958. The court of appeals vacated this drastic command, and the NAACP attorneys did not press the matter again until the summer of 1959, when it asked the court to require the school board to submit a plan.

By now, however, Judge Atwell had retired. The case was assigned to Judge T. Whitfield Davidson, 82 years of age, who a year later, under unequivocal instructions from the court of appeals, ordered the school board to submit a desegregation plan. The school board produced a one-grade-a-year program to begin in 1961, but this the aged jurist rejected. Instead he offered his own plan: it was the scheme, which had been put forward in Alabama and Tennessee, for keeping all the schools segregated except one or two for such pupils as might voluntarily choose interracial mingling. The court of appeals then reversed the court in Dallas for the sixth time and directed Judge Davidson to approve substantially the school board's plan.[3]

New Orleans and Atlanta each was the first redoubt of public school segregation to fall in a state that in 1960 was still mobilized for total resistance to the change. The problem in these cities presented greater difficulty and the event would have greater significance on that account. It was evident from the course of federal court litigation by 1960 in both cities that peremptory orders to end public school segregation could not be held off much longer. Atlanta was grappling with the question from both ends, but New Orleans and Louisiana were engaged mainly in stifling free debate and in raising higher the ramparts of resistance which would have to be toppled over.

Atlanta -- sophisticated, enterprising, bustling with progress -- was a symbol of the "New South" that its own Henry W. Grady had proclaimed three quarters of a century before; it was one of the nation's great industrial and financial centers. Yet the capital city and metropolis of Georgia, with approximately one eighth of the state's total population, was a feeble force in state affairs: the county unit system of elections and an obsolete pattern of legislative districts, which gave many times as much representation to rural districts, left Atlanta almost powerless by electoral processes to alter the state's political course.

We have had many echoes in these pages of the aggressive hostility of Georgia's legislature and its Governors Talmadge and Griffin to any departure from the South's rule of race segregation. Griffin's successor, Governor Ernest Vandiver took a similarly adamant stand. Atlanta's leadership was far more moderate. The city enjoyed a rare advantage of having in key positions of influence two individuals who rank high among the leaders of the South in this whole difficult period: Ralph McGill, editor of the Atlanta Constitution, and William B. Hartsfield, the city's sagacious and indomitable veteran mayor. The Negro element, approximately 30 per cent, of the city's population, included an unusual group of wealthy and distinguished individuals who gave Atlanta an image of the Negro that white people in most Southern cities never saw; a Negro held elective office as a member of the city school board. Though the suit which brought desegregation to Atlanta was filed only in January 1958, by 1960, 311 clergymen, 419 physicians, two-thirds of the faculty of Emory University and a number of Parent-Teacher Associations had declared themselves publicly in favor of continued operation of the public schools with acceptance of desegregation, and the dynamic organization Save Our Public Schools, Inc., or "HOPE", had been in operation for over a year. At the same time race prejudice was deeply rooted in a large element of the Atlanta populace and the opposition to desegregation had busy promoters and virulent spokesmen.

Federal District Judge Frank A. Hooper, himself a former Georgia legislator, persevered in the express hope that the state's school-closing legislation would be repealed. In January 1960 he gave the legislature a clearcut choice: accept gradual integration or be prepared to close, not only Atlanta schools, but all the public schools in the state. In February the legislature acted to the extent of setting up a 19-member commission to study the problem. Headed by John A. Sibley, a 71-year-old Atlanta banker, the commission conducted a whirlwind month of hearings -- hearing 1,800 witnesses -- in Georgia's ten congressional districts. The commission's report, rendered April 28 and signed by eleven of its nineteen members, recommended local option on the issue -- the indicated retreat from "massive resistance." Judge Hooper, in a May hearing, gave the legislature what he described as a "last chance," and fixed May 1, 1961 as the deadline for Atlanta school desegregation (to be effective upon the opening of schools for the next term).

New Orleans had been under a school desegregation order since 1956. The suit, Bush v. Orleans Parish School Board,[4] was filed in 1952 and was suspended pending disposition of the Brown cases, which were then on their way to the Supreme Court, to be reactivated after the Supreme Court's 1955 ruling. In a decision of February 15, 1956, Federal District Judge J. Skelly Wright ordered the desegregation of public schools "with all deliberate speed," but he pointed out that this did not mean that desegregation must be completed "overnight, or even in a year or more." His opinion concluded with a paragraph which has been widely quoted as one of the philosophic gems of this crisis in the South:

> The problem of changing a people's mores, particularly those with an emotional overlay, is not to be taken lightly. It is a problem which will require the utmost patience, > understanding, generosity and forbearance from all of us, of whatever race. But the magnitude of the problem may not nullify the principle. And that principle is that we are, all of us, freeborn Americans, with a right to make our way, unfettered by sanctions imposed by man because of the work of God.

But four years later, the only response had been continued litigation and a proliferation of laws designed to perpetuate public school segregation.

Paradoxically, in the desegregation of institutions of higher learning Louisiana had gone farther than any other Southern state. For the 1960-1961 term, 634 Negroes had been admitted to predominantly white universities supported by the state with a total aggregate enrollment of 22,565.

Louisiana has ethnic characteristics which set it apart from other states of the South, and of the Union, as a result of its background as successively a French colony, a Spanish colony and a French colony again before its acquisition by the United States. The French influence is most apparent in the southeastern section in which New Orleans lies. About half the population there is of Roman Catholic faith. In 1960, approximately 50,000 New Orleans children were enrolled in Catholic parochial schools, and many Catholic children were among the approximately 95,000 pupils in public schools. The mayor, the superintendent of public schools and two of the five members of the public school board were Catholics. Although the parochial schools remained segregated until 1962, Archbishop Joseph Francis Rummel had given notice in 1956 that they were destined to be desegregated, and he had declared repeatedly that "segregation is morally wrong." Nevertheless, white Catholic laymen showed little more tolerance on the race issue than Protestant laymen. Two Catholics, Emile Wagner, a member of the public school board, and Leander Perez, a wealthy politician, were among the foremost leaders of the extreme segregationist element. A group of Catholics took public issue with the Archbishop and appealed the question of segregation to the Pope; their communication received no acknowledgment.

Although the threat of school-closing to avoid racial integration had long hung over New Orleans, it was not until the spring of 1960 that significant voices were heard in defense of public education. Lloyd Rittiner, president of the public school board, said: "I am a segregationist. If, however, I am faced with a choice of integrating or closing, I am already on record as favoring integration to the extent that is necessary to comply with the law;" three other board members took a similar stand. But even this degree of moderation brought down upon these school officials a flood of abuse which continued for many months. The movement to prevent school-closing got under way only in the early summer. It was organized in two groups, "Save Our Schools," or "SOS," and a Committee on Public Education, or "COPE." These published pamphlets, held meetings, buttonholed hesitant business and professional leaders and succeeded in stimulating a degree of public dialogue on the question. Some groups of clergymen also spoke out.

The business men stayed for the most part in the large "neutral," or silent, compound until actual rioting began; it was not until January 1961 -- after inestimable damage had been done -- that a hundred business leaders signed a page advertisement in the two newspapers calling for law and order. Mayor de Lesseps S. Morrison was discreetly on the side of continued public education but fearful of antagonizing the extremists who were rampant in his city and the state. The local newspapers, which for several years had added to the chorus of hostility to desegregation, began only in August of 1960 to express a firm conviction that "preservation of public education at this time stands out as paramount."[5] The only medium to accept early and firmly the responsibility for community leadership was the television station WDSU-TV and the radio station WDSU. That a silent reservoir of moderate sentiment existed in New Orleans was attested when a school board-member election was held on November 8, at the height of the ~~fervor~~ furor: Matthew Sutherland, a member who opposed school-closing, was re-elected over three extremist opponents. But in no other city whose desegregation experience we have observed was the default of constructive leadership more apparent.

The Citizens' Council of New Orleans was powerful and feverishly active. The chief source of obstruction, however, and of incitement to turmoil, was the state capitol at Baton Rouge. Jimmy H. Davis, a writer of popular songs and a former governor was re-elected to that office on April 19. Davis had won the Democratic nomination in the run-off primary over Mayor Morrison by gathering the ultra-segregationists into his camp. The legislature was in a mood to pass any bill aimed at preventing desegregation that was presented to it. Judge Skelly Wright's lone struggle with the governor and legislature of Louisiana is one of the epics of judicial annals.

When on May 16 Judge Wright was still unable to secure a desegregation plan from the school board, he produced one of his own. He ordered desegregation at the opening of schools in September in accordance with the following plan:

"A. All children entering the first grade may attend either the formerly all-white public schools nearest their homes or the formerly all-Negro public school nearest their homes at their option.

"B. Children may be transferred from one school to another provided such transfers are not based on considerations of race."

On June 26, the court of appeals refused to grant a stay of Judge Wright's order; on July 11 Supreme Court Justice Hugo Black refused to grant a stay. On August 17, Governor Davis invoked one of the state's portfolio of segregation laws and seized control of the Orleans Parish schools. Ten days later a three-judge federal court issued an order restraining the governor and declaring seven segregation laws unconstitutional. Five times the governor or the legislature attempted to take over the New Orleans schools or to strip members of its school board of their powers. In November the legislature went into a 12-day special session to try to block desegregation and then launched into a 30-day session in an effort to reverse it. Judge Wright met every new move with restraining orders, and was regularly sustained by the higher federal courts. When November 14 was set as the date for desegregation, the legislature declared that day a school "holiday" and sent state police to enforce it, but the principals of the 118 schools stood firm and no school in New Orleans was closed.

The explosion which ensued and the disgraceful performance of officials and uncontrolled fanatics for weeks afterward made another one of those sensational post-Brown decision episodes which engrossed the American press and radio-television and sent photos and stories to the far corners of the earth. We give the picture briefly in the following excerpts from The Report on the New Orleans Crisis of the Louisiana State Advisory Committee to the United States Commission on Civil Rights:

> On Monday, November 14, four Negro girls attended first grade classes at two previously all-white schools (the fifth child eligible for transfer was withdrawn). The schools were William Frantz Elementary and McDonogh No. 19. ..... The Negro children were accompanied to school by Federal marshals. The white parents of the neighborhood, with two exceptions, withdrew their children from the schools. Reverend Lloyd Foreman and Mrs. Daisy Gabrielle continued to send their little girls to the Frantz school. The boycott at McDonogh No. 19 was total (it was briefly broken by the children of John Thompson in late January 1961; the Thompsons braved the boycott for three days and then left town).
>
> On November 15, William Rainach, Leander Perez, and others addressed a crowd of over 5,000 at a White Citizens Council meeting in New Orleans. Rainach advocated civil disobedience and a scorched earth policy. Perez said, in part, "Don't wait for your daughters to be raped by these Congolese. Do something about it now." Some witnesses described the meeting as "a gathering straight out of Nazi Germany." The action suggested by the speakers was a march on the school board building, city hall, and Judge Wright's office by protesting citizens.
>
> On November 16, this action was forthcoming. A crowd of teenagers and adults marched on the prescribed buildings, chanting: "Two, four, six, eight, we don't want to integrate." City police, under Superintendent Joseph Giarusso, attempted to control the mob by the use of mounted police and a few firehoses. No whites were injured, but several Negroes were hurt by flying glass as bus windows were shattered by vandals and two Negroes were severely beaten. The mob dispersed before it reached the heart of the business district.

Now the legislature abandoned its legislative committee approach and took over control of the New Orleans schools itself. The legislature urged white parents at Frantz and McDonogh No. 19 to continue their boycott of the schools.

.....

A member of the Orleans Parish school staff warned that money was becoming a problem to the school board, since the State had forbidden banks to lend money to the school board and the legislature itself had refused to pay the teachers. .....

On November 23, the legislature passed a resolution authorizing the payment of the Orleans Parish school employees, with the exception of the administrative staff and the Frantz and McDonogh teachers. An anonymous citizen loaned these teachers money to cover their earned salaries. Dr. Redmond, Mr. Rosenberg, and the administrative staff went unpaid.

In mid-November, the Whitney National Bank, which had honored payroll checks issued by the elected Orleans Parish School Board, was removed as fiscal agent for the State.

.....

During the last days of November, Reverend Lloyd Foreman and Mrs. James Gabrielle, who had continued to take their children to the Frantz school, were subjected to abuse and physical violence by the mob in front of the school. This, coupled with the fact that several parents in the Frantz school area had appealed to SOS for help in returning their children to school, led to the organization of a volunteer "carlift," run by parents from the uptown section of New Orleans, which transported the children to school in relative safety. The "carlift" began on December 1. The car carrying Yolanda Gabrielle was stoned and manhandled by the mob. Later in the week, it was pursued for two miles by a truck which had tried to ram it. Until Wednesday, December 7, the drivers and the women who escorted the children into the school were subjected to the vilest sort of shouted abuse from the daily-assembled crowds. On December 7, the police guarding the school pushed the crowd behind barricades a full block away from the school.

The crowd then dispersed to roam the streets of the Florida Housing Project, where many of the children live. Their parents were subjected to an organized telephone campaign of threats and abuse. Their houses and other properties were stoned, as was one of the mothers of a child at Frantz. The jobs of the fathers were threatened; four of them lost their jobs. James Gabrielle, ostracized by his fellow-workers, quit his job and took his family to Rhode Island. The volunteer drivers were threatened with death, arson, disfigurement, and other unpleasantnesses in a concerted telephone campaign. The police were unable to prevent these occurrences; and, with the exception of a couple of juveniles alleged to have stoned Mrs. Marion McKinley, no one connected with the demonstrations was arrested, nor was the mob in front of the school dispersed or told to move on.

A decision of a three-judge federal district court prohibiting implementations of segregation legislation, was carried to the Supreme Court on appeal. It brought a rejection of the plea for a stay of the desegregation order, and elicited a death blow to the doctrine of interposition which many Southern states had espoused. Noting the argument that the state of Louisiana had "interposed itself," the high tribunal said: "The conclusion is clear that interposition is not a constitutional doctrine. If taken seriously, it is an illegal defiance of constitutional authority..."

New Orleans public schools returned to normal operation, and the tenuous beachhead of racial integration survived the painful first year -- to be broadened each year thereafter. In spite of lingering scars of interracial bitterness, the aftermath resembled that in other desegregating cities. When twelve Negro children entered school with whites in September 1961 -- the governor and legislature were silent, even Emile Wagner advised the Citizens' Council against demonstrations and complete order prevailed; sixty federal marshals sent to New Orleans, were not used.

In Georgia, the movement against reckless resistance to desegregation had grown during 1960, but the structure of defiance and hostility was such that an explosion -- some outlet for emotions, some rioting and some demonstration of the folly of all this -- seemed necessary before quiet adjustment could be achieved. Fortunately for Atlanta, the catharsis was provided at the University of Georgia at Athens.

In most Southern states the desegregation of institutions of higher learning was now no longer a major problem. State universities in six of the eleven had enrolled Negroes with whites before the Brown decision; in a seventh, Florida, the state university began to do so in 1958. In January 1961, Negroes were attending over two hundred universities and colleges in Southern and border states and the District of Columbia which before 1955 had been restricted to whites. But in four Deep South states of Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia and South Carolina, university segregation was a key bastion in the "massive resistance" stockade. Excepting the brief and stormy experience of Autherine Lucy at the University of Alabama, no Negro had been admitted to a university with whites in these states. On January 6, 1961, climaxing a litigation begun the previous August, Federal District Judge William A. Boothe ordered that two Negroes be admitted to the University of Georgia. The Negroes, Miss Charlayne A. Hunter and Hamilton E. Holmes, were students of an exceptionally high caliber; Holmes in 1962 was to win the distinction of being elected to the national honor society of Phi Beta Kappa.

The integration of the two Negro students precipitated a week of excitement, confusion and rioting. The disorders -- in which unruly elements from the university city of Athens and elsewhere in the state had a significant part -- were not to be compared with those at the University of Alabama in 1956, but they were enough to cause widespread alarm. A degree of hysteria seized the state administration, and the legislature -- whose regular session had opened on the day the Negro students registered. Efforts to close the university and cut off its funds were thwarted promptly by federal court action. The two Negroes were removed from the university for four days for their "personal safety." When they returned on January 16, the campus was calm and the crisis was over. Vicariously, the crisis was over in large measure for Atlanta's public schools.

What happened in the Georgia legislature during the remaining days of January was sharply reminiscent of the drama enacted in Virginia just two years earlier. Governor Vandiver in an address before a joint session of the two chambers, broadcast by radio and television, made a ringing declaration.

"We meet together to proclaim to all the world that:

"Public education will be preserved!

"Our Georgia children will be protected!

"Local administration and autonomy will be maintained!

"Grants will be authorized!"

His brave rhetoric was nonetheless a retreat from "massive resistance:"

"Every legal means and resource to circumvent the effects of the (Brown) decision, yes.

"Defiance, no."

Promptly, and with near unanimity, the legislature enacted three laws which had the effect of wiping out the segregation laws on the Georgia statute books. ~~They~~ The new legislation included a tuition grant plan for pupils attending private schools similar to that in Virginia and a clarification of appeals procedure under the pupil assignment plan. Local option and local elections were provided for on the question of suspension of public schools.

In Atlanta, on August 30, nine Negro students were admitted to previously all-white public high schools in an atmosphere of calm -- and pride of achievement. (Among half a dozen loiterers arrested was a youth from Arlington, Virginia, who called himself a member of the American Nazi Party; he clicked his heels and shouted: "Sieg heil!") The city had been prepared for the event by a rare mobilization of community leadership. The chamber of commerce ran a full-page newspaper advertisement saying "the law is clear;" 850 church laymen asked school children to accept desegregation with dignity; the week-end before the move was designated "Law and Order Weekend" and Atlanta churches were asked to pray for peaceful desegregation. A body called "OASIS" or "Organizations Assisting Schools in September," prepared a handbook giving background and information for reporters. Representatives of newspapers, magazines and broadcasting services were not allowed on school grounds, but a huge news center was set up for them at City Hall, where reports from school principals and others could be heard over loudspeakers. The center was equipped with telephones, teletypes, telegraph facilities, television and radio sets as well as typewriters and tables, and the Coca Cola Company furnished refreshments. In the evening the mayor gave a press party and took visiting newsmen on a tour of the city in air-conditioned buses.

Atlanta's desegregation operation was reported to the nation, with justification, as the triumphant accomplishment of a great city. President Kennedy in his afternoon press conference congratulated "Governor Vandiver, Mayor Hartsfield, Chief of Police Jenkins, Superintendent of Schools Letson and all the parents, students and citizens of Atlanta, Georgia, for the responsible, law-abiding manner in which four high schools were desegregated today."

The success of the desegregation operations in Dallas and Atlanta in 1961 encouraged a third famous Southern metropolis, Memphis, and was a factor in a somewhat sudden decision of that city's school board. Knoxville in the same state had admitted twenty-eight Negro first-graders to classes with whites in 1960 with so little difficulty as to lead one school principal to exclaim: "This is the easiest registration day we've ever had!" Tennessee had never taken a "massive resistance" stand and there was no interference from a governor or a state legislature to contend with. Nevertheless, Memphis, in the southwestern corner of the state, ten miles from ominously recalcitrant Mississippi, had been looked upon as one of the major problem cities from the standpoint of adjustment to the Brown decision.

The Mississippi River port of song and story, the great cotton market -- the birthplace of W. C. Handy and the "blues" -- was particularly identified with the traditions of the old South.

Forty-six per cent of its approximately 100,000 school children were Negroes. But the Negro vote, since the days of "Boss" Crump,[6] had been a significant factor in local political calculations, and communications between white and Negro leaders had remained intact. A marked change had occurred in the city during the 1960-1961 period. Voter registration drives had increased the Negro's political role -- which was partly responsible for the appointment of a Negro member of the Memphis Transit Authority and of Negroes to a number of lesser official posts. The zoo, an art museum, an amusement park, four of the seven public golf courses and some playgrounds had been desegregated under a 10-year plan. Enforced bus segregation had ceased. Although Memphis merchants were still resisting the "sit-in" movement a plan was to be reached during the fall for the desegregation of some lunch counters after the Christmas shopping rush.

The Memphis operation was an interesting example of initial school desegregation with a minimum of preparation or of previous notice to the public. A desegregation order had been sought by Negroes in the federal district court, which had approved the state pupil placement law and left the matter there; the Negroes had appealed. The court of appeals nearly a year later was to rule that the pupil placement law would "not serve as a plan to convert a biracial system into a nonracial one," and to call for "some realistic plan." But the school board did not wait for the federal court ruling.

During September 1961, the support of the political and civic leadership and the press was secured in behind-the-scenes meetings and brief statements conveyed the suggestion that some desegregation was in the offing. But no public announcement was made that desegregation would take place at a certain time. At a press briefing the evening before the event the president of the school board made it clear that full coverage was desired afterward, but pledged the press to withhold public announcement until the children entered school the following morning, October 3. Neither reporters nor spectators were allowed in school areas for the first few days, though a press headquarters set up across the street from the school board offices was relayed information as fast as it came in from the schools and police. Thus thirteen Negro children quietly entered previously all-white public schools, the news went out to the city and the nation, and Memphis's "breakthrough" was accomplished.

Chapter 16

Deliberate Speed

The year 1962 saw again an extension of public school desegregation, registering statistically a further acceleration of progress. In Texas some 1,700 more Negro children were admitted to schools with whites, bringing the total in that state to approximately 6,700. In the ten other Southern states (or seven, excluding Mississippi, Alabama and South Carolina -- which had yet to take the first step) the total number of Negro school children integrated with white pupils approximately doubled ~~in 1962~~, rising from 2,603 to 5,317. And in May 1962, on the eighth anniversary of the Brown decision, the South's public schools had completed their first year without violence since that event. Though threats and jeering crowds accompanied desegregated school openings in the fall in New Orleans, in Pensacola, Florida and in Chattanooga, Tennessee, no major public disorder occurred in this phase of the civil rights movement through the remainder of 1962.

Public school desegregation was still a relentless objective, but it was not now the chief concern of Negro leaders, or the focus of national attention in the race relations field. An upheaval of history-making proportions occurred at the university level; and other sensational news was furnished by gestures of Negro protest, often unavailing, against discrimination in voter registration, employment and public accommodations, and the often arrogant and violent white response. The Negro revolt was gathering momentum, but still smoldering -- not yet ready to blaze across the nation as it would a year later -- and the gravity of the situation was sensed by only a small, though an increasing number of observers.

The Supreme Court's Brown decision had presented an acute challenge to the Roman Catholic hierarchy in the South. Except in Louisiana and parts of Texas, Catholics were a tiny minority in this region. A few Negro communicants worshipped along with whites in Catholic churches in all sections. But Catholic parochial schools -- a huge school system in Southern Louisiana and scattered schools in other Southern states -- had been racially segregated like the public schools. Several Southern bishops acted before the Supreme Court decision was handed down; the few Catholic schools in North Carolina (Raleigh diocese) were desegregated and announcement was made that those in Virginia (Richmond diocese) would be desegregated the following September. The substantial parochial school system of San Antonio, Texas, was desegregated with the 1954-1955 school term. At the beginning of 1962 some Catholic school desegregation had taken place in all but the Deep South states of Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama and Georgia. During the fall of that year race barriers were eliminated in most of the Georgia and Louisiana parochial schools, or in the diocesan schools of Atlanta and New Orleans.

In both of these dioceses the church was somewhat embarrassed by postponement after earlier announcements of forthcoming desegregation, and by the fact that action was taken in this area of morality and conscience only after the public school authorities had already moved. The variety of apprehensions and difficulties which caused the delay included untimely illness of the responsible prelate in each instance -- Bishop Francis E. Hyland of Atlanta and the aged Archbishop Joseph Francis Rummel of New Orleans. In 1962 two vigorous and younger men took hold: the archdiocese of Atlanta was established under Archbishop Paul J. Hallinan and Archbishop John Patrick Cody assumed the responsibility of apostolic administrator in New Orleans. In September 1962, seventeen Negro pupils were admitted to predominantly white parochial schools in Atlanta, Marietta and Athens, Georgia, entirely without incident.

The desegregation of the immense parochial school system of New Orleans aroused spectacular and much publicized opposition, but no violence, and no major interruption in school operation. Racial distinctions were eliminated in all the 164 schools of the archdiocese; the tangible effect in September 1962 was the enrollment of 173 Negro children in thirty-five predominantly white parochial schools. (The archdiocese extending beyond Orleans Parish, nine of the schools, receiving thirty-seven Negro children, were in neighboring parishes or counties.) In addition to many of the difficulties which confronted public school authorities in desegregation, the administrators of church schools were apprehensive of the effect upon Catholic loyalties and the voluntary contributions upon which the costly parochial school system so much depends. However, the desegregated schools of the New Orleans archdiocese enrolled 73,433 pupils as compared with 75,796 the previous year; and church attendance and contributions were little affected.

The tension in New Orleans was increased by a drastic extension at the same time of the desegregation program in the public schools. The latter, which had integrated only twelve Negro pupils with whites the previous year, in 1962 admitted 107 Negro children to the first three grades of nineteen predominantly white schools. But, although shrill voices of opposition were heard, segregationist rallies were poorly attended and at both public and parochial schools disorders were relatively insignificant. The city had developed a notable aversion to violence and turmoil.

The Catholic desegregation operation in New Orleans, however, was not without some widely publicized unpleasantness, and resistance in one section. Following the announcement on March 27 that segregation in the schools of the archdiocese would end the following September, vehement denunciations were heard from some Catholic segregationist leaders. Three of them, the millionaire politician Leander H. Perez; Jackson G. Rieau, a Citizens' Council director; and Mrs. B. J. Gaillot, Jr., who headed a thing called "Save Our Nation, Inc.," were excommunicated. Mrs. Gaillot picketed Archbishop Rummel's residence, submitted that 85-year-old prelate to an embarrassing encounter and received much attention from press and television in her insistence that segregation was decreed in the Bible as the will of God. In September Perez exerted economic and other pressures to frustrate the desegregation program in the area of his political control. Scattered boycotts reduced parochial school enrollment by 1,100 in Jefferson Parish, and one school in the town of Buras, which formerly served 340 white students, was left with no pupils at all when five Negro children withdrew.

Space

In the matter of public school desegregation a pattern had developed that separated eight Southern states from the other three almost as sharply as the attitude of the border states separated those from the eleven former Confederate states. In Mississippi, Alabama and South Carolina -- after school-opening for the ninth term since the practice had been pronounced unconstitutional -- public schools were still completely segregated. Moreover, these were the three states where Negroes were most numerous in proportion to total population; these accounted for 800,000 Negro school children, or one fourth of the total in the Southern and border region combined. In South Carolina a certain mitigation of the determination to resist desegregation at all costs was discernible in 1962. But Mississippi and Alabama were firmly in the grip of hostile elements; resistance in those two states was encouraged by reckless political leaders and supported by all of the machinery of public administration.

The other eight Southern states had not gone far in complying with the Supreme Court ruling, but they had reached a point on the road which was significant in several respects. In these the policy that had been called of "massive resistance" had completely collapsed; resistance on the part of governors and legislatures had practically ceased; and a mass of anti-integration legislation had been repealed or invalidated by federal courts. Although a state board still went through the motions of pupil assignment in Virginia school districts in these states were in effect free from state government restraint and each was left to deal with its own problem. District school authorities on their part sought to postpone action and hold desegregation to a minimum, but they no longer flatly resisted the change. Public opinion had also changed; and the change was discernible chiefly in these eight states. A Gallup Poll had asked Southerners early in 1961 whether the day would ever come when schools, restaurants, et cetera would be desegregated, and 76 per cent had answered, "Yes;" in 1957 only 45 per cent had answered that question in the affirmative. In the eight states the public had become largely resigned to a degree of adjustment, and the admission of Negroes to a school with whites was no longer an excuse for violence or even a signal for spectacular demonstrations. Two or three Negro children, or maybe half a dozen or a score, in each case were admitted to more previously all-white schools every year; the initial integration starts were steadily expanded; and the process could be expected to go on and on with increasing momentum.

Yet in its larger context the scale of the whole operation was almost microscopic. The presence of less than thirteen thousand Negro pupils in schools with whites at the end of the ninth year was a feeble response to a Supreme Court ruling which required that the stigma of segregation should be lifted from the 2,803,882 Negro children in Southern schools. If the speed of school desegregation had increased, it was from that of the snail to that of the tortoise. In fact, many white Southerners, finding total segregation no longer possible, had seized upon the compromise of token integration as a means of removing federal court pressure while prolonging general segregation for an indefinite period. "Tokenism" was decried by liberals as more a frustration of the intent of the Brown decision than a stage of gradualism in compliance with it.

There was evidence, too, of growing impatience on the part of federal courts. Pupil assignment (or "pupil placement") laws, which fixed rigid criteria -- not applied to whites -- for Negro pupils seeking admission to predominantly white schools had been relied upon heavily to keep integration at token levels. The Sixth Circuit Court ruled in a Memphis case in March 1962: "The Pupil Assignment Law might serve some purpose in the administration of a school system, but it will not serve to convert a bi-racial system into a non-racial one."[1] In August the Fifth Circuit Court said in a New Orleans case: "This court, like the district court, condemns the Pupil Placement Act, when, with a fanfare of trumpets, it is hailed as the instrument for carrying out a desegregation plan while all the time the entire public knows that in fact it is being used to maintain segregation by allowing a little token desegregation.... It is not a plan for desegregation at all."[2]

In the early national discussion of the problems posed by the Brown decision the suggestion was frequently made that bi-racial schools in the South should be segregated by sex. It was believed that placing boys and girls in separate schools would allay the fears which preyed upon so many white Southerners that school integration would result in interracial romances and marriages. Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt was among those who advanced this proposal. Bills providing for school segregation by sex were introduced in a number of state legislatures, and one was passed by the legislature of Florida. The plan was suggested by several federal district judges, including Judge J. Skelly Wright, of New Orleans. But, excepting the anomalous case of half a dozen first graders during the first year of integration in New Orleans, it was nowhere put into effect. The departure from the existing coeducational system would have been onerous and costly. Most white Southerners at first were in no mood to consider so drastic a reorganization to safeguard a move which they were adamantly determined not to make; when desegregation began, their chief concern was to hold it to what they considered an innocuous minimum; and after a few years of experience with Negroes and whites in school together, the fear of resulting interracial marriages tended to subside. In the border states fears on this score were never sufficiently strong to cause serious consideration to be given to pupil segregation by sex.

A comprehensive study of the problem of converting high schools to all-boy and all-girl schools was made by Superintendent O. Perry Walker and submitted without recommendation to the school board of Orleans Parish on February 12, 1963. The report noted that the change in the thirty high schools of that parish would necessitate approximately doubling attendance districts with proportionately increased transportation problems; that it would require reorganization of classes where courses were favored mainly by students of one sex, with the denial of courses to girls, or to boys, when they were too few to form a class of their own sex; that over 600 teachers would have to be transferred; and that moving vocational shops from girls' to boys' schools and home economics equipment from boys' to girls' schools and various structural changes in schools would cost approximately $250,000. Walker's research revealed that of 25,000 high schools in the United States only 24 are attended by boys only or girls only, and these were outside of the South.

Not only in the South, but in the whole broad region, including the border states, where public schools were segregated at the time of the Brown decision, the fate of the 75,000 Negro schoolteachers posed a delicate and baffling problem. Teacher segregation no less than the segregation of pupils was a denial of equality under the law, but most white Southerners recoiled from the idea of having their children taught by Negroes even more than from the presence of Negro children in a schoolroom with them. In many quarters in the South the dilemma of Negro schoolteachers was hopefully expected to prevent Negroes from pressing for public school desegregation; for it was assumed as a certainty that the change would close to thousands of educated Negroes the only remunerative and respectable career open to them. The same thought was present in a lesser degree in the border states. Even in the long-integrated public schools of the North far fewer Negro teachers were employed in proportion to the Negro pupils enrolled than in the segregated schools of the South. It is noteworthy, however, that Negro schoolteachers in the South, whose jobs were thus in jeopardy, made no significant effort to arrest the desegregation movement and, indeed, often risked reprisal to further it.

Negroes did not press for desegregation of teacher or other personnel in the earlier cases, and federal courts in the South tended to defer the question until pupil desegregation should pass the token stage. In reviewing the negative action of a federal district court on a petition for relief against discriminatory assignment of teachers, principals and other school personnel in Escambia County, Florida, the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals ruled July 24, 1962 that "the district court may well decide to postpone the consideration and determination of that question until the desegregation of the pupils has either been accomplished or has made substantial progress."[3] A month later a district court ordered the Duval County school board to submit a plan for both pupil desegregation and the elimination of discrimination in teacher assignment by the following October; but the court noted that this latter problem "may well require additional study to prepare, and longer time to put into effect"[4] — an observation which has proved an understatement.

The limited pupil desegregation in the eleven Southern states — generally placing less than a dozen Negro pupils in a classroom with whites — has as yet displaced only a few Negro teachers. Most of these were in Texas. In 1962, 125 Negro teaching positions had been abolished in that state, and three in Tennessee, while only faint moves had been made toward teacher desegregation in either state. A beginning was made, however, in Arlington County, Virginia, where the integration of the small Negro minority was practically complete, when teaching positions were opened to Negroes for the summer session of 1963.

In the District of Columbia the school authorities ceased making any distinction on account of race in the hiring or assigning of teachers at the beginning of pupil desegregation. Steps had been taken in that direction in each of the six border states, but many Negro teachers had been displaced; an estimated four hundred had lost their jobs in Oklahoma. On the other hand, in Kentucky a score of districts were employing Negroes on biracial faculties and the number was increasing; in Missouri the desegregated school systems of St. Louis and Kansas City were employing more Negro teachers than in 1954 and had absorbed approximately 150 of those dismissed in smaller communities. Maryland had accomplished the desegregation of nearly all of its school districts without displacing any Negro teachers, 1,500 of whom were teaching on predominantly white faculties in that state.[5]

In the early 1960's the nation witnessed a new agitation in the civil rights field -- it came as a surprise to most people -- a campaign against racial segregation in the public schools of cities outside of the South. The 1960 census showed that 48 per cent of the Negroes in the United States now resided outside of the eleven former Confederate states. The largest concentrations of Negroes were not in Atlanta or New Orleans, but in the big cities of the North and West; New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, Detroit, Los Angeles, Baltimore and Cleveland each had a larger Negro population than any Southern city.

The city of New York contained more Negroes than the state of Virginia. In these non-Southern cities public schools were nominally integrated; in most of them segregation had been prohibited by law or public policy since long before the Brown decision, in some, from time immemorial. But with the great increase in their Negro population, which was generally concentrated in Negro neighborhoods, much actual, or de facto, public school segregation had developed. Beyond the residential factor, the trend had been aided by some gerrymandering of districts and arbitrary pupil assignment by school administrators.

The Commission on Civil Rights reported in 1961: "Public schools enrolling Negroes almost exclusively in some cases, and whites almost exclusively in others, are found in many cities of the North and West. ....A 1960 report of the board of education of New York City reported that about one-fifth of the New York City elementary and junior high schools enrolled 85 per cent or more Negro and Puerto Rican pupils, while 48 per cent of the elementary and 44 per cent of the junior high schools enrolled 85 per cent or more white pupils. Philadelphia reported that 14 per cent of its schools had an enrollment of 99-plus per cent Negro. In Pittsburgh in 1959, half of the Negro children in public schools attended schools which had 80 per cent or more Negro enrollment...." Other non-Southern cities mentioned with high racial concentrations in public schools included Los Angeles, Pasadena, Detroit, Boston, Chicago, Indianapolis and Cleveland.[6]

In addition to the social and psychological disadvantages of segregation, these virtually Negro schools were more often overcrowded and inferior to the predominantly white schools in instructional offering and physical plant. The NAACP's 1961 national convention in Philadelphia called on its branches "to insure the end of all segregated public education in fact or by law." The Southern School News of April 1962 reported that Negroes had filed lawsuits against fourteen school districts in nine non-Southern states, and that formal protests had been made in at least as many more. Public demonstrations and sit-ins had also occurred on this front.

New York City, which now contained over a million Negroes -- and where Negroes were more articulate and more powerful politically than anywhere else in the nation -- moved earliest and most drastically in this field. The New York City board of education declared in December 1954 that it recognized the Supreme Court's Brown decision "as a decision which applies not only to those cases in litigation, but also as a challenge to boards of education throughout the nation, in Northern as well as Southern communities, to re-examine the racial composition of the schools within their respective systems in order to determine whether they conform to the standards stated clearly by that court.... Public education in a racially homogeneous setting is socially unrealistic and blocks the attainment of the goals of democratic education whether this segregation occurs by law or by fact...." Planning remedial steps began at once, and the problem remained a major concern of New York school authorities over the ten-year period.[7] By 1963, 64,000 Negro children had been transferred from nearly all-Negro schools near home to schools in white neighborhoods. Their daily transportation for the greater distance required 81 additional buses at an estimated annual cost of $684,000. Yet in the context of New York's 1,053,000 pupils the correction of racial imbalance in the public schools of that metropolis was still insignificant.[8]

Generally, the idea of achieving a "racial balance" in the public schools by transferring pupils to schools outside of their residential neighborhoods raised delicate social and legal, as well as financial problems. Redistribution could be accomplished at some expense by sending Negroes away to predominantly white schools and reducing the school plant in Negro neighborhoods. The evil could be mitigated by having schools serve fewer grades and larger attendance areas or by placing schools near the border line between white and Negro neighborhoods. But to bring large numbers of white children away from their friends and neighbors to offset the racial imbalance in schools of Negro neighborhoods was all but impossible; the suggestion of such a move aroused bitter white resentment. Many voices rose in defense of the principle of the neighborhood school. A federal district court, in an opinion of January 29, 1963, in the case of Bell v. School City of Gary (Indiana)[9] noted that "the financial burden of transporting 6,000 students from their home neighborhood to another would be a matter of considerable concern to the administration of an already heavily taxed and indebted school district.... Furthermore, requiring certain students to leave their neighborhoods and friends and be transferred to another school miles away, while other students, similarly situated, remained in the neighborhood school, simply for the purpose of balancing the races in the various schools, would in my opinion be indeed a violation of the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment."

The lengthy opinion in that case, in which one hundred Negro children complained of de facto segregation, gives an illuminating picture of the problem that had arisen in many Northern cities. Gary offered a striking example of segregation in practice in an area where segregation not only was barred by the Supreme Court decision, but had been expressly prohibited earlier by state law. Incidentally, the school board of Gary, which was in effect the defendant in the suit, was headed by a Negro, Dr. Leroy W. Bingham, and the school administration was thoroughly integrated: one of three assistant superintendents, the coordinator of secondary education and several other principal executives were Negroes.

"In the school year 1961-1962, 10,710 of the students enrolled in the Gary school system attended fourteen schools which were 100 per cent white; 16,242 students attended twelve schools which were populated from 99 to 100 per cent by Negroes; 6,981 students attended five schools which were from 77 to 95 per cent Negro; 4,066 attended four schools which had a range from 13 to 37 per cent Negro; 5,465 attended five schools which had a Negro population from one to five per cent."

Thus a large majority of Gary's 23,000 Negro pupils were almost completely segregated. The total Negro population of 70,000 in Gary was concentrated in one section, comprising about one-third of the area of the city. The school administration was sorely-pressed to provide schools for a city that had grown in population in ten years from 133,911 to 178,320. As the most rapid population growth was among the Negroes, schools in the Negro section were the first to be overcrowded, but more schools were being built for them and a number of Negro pupils had been transferred to predominantly white schools. "From a consideration of all the evidence and the record," the court could not "see that the Board of Education has deliberately or purposely segregated the Gary schools according to race."

"The problem in Gary," Judge George N. Beamer said, "is not one of segregated schools but rather one of segregated housing. Either by choice or design, the Negro population of Gary is concentrated in the so-called central area, and as a result the schools in that area are populated by Negro students...."

The first litigation to draw widespread attention to the problem of de facto school segregation was that of Taylor v. Board of Education of New Rochelle (New York) where a federal district court in 1961 found deliberate gerrymandering and ordered remedial action: the result was a plan of optional transfer of Negro pupils to schools with a larger representation of white pupils. In that case the court declared: "The neighborhood school policy certainly is not sacrosanct. It is valid only insofar as it is operated within the confines established by the Constitution. It cannot be used to confine Negroes within an area artificially delineated in the first instance by official acts."[10] In another case, that of Branche v. Board of Education, of Hempstead, New York, a federal court had ruled in April 1962 that the educational system must deal with the inadequacy arising from adventitious segregation...." The question of the propriety of a public school's adherence to the segregated racial pattern of its neighborhood has not been passed upon by the Supreme Court.

De facto school segregation was among the major Negro grievances the one that was least understood by the general public. Many who sympathized with Negro aims in general felt that some of the pressure in this area was unreasonable, or misdirected. Residential segregation was the basic evil, and any feasible measures of relief would barely scratch the surface until this larger problem had been met.

De facto school segregation was but one manifestation of the cancerous blight of the ghetto. Here was an evil -- the denial of housing to Negroes outside of already established Negro districts -- that cried imperatively for national attention. The rapid migration of Negroes from South to North and from country to city was crowding the urban neighborhoods that custom and prejudice had allotted to them. For a Negro to rent or purchase a home in a white residential area was often difficult if not impossible. Negro "intruders" in a white neighborhood were sometimes harassed and threatened or even attacked by mobs. An embarrassing example of the effects of this discrimination against Negroes was the plight of diplomatic personnel coming to the nation's capital from African countries. The Department of State reported in 1963 that of 35 nonwhite diplomats from twenty nations who had requested its help in finding houses during eight months of the previous year, 34 had been turned away from houses or apartment buildings in Washington because of their color and twelve had not found suitable housing by the end of the year.

Historically, Americans of German, Irish, Italian, Polish and other foreign origin had experienced a degree of residential segregation following waves of immigration to this country. But the condition of these Caucasian immigrants was not static; after a generation or two they moved into the mainstream of American life. Negroes were chained to the ghetto by their color; after three centuries the color of their skin was still a cruel and unrelenting barrier to assimilation. Meanwhile the squalid and congested ghetto was a center of cultural stagnation and a breeding place for vice and crime as well as racial discontent.

In employment discrimination against the Negro was to be found virtually everywhere -- except in some categories of government jobs. More than one out of every ten Negro workers in the United States was unemployed; among white workers only one out of twenty was without a job. Some labor unions, notably in the building trades, excluded Negroes from membership, thus barring them completely in "closed shop" situations from work. Large categories of the higher and better paid positions were practically closed to Negroes regardless of the applicant's competence.

Humiliation and oppression of the Negro, of course, were not new, despite some modern variations. The picture had been familiar to Negro Americans all their lives, and to their fathers before them. It was not out of a sudden desperation that the protest of the 1960's arose. What was discernible among Negroes in the sit-ins and Freedom Rides, the parades and picket lines, the youths huddled in patrol wagons on their way to jail, singing "We Shall Overcome" was the beginning of a powerful awakening of the human spirit, with incalculable possibilities for both the near term and the long future. White Americans still saw the picture only dimly; comparatively few would have admitted in 1962 that any group in this land was oppressed. The word "oppression," now beginning to be used here and there, had an unfamiliar and an alien ring with reference to the United States.

The prevention of Negroes from voting in some sections of the South was one of the most brazen forms of discrimination. This received major attention during 1962. Leading civil rights organizations, with substantial financial backing from national philanthropic foundations, united in a Voter Education Project to train Negroes in the complexities of registration in hostile communities and encourage them to vote. The drive was attended by much white harassment, considerable police brutality and occasional violence, including the burning of three Negro churches. The Department of Justice moved at the same time to protect the voting rights of Negroes; the total number of counties in which the Department had taken action, ranging from inspection of records to lawsuits, increased from 30 at the beginning of the Kennedy Administration to 115.[12] As a result of these activities, Negroes began to register and vote in many districts where the privilege had been denied them by intimidation and trickery.

Promising to remove one obstacle to Negro voting, Congress also on August 27 initiated the procedure for a constitutional amendment abolishing the poll tax; this fee of several dollars was still exacted in five Southern states as a prerequisite to voting, largely with a view to deterring Negroes from exercising the franchise.

Negroes now held a slightly larger percentage of all federal government jobs than the Negro percentage of the total population, though in the better-paid positions the Negro percentage was much smaller. President Kennedy had said on March 6, 1961: "I have dedicated my Administration to the cause of equal opportunity in employment by the Government or its contractors." The firms with government contracts of various kinds represented a vast segment of the nation's industry. The President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity, which he set up -- headed by Vice President Lyndon Johnson -- moved more vigorously in both these fields than any similar body had done before. The desegregation of the Armed Forces since President Truman's executive order of 1948 was the most successful exhibit of integration in the history of interracial relations; President Kennedy, in June 1962, appointed a Committee on Equal Opportunity in the Armed Forces to ferret out lingering vestiges of discrimination in that quarter and to investigate the hardships imposed upon Negro service men by the discriminatory practices of civilian communities near military posts.

The Department of Health, Education and Welfare had been strangely oblivious hitherto of the requirement that all segregation in public education should be ended. On March 30, 1962, that department gave an effective fillip to public school desegregation in the South with the announcement that some federal financial assistance would be withheld from school districts which continued to practice segregation after September 1963. The schools affected were those receiving federal aid because they served large numbers of children of military or other federal government personnel; if necessary, the commissioner of education would be "authorized to make provision for the education of children on a nonsegregated basis on federal property or make other suitable arrangements."

An increasing volume of peripheral attacks was chipping at the structure of injustice to the Negro minority.

Unprecedented concern was being displayed by the federal government, also by some state and city governments and by the press and the clergy. Yet "unprecedented" meant little in relation to the magnitude of the problem which was beginning to unfold.

Chapter 17

Ole Miss

The last three states maintaining complete segregation in public education yielded at the university level -- Mississippi in the fall of 1962, South Carolina in January, and Alabama in June, of 1963. Resistance at the University of Mississippi reached the proportions of an insurrection, which was suppressed by military force. Its grim reverberations had an undoubtedly sobering effect when the crisis came to the other two states. At Clemson University in South Carolina the critical aspect had virtually ended when the moment of desegregation arrived; Clemson accepted its first Negro student in an atmosphere of complete decorum and without interference from any quarter. At the University of Alabama gestures of defiance on the part of the governor of that state caused widespread anxiety, police and military precautions were taken and the outcome was awaited breathlessly by the nation; but the resistance there proved limited to the governor's own brief melodrama and no violence or harassment was directed at the three Negro students who enrolled.

The desegregation crisis at the University of Mississippi, both in its constitutional significance and in the magnitude of the upheaval was the gravest that has occurred since the Brown decision. The convulsion was in no sense a race riot. The presence of a single Negro was the casus belli, and he was later to suffer ostracism and abuse. But the Negro was out of sight while the bloody battle raged. The enemy was the Government of the United States, and the targets of the mob's fury were its marshals and soldiers. It was the most serious challenge to the Federal Union since the Civil War, resolutely met first with an inadequate force of federal deputy marshals and then with overwhelming military strength. The Chattanooga Times, a Southern newspaper, voiced the sentiment of millions throughout the land when it said: "It must never happen again."

Though Mississippi had furnished none of the major crises of desegregation, we have visited that state frequently in the pages of this book. We have examined race prejudice, oppression of the Negro, resentment of the Brown decision, unwillingness to discuss desegregation or to permit discussion of it, alienation from the mainstream of national life and hostility toward the federal government; all these phenomena were more pronounced in Mississippi than in any other state. If there had been fewer sensational explosions in Missippi it was attributable not to interracial amity, but to the ferocity with which "white supremacy" was maintained in that state and to the submission of its intimidated Negro minority.

The most widely publicized incident in Mississippi since the "wolf-whistle murder" of Emmet Till, had been the lynching of another Negro, Mack Charles Parker at Poplarville in April 1959. Parker, awaiting trial on a rape charge, was beaten and dragged from the county jail by fifteen or more masked men and killed. No one was punished for the deed. Few doubted that other Negroes had been done to death by white men in Mississippi in obscure circumstances. The press reported briefly the fatal shooting of the Negro Herbert Lee in September 1961 by a member of the state Legislature. Lee had been active in a voter registration movement. A coroner's jury found that the act was committed to prevent a threatened attack and called it "justifiable homicide."

The Citizens' Council movement, which was fading in 1962 in most of the South, was still flourishing in Mississippi. The Council dominated the politics and, to a large extent, the business community of the state, as well as the lives of individual citizens. Judge Brady's Black Monday had ceased to be the Citizens' Council handbook, and was in fact out of print. The increasingly status-seeking Council -- and the state administration -- had adopted a more polished exposition of racism entitled Race and Reason, by a Northern writer, Carleton Putnam. Soon after Putnam's book appeared, the author was honored at a banquet under Citizens' Council auspices in Jackson, attended by the highest Mississippi dignitaries. The governor issued a solemn proclamation which, after a series of whereases, said:

> Now, therefore, I Ross R. Barnett, Governor of the State of Mississippi, do hereby proclaim that Thursday, October 26, 1961, is and shall be known as "Race and Reason Day," and hereby urge the people of Mississippi to observe this occasion by reading and discussing "Race and Reason," calling the book to the attention of friends and relatives in the North, and by participating in appropriate public functions, thereby expressing the appreciation of the people in our state for Mr. Carleton Putnam and for his splendid book "Race and Reason."

Ross Barnett had been elected governor in 1959, to succeed the relatively moderate Coleman. Unlike his predecessor, Barnett wooed the Citizens' Council and made it all but a part of his administration. The Council was in fact subsidized, in that the official State Sovereignty Commission contributed regularly to its "Radio and Television forum;" in 1962 it had received over $100,000 of state funds through this arrangement.

A favorite Barnett saying might have been taken right out of a Citizens' Council pamphlet: "The good Lord was the original segregationist. He put the Negro in Africa -- separated him from all other races." Another remark which the governor made repeatedly gave an insight into his thinking as to the efficacy of defiance in checkmating the federal government: "If the Governors of Southern states had gone to Little Rock and congratulated Governor Orval Faubus when he called out the National Guard to prevent school integration, federal troops would never have been sent to that city." He promised again and again that "Ross Barnett will rot in jail before he will let one Negro ever darken the sacred threshold of our white schools." A bumbling, heavy-handed politician of 62, Barnett was the butt of many popular jokes -- as when he had a $10,000 gold-plated bathtub installed in the Governor's Mansion -- but all his bloopers were forgotten when he stood in the breach to stop the federal advance.

Mississippi was out of step in 1962 even with most of the South, not only in industrial progress but in adjustment to the changing order in interracial relations. During the first few years after the Brown decision the attitude of Miss~~i~~ssippi was not strikingly different from that of the other ten former Confederate states. In 1962 Mississippians still liked to identify themselves with "the embattled South" and constantly referred to their fight as "the Southern fight." But in the matter of resistance to the federal court desegregation rulings the state's position now was more like that of a Casabianca on the deck of a burning ship whence all but Mississippi -- and Alabama -- had fled.

Confederate flags were to be seen almost everywhere that people gathered in Mississippi; many were displayed on automobiles and in front of homes, shops and local government offices. Confederate Army caps were worn by thousands of Mississippi youths and full Confederate Army uniforms were often donned on festive occasions. Mississippi had given the Confederate States of America its president, Jefferson Davis. It was then a proud and prosperous state, one of the richest.

A century later it was still a proud state, but it was the poorest in the Union. Its per capita income in 1961 was $1,229, when the national average was $2,263. Negroes, formerly a majority, were now 42 per cent of its population of 2,178,141. The median annual family income of its whites was $4,209 and of its Negroes, $1,444. The population was predominantly rural; Jackson, the capital, had grown in twenty years from a city of 40,000 people to one of 150,000, but no other town in the state was as much as one-third that size. In spite of dramatic expansion of its public school system during the 1950's, Mississippi had the third highest illiteracy rate in the nation, 4.9 per cent; 119,741 of its Negroes and 40,274 of its whites were considered functionally illiterate. Only the boldest Negroes in the most tolerant white communities dared to exercise the franchise. More than 95 per cent of the whites -- but less than 2 per cent of the Negroes -- over twenty years of age were registered voters.

Mississippi had produced literary celebrities. Among the writers who still made the state their home were the Hodding Carters, father and son, Eudora Welty and, until his death in July 1962, William Faulkner, a winner of the Nobel Prize. An extraordinary number of native Mississippians had left the state and achieved distinction -- often with liberal identification -- elsewhere. Conspicuous among these were Turner Catledge, managing editor of the New York Times, Mark F. Ethridge, publisher of the Louisville Courier Journal and Buford Ellington, the incumbent governor of Tennessee. Two other Mississippi exiles of renown were the crooner Elvis Presley and -- a matter of embarrassment to the white supremacists -- the internationally acclaimed Negro opera-singer, Leontyne Price.

Many young men left Mississippi every year for more promising fields. Calculations made over a five-year period showed that 33 per cent of the graduates of the four white state institutions of higher learning were leaving the state after graduation. Among Mississippi Negroes, teaching jobs in Negro schools were holding many college graduates, but tens of thousands of others were emigrating every year. The 990,282 Negro residents counted in the 1960 census were 69,687 less than in 1950; the total population of the state had declined by 773 persons.

Against these statistical generalizations it should be noted that there were gleaming new buildings here and there in Mississippi and evidences of industrial awakening. Indeed, along the Gulf Coast the space age had intruded: nuclear submarines were being built for the United States Navy at Pascagoula and the National Aeronautics and Space Administration had purchased a 13,000-acre site for testing moon-rocket engines.

Nor was Mississippi a monolith in its attitude toward race relations reform. The phenomenon was observable generally in the South that, when the preponderance of hostile elements reaches a certain point, the minority favoring moderation and adjustment disappeared from view. But it did not cease to exist. Traveling in Mississippi in 1962 I was astonished at the number of prominent individuals who, in the privacy of country homes or quiet offices, expressed apprehension over the anti-integration furor and the dangerous course upon which their state was set. These people were benumbed by the thought that any gesture of opposition would be futile and by fear of the consequences for themselves, their families and their businesses. Most of the Mississippi press followed the popular anti-Negro, anti-integration and anti-federal government line. But the State Times in Jackson dissented cautiously until it found itself obliged to cease publication at the end of 1961. Some smaller newspapers counseled moderation with varying emphasis, notably the Hodding Carters' Delta Democrat-Times in Greenville, the Pascagoula Chronicle, the McComb Enterprise-Journal and the Tupelo Times. Mrs. Hazel Brannon Smith suffered continual persecution as a result of her bold voice of protest in the weekly Lexington Advertiser.

The University of Mississippi, established in 1844, occupies a group of stately old buildings, and several of recent construction, on a campus, comprising one square mile of tree-shaded land near the town of Oxford, 150 miles north of Jackson. (Oxford was the home, incidentally, of William Faulkner -- an alumnus of the university -- and the town figures in spirit in many of Faulkner's novels. During the Civil War, the ancient administration building, or the Lyceum -- on whose floors a hundred wounded federal marshals were to lie on the morning of October 1, 1962 -- had served at times as a hospital for both Confederate and Union soldiers. A cemetery along the campus' southern boundary held seven hundred Confederate dead. In 1854 Chancellor Frederick A. P. Barnard, in laying a broad plan before its board of trustees had listed among the university's various purposes "to determine the respectability of the state in the eyes of mankind."

"Ole Miss," as it was called with affection by many, had been known best in recent years for the pulchritude of its women students and the prowess of its football heroes. Its football team, nicknamed the "Rebels," was every year one for the mightiest to reckon with; Ole Miss co-eds had won the title of "Miss America" in both 1959 and 1960. The university's academic contribution, however, was not without merit. Although its record of freshman failures was high, Ole Miss graduates did very well. They had won more Rhodes scholarships than the graduates of any other Southern university except one. In spite of the racist cloud which hung low over Mississippi and the unattractive pay -- an annual average faculty salary of $6,863, the university had drawn a number of professors of high caliber, and most of them chose to stay with Ole Miss through the tribulations which beset it. In the wave of repression of liberal discussion, the university -- a state institution with its appropriations controlled by politicians -- walked a painful tightrope. Chancellor

John D. Williams and Dean Robert Farley of the law school had battled frequently against fierce Citizens' Council and political pressure to save liberal members of the university's faculty.

The students of Ole Miss, who numbered 4,638, had lived in an atmosphere of intensified racist indoctrination and defiance of federal authority for eight years -- most of them since their earliest teens. It would take little to set them on fire. Yet, on the other hand, under a clear policy of restraint on the part of state authorities and with the exercise of normal discipline, these volatile youths could have been held in check. When I visited Ole Miss in late 1961 and early 1962, few doubted that the next few months would bring a federal court order to enroll a Negro student. The prospect was seldom absent from the thoughts of administrators and professors; many plans and possibilities were privately explored. Their chief sources of uneasiness were not the Ole Miss students, but the reckless bravado of the state's political leaders and the fear that throngs of extremists would invade the university.

The Negro around whom the battle of Ole Miss was fought was a quietly determined young man of 29, meticulous in his manners and his dress. Five days before the explosion the Washington Post said: "While the tumult rages all about him, while lawyers argue and judges rule, while governors fulminate and legislatures prate, one man in Mississippi -- James Meredith, a central actor in the drama being played there -- awaits his cue to walk upon the stage with silence and dignity and fortitude." He would play his part that way.

Meredith was born in Kosciusko, Mississippi, a town where he himself says the Negroes "might be a little more progressive than elsewhere in the state." After finishing high school, he served for nine years, becoming a staff sergeant, in the United States Air Force -- which was by then racially integrated -- and returned to Mississippi in 1960. Writing in the Saturday Evening Post of November 10, 1962, Meredith said: "I entered Jackson State College, a Negro school in Jackson, and quickly met other students who felt as I did -- that Negroes in Mississippi did not have the rights of full citizens, including the right to the best education the state offered. Someone had to seek admission to the University of Mississippi, and I decided to do so...." In January 1961 he applied for admission to Ole Miss. When his application was rejected ~~as expected~~, he sought the legal help of the NAACP, and in May a suit was filed in the federal district court.

In the sixteen months of litigation that followed, the state and the university used every conceivable argument and subterfuge. In bland contradiction of the screaming affirmations of Mississippi's immutable policy, they contended that racial segregation did not in fact exist at Ole Miss. They held that the Negro applicant was unqualified for reasons mainly related to his character and intelligence, which they assiduously assailed. However, the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals on June 25 found that Meredith's application "was turned down solely because he was a Negro," and directed the lower court to order him enrolled.

After the appeals court order had been repeatedly stayed and the stays had been repeatedly vacated, Federal District Judge S. C. Mize on September 13 finally enjoined the University from denying admission to the applicant or "discriminating against him in any way whatsoever because of his race."

Governor Barnett immediately invoked the battered doctrine of interposition, directing the Mississippi officials concerned "to interpose the state sovereignty and themselves between the people of the state and any body politic seeking to usurp such power." In a radio-television broadcast he called upon "all public officials, both elected and appointed, in the State of Mississippi to join hands with the people and resist by every legal and constitutional means the tyrannical edicts which have been and will be directed against the patriotic citizens of our state."

September 20 was a crowded day in the frantic obstructionist maneuvers. All in one day: a state court issued an injunction forbidding "any act intending to enroll and register the Negro, James Meredith....;" the state legislature enacted a law prohibiting the enrollment at a state university of any student under "a criminal charge of moral turpitude;" the needed charge was furnished in a justice of the peace hearing, where Meredith was convicted of false voter registration; federal courts issued orders, frustrating each of these strategems; and the Board of Trustees of State Institutions of Higher Learning adopted a resolution investing the Governor with "full power, authority, right and discretion of this Board to act upon all matters pertaining to the admission of Meredith to the University of Mississippi."

On September 24, the federal court of appeals ordered the board of trustees to rescind its action placing the Meredith case in the hands of the Governor and to instruct the university officials to admit Meredith. Specifically the order read: "Registrar (Robert Byron) Ellis shall be available at Jackson, Mississippi at the office of the defendant, Board of Trustees, from 1:00 P.M. to 6:00 P.M., September 25, 1962, for the purpose of the registration of the said James H. Meredith...." If Meredith should not appear at that time, the registrar was to be available for the purpose at the university during the usual business hours. The board expressed a willingness to comply, and promptly issued the required instructions.

The same day, Governor Barnett issued a proclamation, directing "that the arrest or attempts to arrest, or the fining or the attempts to fine, of any state official in the performance of his official duties, by any representative of the federal government, is illegal and such representative or representatives of the federal government are to be summarily arrested and jailed...." The university was ringed with state police and a few sheriffs from neighboring counties.

At the early hour of 8:30 A.M. on September 25, the court of appeals issued an order restraining the State of Mississippi, its governor and virtually all state and local officials and police from "interfering with or obstructing by any means or in any manner" Meredith's enrollment.

Here Governor Barnett and Lieutenant Governor Paul B. Johnson -- who now got into the act -- carried their defiance physically to a point that drew convictions for contempt of court, which would be argued for many months to come. As related in the appeals court judgment of September 28:

> 3. At approximately 4:30 P.M. on September 25, 1962, Ross R. Barnett, having full knowledge of the existence and terms of this Court's temporary restraining orders, went to the office of the Board of Trustees of Institutions of Higher Learning in Jackson, Mississippi at a time when James H. Meredith was due to appear at the office and be enrolled as a student in the University of Mississippi, pursuant to the order of this Court. When James H. Meredith arrived at the office and sought to enter for the purpose of enrolling, Ross R. Barnett deliberately prevented him from entering and told him that his application for enrollment was denied by Ross R. Barnett.
> 4. On September 26, 1962, James H. Meredith sought to enter the campus of the University of Mississippi in Oxford, Mississippi. He was prevented from entering by Paul B. Johnson, Jr., Lieutenant Governor of the State of Mississippi, acting pursuant to the instructions and under the authorization of Ross R. Barnett.

The Governor was ordered to pay a fine of $10,000 per day, and the Lieutenant Governor a fine of $5,000 per day, unless by the following Tuesday, October 2, they should demonstrate full compliance with federal court orders and notify all law enforcement officers and other officials under them "to cease forthwith all resistance and interference."

In Jackson Saturday night, September 30, 41,000 spectators, including most of the university population, watched the Ole Miss Rebels defeat the football team of the University of Kentucky. Hundreds of Confederate flags waved. Governor Barnett stood on the field at half time and received a great ovation. It was a moment when, if the Governor had been disposed to accept the inevitable with dignity, a few words of sober counsel might have changed the course of history. He said to the admiring throng: "I love Mississippi!" -- and, after a thunderous response: "I love her people!" -- then, after another roar, and pointedly: "I love our customs!" At this obvious reference to the desegregation crisis the crowd broke into an hysteria that would express itself in bloodshed the following day.

In Washington Attorney General Kennedy, and the President himself, had devoted several tense, gruelling days and much of the night time to the Mississippi problem. They were constantly aided by a Justice Department team of Deputy Attorney General Nicholas B. Katzenbach, Assistant Attorneys General Burke Marshal and Norbert Schlei and Edwin O. Guthman, public information officer. Federal marshals had been assembling daily at Memphis, Tennessee. Military leaders had also been alerted and Secretary of Defense Robert S. McNamara was kept informed.

On Saturday the President and the Attorney General each conferred repeatedly by telephone with Governor Barnett. At 5:45 P.M. the President dispatched a blunt telegram. He asked the Governor whether he would "continue to actively interfere" or whether his law enforcement officers would cooperate "in maintaining law and order and preventing violence in connection with federal enforcement of the court orders." Barnett phoned the White House twice but made no satisfactory reply.

Just after midnight the President issued the kind of proclamation that generally precedes the use of military force in a domestic crisis. In one whereas he noted that "the Governor of the State of Mississippi and certain law enforcement officers and other officials of that State... have been and are willingly obstructing the enforcement of" federal court orders. In another he said: "I have expressly called the attention of the Governor of Mississippi to the perilous situation that exists and to his duties in the premises, and have requested but have not received from him adequate assurances that the orders of the courts of the United States will be obeyed and that law and order will be maintained." He therefore commanded "all persons engaged in such obstruction of justice to cease and desist therefrom and to disperse and retire peacefully forthwith."

In an executive order signed at the same time, the President directed the Secretary of Defense "to use such of the armed forces of the United States as may be necessary," and to call the 11,000 men of the Mississippi National Guard into "the active military service of the United States...."

Sunday morning there were more calls from Governor Barnett to the White House. The Governor suggested that the safest course would be to install Meredith on the campus that same day before nightfall -- ahead of the crowds of angry segregationists, already headed for Oxford, who were expected to converge upon Ole Miss Monday. He said that, if there were a display of federal force, he would see that Meredith was enrolled in the university and his state police would cooperate in maintaining order.

When Meredith arrived on the campus Sunday afternoon, October 1, rioting erupted and a battle raged all night between a Mississippi mob and the Government of the United States. When Monday dawned, two had been killed, 375 had been injured and 200 rioters were federal prisoners; the campus was strewn with wrecked vehicles, hunks of concrete, tear-gas cannisters, fragments of thousands of bottles, and other debris; and several thousand soldiers patrolled the university and the town of Oxford. Military forces, arriving in the early hours of the morning, had rescued four hundred beleaguered federal marshals and 55 men of the Oxford unit of the National Guard from 2,500 rioters and restored order.

The first contingent of 320 federal marshals entered the university campus between 4 and 5 P.M. (CST). They surrounded and took over the Lyceum, the administration building, which became the federal post and was in constant telephone communication with the White House in Washington. Deputy Attorney General Katzenbach, Assistant Attorney General Schlei and Chief United States Marshal James P. McShane were in the party. With a view to diverting violence from him, Meredith, who arrived shortly afterward, was deposited at Baxter Hall on Dormitory Row; he remained there all night -- in fact, went to bed -- well-guarded and little sought after by the rioters. Although the mob, screaming, smashing and burning, surged over the entire campus during the ~~long~~ night, the central and decisive action was the seige of the Lyceum.

The discipline and valor of ~~to~~ federal marshals and their handful of National Guard allies during that long battle averted unquestionably a greater cataclysm. Had they resorted to firearms -- which they were forbidden to do -- the death toll would have been appalling; if they had yielded to the swelling throng of rioters, the ultimate suppression of the uprising might have assumed the proportions of a civil war. The attackers used stones, clubs, iron bars, bricks from construction sites, jagged hunks of concrete from smashed benches, gasoline bombs made of soft drink bottles and some shotguns, pistols and rifles. Just before eight o'clock, after their eighth casualty, the marshals began using tear-gas; this became their principal weapon. One hundred and sixty-six federal marshals were injured, of whom twenty-nine suffered gunshot wounds; miraculously none were killed. The dead were a Frenchman, Paul Guihard, correspondent for the Agence France Presse and the London Daily Sketch, and Ray Gunter, an Oxford onlooker -- both of bullet wounds.

As the night wore on, the Ole Miss students in the mob were gradually outnumbered by outsiders. Of the two hundred rioters arrested, only twenty-four were from Ole Miss; another score were students from other Mississippi colleges. The rest were self-appointed vigilantes who had no connection with any university; most were Mississippians but they included visitors from Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Tennessee and Texas.

The two hundred men of the Mississippi Highway Safety Patrol -- the state police force -- assigned to the university were an uncertain element and their performance was later a subject of much controversy. Their sympathies were instinctively with the rioters and those of their chief, the Governor, were far from clear. However, State police officers led the first cavalcade of marshals when it entered the campus. Patrolmen were helpful in establishing roadblocks to bar outsiders; the main body took up positions in front of the Lyceum, mingling with the front ranks of rioting students and exerting some restraining influence. But soon after tear-gas came into play, the long line of state police cars retired in a slow file from the campus. A Mississippi legislator who is also a National Guard captain, said afterwards the patrolmen "stood around their cars" and offered no help in clearing the way for his men. (Attorney General Kennedy the next day accused Governor Barnett of going back on his word and withdrawing the state police; the Governor "emphatically and positively" denied this. A statement issued by Mississippi Senator James O. Eastland said the state police were "urging the students to withdraw," when "without warning, the marshals fired tear gas projectiles, some of them... point blank at the students and Highway Patrolmen.") Several hours later Lieutenant Governor Johnson, arriving on the scene, ordered the Highway Patrol back into action, stationing patrolmen again on roadblocks, where, by his own estimate, they stopped over six hundred cars loaded with armed riders. (Mayor Robert W. Elliott of Oxford said that when the rioting spread into his town Monday morning, "patrolmen actually saw cars demolished and saw mobs on the streets and did nothing about it." Later in the week the state senate resolved that by "their faithful and courageous efforts to maintain peace and order, the Highway Patrol and other officers reflected credit on themselves and on the State of Mississippi.")

The manner in which members of the Mississippi National Guard answered the call of duty was a reassuring demonstration of Mississippi manhood and integrity. These part-time soldiers included a score of members of the legislature and many active segregationists, a son of United States Senator John C. Stennis and even a son of the Governor, Lieutenant Ross Barnett, Jr. It was an agonizing situation for them, yet none faltered. The Oxford unit reached the Lyceum at 10:15 P.M. and was at the side of the federal marshals through the thick of the fighting. Its thirteen wounded included Captain Murray C. Falkner, a nephew of the famous novelist (who spelled the name "Faulkner"). About midnight two hundred members of other National Guard units made a heroic entry to the campus through roadblocks, brick barrages, gunfire and a wall of flaming gasoline. Approximately 2,000 Guardsmen were to be deployed in the area by 10 A.M. Monday

A pathetic leader of the mob was Edwin Walker, an embittered former major general in the United States Army (who, incidentally had commanded the federal troops in Little Rock five years before). Resigning in anger after a rebuke for his attempt to indoctrinate of troops under his command with ultra-rightist fanaticism, he had thrown himself into the arms of extremists of that ilk.

Walker left his home in Dallas, Texas, with a call for Americans to follow him; arriving at Shreveport, Louisiana, he broadcast an appeal: "Rise to stand behind Governor Barnett -- 10,000 strong, from every state in the Union!" The ex-general appeared among the students at Ole Miss Sunday at about 9 P.M. -- when a leader of dignity was what they most lacked -- and urged them on.

(Early Monday afternoon Walker was arrested at a roadblock just outside of Oxford on charges of "rebellion, insurrection and seditious conspiracy" and flown to a hospital for federal prisoners at Springfield, Missouri, for psychiatric observation.)

The President addressed Mississippi and the nation over television and radio Sunday at 10 P.M. The broadcast, originally scheduled for 7:30, had been postponed until he could better appraise the developments at Ole Miss. There it was only 8 P.M. then, but the rioting was in progress as President Kennedy spoke; Governor Barnett had issued a partial-surrender statement.

"The orders of the court," the President said, "... are beginning to be carried out. Mr. James Meredith is now in residence on the campus of the University of Mississippi."

His nine-minute speech reflected a desperate desire to avoid using military force in a domestic conflict, but he implied clearly that massed federal troops would be used if necessary. It was a gently worded appeal to reason and patriotism. He explained carefully the constitutional situation which made his responsibility as President "inescapable." Addressing directly the students -- few of whom listened to the broadcast -- he urged them to "accept laws with which you disagree as well as those with which you agree. The eyes of the nation and the world are upon you," he said, "and the honor of your university and state are in the balance."

The President spoke to Governor Barnett several times after the broadcast and some of the exchanges were heated. Barnett had made his "surrender" statement at 9 P.M. "Surrounded by armed forces," he said, "... and physically overpowered..., we must preserve the peace and avoid bloodshed." Some 2,000 of the Governor's supporters were milling about the mansion in Jackson; a Citizens' Council spokesman said federal forces were planning to seize the Governor, and the crowd stayed on in a circle around the grounds to fight off such an attempt.

Barnett's appeals for peace and order alternated with expressions of anger and defiance. At midnight (2 A.M. EDT) he said in another broadcast: "Surrounded on all sides by armed forces... and the oppressive power of the United States of America, my courage and convictions do not waver...." To the federal officials he said: "Gentlemen, you are trampling on the sovereignty of this great state and depriving it of every vestige of honor and respect as a member of the union of states.... May God have mercy on your souls. Mississippi will continue to fight the Meredith case through the courts.... We will never surrender."

At about the same time a force of Regular Army Military Police left Memphis for Oxford, some by helicopter, more by truck. The first company reached the university at 1:48 A.M. Two hours later more Regular Army units rolled into the campus. The mob was pushed steadily back and began to disperse. At 3:30 A.M. (CST), 5:30 in Washington, President Kennedy went to bed.

Shortly after 5 A.M. (CST), the military and the marshals swept forward together and drove the last two hundred rioters from Ole Miss. The swelling tide of soldiers engulfed both the campus and the town. Chief Marshal McShane escorted Meredith to the office of the university registrar and he was enrolled at 8:35 Monday morning. Sporadic rioting against federal soldiers in Oxford was quelled before noon. Thereafter the United States Government had the situation firmly under control.

At 1:42 P.M. Governor Barnett broadcast this message, which was later repeated several times on tape.

> My fellow Mississippians:
>
> Even though our state has been invaded by federal forces, we must have peace and harmony throughout our state.
>
> As Chief Executive of this great state, I now prayerfully urge each citizen to remain at home in his community. We must not have violence. Law and order must prevail.
>
> To those who have come to the Oxford area from other states, I have said many times before, and I say again, go home. I say this with great deference.
>
> To the people of Mississippi I say with all the sincerity that I possess, stay in your community and be calm. Restore law and order and let us all pray that no one else will be injured on our soil. Thank you.

But in another broadcast Monday night the Governor said: "The people of Mississippi are enraged, incensed -- and rightly so." Though he urged "our people to calmness," he called on "the federal authorities to put a stop to further violence by the immediate withdrawal of Meredith and the withdrawal of federal troops and marshals from our soil."

By nightfall the federal military forces in the area had reached 7,000; this number was more than doubled the following day. At the peak the federal government had, counting Regular Army and Air Force and National Guard contingents, nearly 30,000 troops committed in the area. But withdrawal began almost at once. By the end of the month only 500 soldiers were left and a few weeks later, only 300. These and a force of federal marshals guarding Meredith would remain indefinitely.

Governor Barnett's performance brought few cheers outside of Mississippi and neighboring Alabama, except among scattered extremists. Governor John Patterson of Alabama denounced the federal action and announced that he had dispatched a telegram to President Kennedy asking "if he is prepared to invade us in Alabama too." But Governor Ernest Vandiver of Georgia said: "I hope this tragic exercise in futility is over;" and Governor Terry Sanford of North Carolina declared: "I've never been prouder of the President!" The reaction to the upheaval in the nation generally was one of anger and disgust; press and politicians agreed that the Administration had acted correctly in suppressing the revolt. Criticism was mainly to the effect that the President should have acted sooner with greater force — as in this comment of Time Magazine of October 12: "President Kennedy could have learned one lesson from Eisenhower's performance in the Little Rock crisis: if forced to intervene, then intervene with sufficient force. That is what Ike did, and there was no death toll in Little Rock, nor any serious casualties. From the time of Meredith's first attempt to register under federal court orders, he was a sort of U.S. Government ward, accompanied by federal officials and transported in federal planes and cars. But not until hours after the attackers besieged the marshals in the Lyceum did Kennedy commit enough force to do the job...."

Abroad, the news from Mississippi caused excitement and strong emotions; but the image of oppression of Negroes in the United States was substantially mitigated by this massive exertion of federal power to secure the rights of a single Negro citizen. There was almost universal praise of President Kennedy and condemnation of Governor Barnett. The Ghana press and radio, often critical of United States policies, reported the news without emphasis on race discrimination here, and the Ashanti Pioneer said: "We are heartened, of course, that the Kennedy Administration is doing everything possible to remove this shameful show from the states." European comment reflected impressive conversance with America's race problem. Le Monde of Paris, noted that there had been a lot of talk about violence in connection with school desegregation in the United States, "but mostly silence about many schools where the law has been respected without the least trouble." The Times of London, said the President's action in the Mississippi crisis "will do a great deal to lift the record of his Administration." The Frankfurter Algemeine said: "Governor Barnett, Governor Faubus and Governor Patterson of Alabama were carried to political success on a wave of prejudice without regard to the damage to American prestige." The Sueddeutsche Zeitung, of Munich, said that both Kennedy and former President Eisenhower were convinced "that the dragon seed of slavery, abolished one hundred years ago, would continue to flourish if it were not torn from the Southern soil with a hard hand."

At a late hour Mississippi business and professional men spoke out for a "sane" approach to the crisis. Monday morning before order had been restored at Oxford, William H. Mounger, president of the Lamar Life Insurance Company, made a ringing appeal over Jackson television station WLBT-TV, which his company owns. He referred to "the conviction which many of us had that the events which were taking place would lead to violence," but he confessed that "none of us were willing to speak out and try to inform the people of Mississippi of the terrific tensions that resulted on the University of Mississippi campus last night."

He appealed to Governor Barnett "to stand up before those rioting crowds and explain to them that he had based his entire case on the law and the constitution of the United States of America and that it is not his desire that violence be carried forward." "...We are a part of the United States of America," he said, "and must obey the laws of the United States of America."

"While we are concerned with the lives of young people, we are more concerned with the fact that we as adult leaders in Mississippi have failed to stand up and counsel and give them guidance and we have allowed them to be incited to the point that they themselves have caused violence and resisted the United States of America."

Accepting Mounger's challenge, 127 of Jackson's business and professional leaders met the following day and signed a statement calling for "law and order and not mob rule."

There were other manifestations of compunction and shock among Mississippians. Two Episcopal ministers and several professors had made vain attempts in the heat of the melee to calm rioting students -- who after all were only a minority of the student body. The student newspaper, The Mississippian, came out as usual on October 1, Monday being its regular publication day; its editor, Sidna Brower, writing in the sound of gunfire and exploding tear-gas shells, told her fellow students they were bringing "dishonor and shame" to Ole Miss.

The Rev. James H. Nicholson, pastor of the Byram Methodist Church in Jackson, felt "that our hands are all filled with the blood of these dead and injured" and called for "repentance." He aimed a bold shaft at the powerful Citizens' Council. "For the past eight years," he said, "we have known of a well organized movement spreading a doctrine of hate. We knew this, yet we did nothing to offset this movement. We have let this group discredit our national government, the United Nations, the courts, the church and some of our basic ideals. We sat idly by while this movement gained control of our press and state government.... We must stand before God in repentance for this matter."

The Rev. Duncan M. Gray, Jr., pastor of St. Peter's Episcopal Church at Oxford, in a series of eloquent sermons, placed the blame "upon our leaders themselves; and upon you and me and all the other decent and responsible citizens of Mississippi, who have allowed this impossible climate to prevail." Of the rioting students he said: "Who could really blame them when the governor of the state himself was in open rebellion against the law?"

The fact that ministers could say these things without losing their pulpits was indicative of a certain change in Mississippi. There were more admonitions from the clergy. The ten ministers of the Oxford-Ole Miss area issued a statement calling for "repentance for our collective and individual guilt in the formation of the atmosphere which produced the strife at the University of Mississippi and Oxford...," and the statement was formally endorsed by the district superintendents of the North Mississippi Methodist Conference. Twenty-eight Methodist ministers issued a statement affirming their faith in the position of their church against "discrimination because of race, color or creed;" significantly, they agreed "to stand together in support of these principles."

In a series of articles in the Pascagoula Chronicle, later published in a brochure, a member of the state legislature, Representative Karl Wiesenburg, recalled the falsehoods and folly which led to the night of horrors at Ole Miss and declared: "That innocent blood was shed was not the fault of the President, the federal courts, the Attorney General or Chief Marshal James P. McShane. It was the price of defiance."

A resolution adopted by the University of Mississippi chapter of the American Association of University Professors, of which Dean Farley of the law school was among the signers, said it had "evidence that attempts to place all the blame for the October 1 and October 2 rioting on federal marshals are unfair and almost completely false." Under prodding by Deputy Attorney General Katzenbach, the university belatedly expelled four students for their part in the rioting.

But sackcloth and ashes were not conspicuous in Mississippi. The official position was that the state's conduct had been correct, that the rioting was a natural reaction to federal provocation; and most of the populace embraced this view. In the systematic intellectual isolation of Mississippi the roar of condemnation that rose from the nation and the world was scarcely heard within its borders. Notwithstanding the voluminous accounts of every phase of the upheaval from an army of the nation's best reporters, at the scene, the Mississippi public was given a very different picture.

Governor Barnett's Monday night, October 1, broadcast more or less established the official line. He said the students "were noisy and boisterous, but were not violent." He explained the outbreak of violence thus:

"The unarmed highway patrolmen, with their backs to the federal marshals, were peacefully moving the students when a pop bottle thrown by one of the crowd shattered in the street. The marshals immediately fired point blank into the backs of the state officers, who were only a few feet from them, and into the groups of young people. This was the direct cause of violence on the campus. Five unarmed highway patrolmen have been hospitalized from effects of tear gas fired by federal marshals. The federal marshals were inexperienced, nervous and trigger happy.... In this matter the federal government has been the aggressor from the outset."

The Mississippi Junior Chamber of Commerce further attributed the turmoil to the "unwillingness of President Kennedy and Attorney General Robert Kennedy to await the outcome of judicial processes they had invoked," as if nineteen months of litigation were not enough!) It undertook to set the nation right in a brochure entitled, "Oxford: A Warning for Americans." A Mississippi grand jury, after a solemn "investigation," rendered a report giving substantially the Barnett version. It said "the actions of the crowd consisted primarily of shouting, name-calling, flipping of cigarettes, throwing of eggs and small rocks" until "the gas was fired with no warning in the backs of patrolmen and university police. This," it concluded, "was done for the purpose of inciting a riot. We find this illegal action on the part of Chief Marshal McShane set off the tragic violence which followed."

Governor Barnett said: "I shall never apologize for anything I have said or done...."

Chapter 18

The Fuse Burns Short

There remained two states where, excepting the brief and stormy adventure of Autherine Lucy in 1956, no Negro had been admitted with whites to a state institution of higher learning. They were South Carolina and Alabama. With Mississippi, these were also the three states which had yet to enroll the first Negro pupil with whites in a public elementary or secondary school.

The situation in South Carolina, however, was less ominous than that in the other two. A significant change in South Carolina's attitude toward desegregation had been discernible since early in 1962. It was not a sudden conviction that segregation was wrong, though condemnation of the system on moral grounds was heard increasingly among a few South Carolinians. Rather a determination to resist at all costs had given way to a concensus that adjustment to the Supreme Court ruling was inevitable and that, when it could no longer be delayed, it should be effected with a minimum of disturbance. Traditions of gentility, perhaps somewhat more devoutly cherished in South Carolina and Virginia than elsewhere, militated against brawl and panic. When Charleston bowed painfully to a federal court order for the desegregation of its public golf courses in 1961, the "dignity of Charleston" precluded unseemly disorder.

Though many echoes of South Carolina resentment of the Brown decision have sounded in these pages, South Carolina had not produced any crisis of sufficient magnitude to draw our attention at length to developments in that state. There had been no breakthrough in the wall of public school segregation to record; and, though demonstrations and some rioting had attended the broad Negro protest movement, there had been no convulsions in South Carolina comparable to those that shook Montgomery, Tuscaloosa, Clinton, Little Rock, New Orleans or "Ole Miss."

South Carolina has a larger proportion of Negroes among its people than any other state except Mississippi -- approximately 35 per cent of the total population. The attitude of paternalism toward Negroes -- though since the Brown decision it had yielded much to the harsher tenets of white supremacy -- was nowhere more deeply rooted than among the whites of this state. To most of them racial integration seemed a revolutionary and evil thing, and for eight years they offered uncompromising resistance. The chorus of denunciations of the Brown decision reached a high pitch. In addition to Governor Byrnes, Senator Strom Thurmond and voluble politicians at all levels, South Carolina furnished two of segregation's best known literary defenders: Thomas R. Waring, the belligerent editor of the Charleston News and Courier; and William D. Workman, a columnist and author, who recently emerged as a Republican political leader.

On the other hand, James McBryde Dabbs, the eloquent champion of racial integration who heads the Southern Regional Council, was presiding over his ancestral cotton plantation in the heart of South Carolina. Dabb's personality so strikingly approached the Southern gentleman ideal that he continued to enjoy general respect. Two editors of minor newspapers, J. E. Chaffin of the Greenwood Index Journal and, more emphatically, A. M. Secrest of the Cheraw Chronicle steered a moderate course without significant molestation. Most of the advocates of adjustment, however, were not so fortunate. When in 1956 editor Jack O'Dowd of the Florence Morning News, undertook to convince his readers that "the South cannot maintain its policies of racial segregation," a storm of protest forced his resignation. In 1957 a dozen prominent citizens, led by five Protestant ministers, expressed concern over the cloud of racism and defiance which hung over the state in a brochure entitled South Carolinians Speak. They were subjected to a hail of criticism and abuse and the home of one of them was bombed. The latter outrage evoked condemnation from the South Carolina press, the Spartanburg Herald-Journal offering a reward of $2,500 for apprehension of the perpetrator. The posture of unrelenting defiance continued to prevail through the term of Governor George Bell Timmerman, Jr. and into that of his successor, Governor Ernest F. Hollings.

Hollings in his inaugural address in January 1959 promised continued resistance to school desegregation, but, significantly, he took a strong stand for law and order. Midway in his term of office he began to exert a quiet influence looking toward a more realistic policy. The legislature ceased to grant funds to institutions "on a racially segregated basis only." In the 1962 appropriations bill earlier provisions for the closing of schools or colleges to prevent desegregation were reversed by a clause which read: "No institution or activity for which the legislature has herein provided shall be discontinued."

Early in 1962, following some consultation among editors and with the governor, the press executed a concerted swing toward a more moderate approach to the desegregation problem. In his farewell address to the General Assembly in January 1963 Governor Hollings counseled: "... We of today must realize the lesson of one hundred years ago, and move on for the good of South Carolina and the United States."

The new governor was Donald S. Russell, a wealthy business man, a former president of the University of South Carolina -- and a moderate. Two weeks after Governor Russell's inauguration, on January 28, 1963, a Negro entered a previously all-white institution of higher learning for the first time since Reconstruction.

A suit in behalf of Harvey B. Gantt, the 19-year-old son of a Negro employee at the Charleston Naval Yard, had been filed in federal court six months earlier to restrain the state agricultural college of Clemson from refusing admission to him and "other qualified Negro residents" because of their race. Clemson has schools of architecture, arts and sciences, engineering and textiles as well as agriculture. Gantt had dropped out during his junior year at Iowa University, where he had a good record, and he now desired to resume his education in the field of architecture at Clemson.

The legal fight ended in January. The Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals reversed a district court decisin and directed that Clemson be ordered to admit the Negro applicant and "others similarly situated," a request for stay was denied by Chief Justice Warren and the order was duly issued on January 22. In the meantime the public had been prepared by many voices for mild acceptance of the outcome. A Columbia Record editorial of December 11 called on citizens for "obedience to the law," on public officials for "responsible direction," and on the schools for "continued compliance with court directives and provision for the protection of all individuals in their care." Governor Russell told Attorney General Kennedy that no federal marshals were needed at Clemson, and none were sent.

The event proved sensational only in its felicity. When Gantt arrived at the college to enroll, the 160 representatives of news media outnumbered the students on hand. The latter were indifferent or even friendly. News photos registered smiles all around, the broadest smile on the face of Harvey Gantt.

The admission of Negro students to the University of Alabama in June 1963 furnished a day of tension and drama, but no violence. It diverted attention only briefly from an historic nation-wide upheaval. In Birmingham in the same state a few weeks earlier the flames from a series of massive Negro demonstrations and their suppression by the police with spectacular ferocity had lit the tinder of Negro discontent throughout the land.

The magnitude and sweep of the onrush then took almost everyone by surprise. At the beginning of 1963 the race problem was obviously growing more urgent, but the situation still had the outward appearance of one that would await corrosive attack upon prejudice and step-by-step adjustment over a period of years.

The fact that January 1, 1963, marked the one hundredth anniversary of the issuance of the Emancipation Proclamation added some sentimental impetus to the Negro push for fulfillment of the promise of freedom. President and Mrs. Kennedy observed the centennial by entertaining four hundred prominent Negroes, together with a number of white champions of the Negro cause at an evening reception. The presence of so many Negroes in the White House was itself significant of the changing times. Complying with an earlier request of the President, the Commission on Civil Rights produced "a report on the civil rights progress of the nation during the past century" in book form under the title -- using the words of Lincoln -- Freedom for the Free. In its concluding summary the report said: "As the century following emancipation draws to a close, more forces are working for the realization of civil rights for all Americans than ever before in history. Government is active in every branch and at every level, if not in every region. Voluntary associations in the field have multiplied at such a rate that it is difficult to catalog them... The final chapter in the struggle for equality has yet to be written."

On November 20, 1962, the President had issued a long-awaited order prohibiting race discrimination in federally-assisted housing. On February 28, 1963, he delivered his first message to Congress devoted exclusively to civil rights. In it he renewed an earlier proposal to substitute a sixth-grade education for the literacy tests which in some Southern states were freely manipulated to prevent Negroes from voting; he noted that under existing law the government can initiate suits to end discrimination in registering voters and proposed a measure authorizing federal referees to register Negro voters while suits are pending in counties where fewer than 15 per cent of those eligible were on the rolls; he recommended provision for technical and financial assistance by the federal Office of Education to school districts facing the problem of desegregation; and he asked that the life of the Commission on Civil Rights be extended at least four more years.

His recommendations contemplated some further gains for Negroes, but did not go as far as many liberals desired. They suggested a reluctance on the President's part to alienate support from what at the time seemed more important legislative objectives.

A major battleground of the Negro protest movement in 1962 and at the turn of the year had been the tightly segregated city of Albany in south Georgia. That experience had been discouraging. The long seige in the form of desperate but nonviolent demonstration, led for a time by Martin Luther King, had resulted in more than ~~750~~ a 1000 arrests and had failed to make any significant change in the regime of discrimination there.

Through the month of March attention focussed on the town of Greenwood, in Le Flore County, Mississippi, where white resentment of the efforts of Negroes to register for voting was expressed in incessant harassment and police brutality. There was some shooting, in which a Negro worker in the cause was wounded. The Voter Education Project on March 31 released a listing of 64 acts of violence and intimidation committed against Negroes in Mississippi since January 1961. The situation in Le Flore County was indefensible to begin with: 92.5 per cent of the 10,274 whites and only 1.9 per cent of 13,567 Negroes of voting age were registered; and widespread sympathy was aroused with the Negroes struggling for the right to vote there. When the Department of Justice moved to secure the release of jailed Negroes and stop intimidation, quiet was restored and a trickle of Negro registration proceeded.

William L. Moore, (space) a white Baltimore mail-carrier and an eccentric idealist, set out in April from Chattanooga, Tennessee, to walk through Alabama and Mississippi with a message of brotherhood. On April 24 he was found murdered on a lonely Alabama road, his bullet-pierced body still holding signs, one of which read: "Equal Rights for All."

The state of Alabama was the chief stamping ground of the Ku Klux Klan. It operated more openly there than elsewhere; Ku Klux signs of welcome were posted on highways at the entrance to many towns along with the signs of churches and civic clubs. Though only a small fraction of the populace was actually identified with the organization, the Klan spirit characterized much of that state's reaction to the aspirations of Negroes for human dignity and citizenship. Citizens' Councils were also active in Alabama. The attitude of white Alabama was not as monolithic as that of white Mississippi; in the former state there were substantial elements favoring moderation and adjustment, and these became notably more articulate in 1962. But Alabama's political leaders, supported by a majority of the electorate, were second to none in their posture of reckless resistance to change. The industrial city of Birmingham was under the control of rampant white supremacy extremists. ¶ The situation in Birmingham was investigated in the spring of 1960 by Harrison E. Salisbury, a reporter for the New York Times, who was writing a series of articles on interracial relations in Southern cities. His findings appeared in a startling Times article of April 12, 1960, under the headline: "Fear and Hatred Grip Birmingham."

"Every channel of communication," Salisbury wrote -- "every medium of mutual interest, every reasoned approach, every inch of middle ground has been fragmented by the emotional dynamite of racism, reinforced by the whip, the razor, the gun, the bomb, the torch, the club, the knife, the mob, the police and many branches of the state's apparatus."

The white leaders of Birmingham reacted to this disclosure with a roar of indignation. The three city commissioners filed a libel suit (ultimately unsuccessful) for $500,000 each against the Times and its reporter, and Salisbury was indicted by a grand jury on 42 counts of criminal libel. The article amazed white Southerners; many liberals were incredulous. It was not a balanced survey of the whole city; as the Times stated later, it "did not stress the obvious fact that an overwhelming percentage of the citizens of that city lead happy and peaceful lives...." Most Birmingham whites in their rigidly segregated world were unaware of the barbarities which were committed in their city. But Negroes and the few persecuted white workers for interracial justice in Birmingham recognized the picture that Salisbury had drawn. They sent out warnings from time to time during the next three years that the city was moving toward a convulsion of fearful proportions.

The Times article noted that some Negroes had nicknamed Birmingham "the Johannesburg of America." Indeed, nowhere was the oppression of Negro Americans more to be compared with the regime of apartheid in South Africa. That Birmingham was the largest American city still refusing to admit any Negro child to a school with whites was but one symptom of the infection there. The Negro 34 per cent of the city's total population of 340,000 was crowded into ghettoes outside of which it was practically impossible for Negroes to find homes. In the white business section where most of their income was spent, Negroes were denied employment except in menial capacities; they were barred from eating places; and lavatories, water fountains and theaters were segregated or closed to them. There was no Negro on the city police force. Most galling of all for Negroes was the daily denial of human dignity and equal protection of the law: the arrogance of official Birmingham, the unwillingness of whites to listen to Negro complaints, the exposure of Negroes to harassment and violence from racist ruffians and their harsh and insulting treatment by the police.

The city was ruled by three commissioners, one of whom -- Arthur J. Hanes -- was also mayor. But the city was largely dominated and its racist tone was set by T. Eugene Connor, better known as "Bull Connor," the coarse, bellowing 63-year-old veteran commissioner of public safety.

an explosion was feared by many in January 1962 when the commissioners closed all the city's parks, playgrounds and golf courses rather than submit to a federal court ruling that they must be open to all citizens. This headstrong action precipitated a surprising movement among white business men for a more moderate interracial policy. By autumn it had grown into a formidable campaign against the Connor regime.

Birmingham voted in November to abandon the commission form of government and adopt the mayor-council plan. Connor ran for mayor, and in an election on April 2, 1963, he was defeated by a vote of 29,630 to 21,648. Chosen mayor instead was Albert Boutwell, a respected Birmingham lawyer and former lieutenant governor of Alabama. The Birmingham News announced the election results under the headline: NEW DAY DAWNS FOR BIRMINGHAM. However, legal difficulties prevented the new administration from taking over until May 23, leaving Bull Connor in control during the April and May convulsions.

The Negro direct-action campaign began, on a small scale at first, the day after the election. Martin Luther King, arriving the night before, joined the Rev. Fred L. Shuttlesworth, president of the Alabama Christian Movement for Human Rights, and other local Negro leaders and became the central figure in the crusade. In the imminence of a change of administrations in Birmingham, many liberals thought the move untimely; some local Negro leaders held back, some white moderates were angered. Officials of the Department of Justice, among others, urged King to wait until conciliation had been tried in the new atmosphere. But King was never one to wait upon problematical differences in official attitudes or to compromise for paltry gains. He favored headlong attack upon all racial wrongs -- a spirit which was to characterize the larger Negro uprising. Sit-ins, picket lines and parades, staged almost daily, grew into the largest and boldest Negro demonstrations yet seen. (A Negro boycott of white merchants was already in effect.) When one demonstration was beaten back by the police and many participants arrested, a bigger demonstration followed the next day. Negro students in their teens were brought into action until they predominated in the mass demonstrations.

During the first week of May, a series of conferences took place between Negro leaders and a group of prominent white business men. Assistant Attorney General Burke Marshall played an active mediatory role. The newly-elected city officials kept in touch with the negotiations, but the group still in power would have nothing to do with them. "It breaks my heart," the outgoing mayor said, "to see some quisling whites negotiating with him (King) when we've got him on the run!" Nevertheless, an agreement was reached; it contemplated desegregation of some downtown lunch counters and public facilities "within 90 days," an upgrading of Negro employees, release of jailed demonstrators and "public reestablishment" of interracial communication. For his part, King announced May 8 that demonstrations were being suspended.

The truce was short-lived. On Saturday night, May 11 -- following a meeting of the Ku Klux Klan near the city -- two dynamite blasts demolished the home of the Rev. A. D. King, a younger brother of Dr. King. The minister, his wife and five children raced to safety before the second blast. The street quickly filled with angry Negroes. Within the hour two more bombs exploded at the Gaston Motel, headquarters of the Negro movement. Thousands of Negroes surged through the streets now, and despite the pleas of their leaders for nonviolence, they were flinging bricks, brandishing knives and pummeling policemen. A white man's store was set on fire; two Negro homes nearby went up in flames, then three more white men's buildings. Rioting continued until dawn Sunday, when 250 Alabama state troopers came to the aid of the embattled city police. Fifty persons had been injured badly enough to require hospitalization. The next day 3,000 federal troops were sent to positions near Birmingham, but returning calm made their presence unnecessary in the city.

By mid-May (the ninth anniversary of the Brown decision) 3,000 Negro prisoners were crowding the Birmingham jails. The turmoil, copiously reported by news and camera men -- most of all the use of police dogs and the playing of powerful fire hoses upon crowds of Negroes, including women and children -- had shocked the world. One photographic masterpiece, a white policeman clutching the shirt of a Negro youth with his right hand while his dog on the leash in his left hand lunged at the Negro's belly, became familiar to millions. A tenuous peace reigned in Birmingham when the new city administration took over on May 23, and two months later some lunch counters and public facilities began to be desegregated in accordance with the interracial agreement. But the nation-wide Negro protest had burst into flames.

Demonstrations erupted in a hundred cities. A sign carried by Negro students in San Francisco said: "Birmingham is everywhere." Solidarity was expressed with the Negroes of Birmingham, while attention focussed on local grievances. Los Angeles Negroes crowded Wrigley Field in a "Freedom Rally for Birmingham," but they called for an end to de facto school segregation and discrimination in housing, employment and labor union membership in Los Angeles; in St. Louis demonstrations protested segregation in school classrooms; in Nashville, where many race barriers had been dropped, mass demonstrations against continuing restaurant segregation led to clashes on the streets with whites; in Philadelphia fighting occurred between police and Negroes protesting exclusion from labor unions; in New York demonstrations in building trade unions forced suspension of work on a city hospital; in Tallahassee, Florida, police arrested 200 students protesting Negro exclusion from two theaters and broke up a crowd of demonstrators with tear gas; Cambridge, Maryland, and Danville, Virginia, were torn with interracial strife; in North Carolina, a state which had gone farther than most of the South in removing racial barriers, Negroes demonstrated against remaining discrimination in a dozen cities and a riot in one of them, Lexington, resulted in the death of a white man. Day after day in city after city demonstrations and incidents continued.

Concluding pages

The Supreme Court had manifested impatience with the slow pace of this process in two significant opinions. In a decision rendered May 27, 1963, in the case of Watson v. Memphis, the high tribunal said that its 1955 ruling "never contemplated that the concept of 'deliberate speed' would countenance indefinite delay in the elimination of race barriers in public schools."[1] In cases involving the desegregation plans of Davidson County and Knoxville, Tennessee, it ruled June 3 that the liberal transfer privileges that had attenuated school integration in a number of Southern cities "do not meet the requirements of Brown." It said: "Now... eight years after this decree was rendered and over nine years after the first Brown decision, the context in which we must interpret and apply this language to plans for desegregation has been significantly altered."[2]

During the 1963-1964 term a total of approximately 26,000 Negro children attended school with whites in the South. In the border states the residential pattern, or Negro apathy and a few pockets of stubborn white resistance had resulted in the survival of a few segregated school districts, but in these states and in the District of Columbia approximately 250,000 out of a total of 475,000 Negro pupils were in integrated public schools. Over 150 districts had desegregated for the first time, more than three times the number desegregating for the first time in 1962-1963. In 130 of the districts desegregating in the fall of 1963 the action was taken voluntarily; only a score of school boards moved in response to federal court orders.

In Texas, the hampering requirement of prior referendum approval was removed on January 1 when State Attorney General Will Wilson ruled that the 1957 act of the legislature was unconstitutional. In September no less than 61 more Texas school districts desegregated, bringing the total in that state to 238 out of 919 biracial districts. Elsewhere in the South, some of the cities such as Charleston, Savannah and Jacksonville, in which earlier public hostility had aroused the greatest apprehensions, accomplished the feat of enrolling Negroes in previously all-white schools without incident. Only in Alabama was serious trouble encountered.

Compared with previous years, the South's school desegregation performance in 1963-1964 represented a leap forward. Five or six years earlier it would have been considered encouraging. But at this stage in history it was grievously inadequate. Ten years after the Supreme Court had declared the practice unlawful, 99 per cent of the South's Negro children were still segregated. Virtually all of the Negro children who had reached the third grade at the time of the Brown decision had graduated or left school without ever emerging from the public education ghetto. The long way from fulfillment of the bright promise of Brown was still fuel for the fires of Negro protest.

In Alabama, Governor Wallace indulged in ten days of pyrotechnics before yielding once more to federal authority. Twenty-four Negro children were under federal court orders to be admitted to previously all-white public schools in four cities: two in Mobile, thirteen in Tuskegee, five in Birmingham and four in Huntsville. Local authorities were prepared to go ahead with desegregation in each city and there was little evidence of impending disorder -- excepting the chronic tension in Birmingham-- until the governor intervened. The latter, in what seemed to be a desire to create a spectacular crisis, dispatched state troopers hither and yon to prevent desegregation plans from going forward, declaring: "We are going to show them they're not dealing with demoralized Cubans or regimented Balkans!"

Wallace's maneuvers followed no consistent plan. He ringed the public school at Tuskegee with one hundred troopers on Monday, September 2, when that school was scheduled to open, and forced it to remain closed -- over the protests of the school board and the city's mayor. Tuesday, on the eve of school-opening in Birmingham, he sent six hundred state troopers to that city against the wishes of the city authorities. But on Wednesday he yielded to the pleas of local officials and kept his troopers in their hotel rooms while the schools opened and enrolled two Negro pupils with whites. Several small white mobs gave the police some trouble and half a dozen arrests were made before they were dispersed. That night a dynamite explosion damaged the home of the Negro leader Arthur Shores and injured his wife. Hundreds of Negroes swarmed into the streets and in the ensuing battle with police one Negro was killed and twenty other persons were injured. The next day the schools to which Negroes had been assigned were closed.

State troopers also closed four schools in Huntsville, which the Negroes had not yet entered -- over angry white protests; but the affected schools in Mobile were allowed to open Friday without the Negro pupils. It was announced that all schools would be allowed to reopen Monday, September 9. On Monday state troopers barred the Negroes from the white schools in Mobile, Tuskegee and Birmingham, but he allowed them to enter and enroll in Huntsville. The same day five federal judges in Alabama's three judicial districts issued orders restraining Governor Wallace from further interference with school desegregation.

At this point Wallace decided to replace his troopers with members of the National Guard. Guardsmen surrounded the schools in three cities early Tuesday morning. But President Kennedy acted quickly; before the school bells rang the Alabama National Guardsmen had been called into federal service and whisked back to their armories. Twenty Negro children entered white schools in Mobile, Tuskegee and Birmingham and, except for a week of abortive white student boycotts, the crisis was over.

Wallace said: "I can't fight bayonets with my bare hands!" But it was the governor who sent the soldiers to the schools and the President who sent the soldiers home. If Wallace expected the kind of local acclaim that greeted Faubus in 1957 and Barnett in 1962, he was sadly disappointed. His maladroit intervention against the wishes of city authorities drew criticism even from many of his former supporters. The Montgomery Advertiser, whose editor had enjoyed a close personal friendship with the governor, said: "The Advertiser must sorrowfully conclude that, in this instance, its friend has gone wild." The Birmingham News said: "...Birmingham was done a disservice by the governor."

Nevertheless, letters applauding his performance poured in from many sections of the country. The governor's office at Montgomery boasted that its incoming mail was greater than that of the White House. Wallace had become the latest national symbol of anti-Kennedy racism and a host of widely scattered extremists quickly welcomed him in that role. The Alabama governor even talked of running for President of the United States. Nearer home Negrophobes were encouraged to acts of savagery.

Sunday morning, September 15, a dynamite bomb blasted a crowded Negro Baptist church in Birmingham. Four girls, aged ten to fourteen, were killed in their Sunday school classes, their bodies mutilated. Many other worshippers were cut and bruised by flying debris; a score required hospital treatment. In two hours of rioting which followed before incensed Negroes were quelled by police or calmed by their own nonviolent leaders, a Negro youth was unintentionally shot by a policeman. During the excitement, but elsewhere in Birmingham, two young whites callously shot to death a 13-year-old Negro boy riding past on a bicycle.

The church-bombing could hardly have been better calculated to shock the nation and the world. In Birmingham the well-meaning new mayor wept when he heard the news. Some horrified white citizens gathered in churches to pray. But in that warped city many still missed the significance of the sickening outrage. Grieving for the murdered children, many Birminghamians still said the Negroes had "brought it on themselves." Rewards offered for the arrest of the perpetrators totaled over $76,000; $52,000 was offered by the city. Governor Wallace offered $5,000, saying the tragedy had "saddened all Alabamians." But Martin Luther King wired the governor: "...The blood of four little children.... is on your hands. Your irresponsible and misguided actions have created in Birmingham and Alabama the atmosphere that has induced continued violence and now murder."

The grisly fanatics who planted the bomb in the Birmingham church -- and the innocent children whose lives were taken -- may have done as much to advance the Negro cause as the March on Washington. But even without that poignant stimulus, Negro leadership was committed to a fight, nonviolent, but massive and unrelenting, to the end. Nonviolent action had become an elaborate science. Earnest planners were multiplying and refining techniques that would have bewildered Mahatma Ghandi. Cadres of probably 5,000 field workers from various Negro organizations were undergoing systematic training and plans of attack in scores of cities, with timetable, for coming months were on file.

Day after day the nonviolent offensive went on. Sitins took many forms for many purposes. There were also lie-ins, "study-ins" (Northern schools), "kneel-ins" (churches), "sleep-ins" (apartments), and "wade-ins" (beaches), as well as road blocks, picket lines, parades, boycotts of discriminating establishments and the products of discriminating companies. "Jail-ins" were massive, as thousands of Negroes were arrested. Many submitted to arrest almost gleefully, others scuffled and some fell limp so police would have to carry them away.

Negro demonstrations offended many. Cynical observers held that "pressure" harmed the Negro cause, that the proper way to achieve its goals was not in the streets, but in friendly talks around the council table. The critics of direct action were not all hostile to the movement, but thpy were seldom close students of the Negro's long struggle. Experience had taught Negro Americans that no significant advance is ever made without pressure; negotiation with whites around the council table all too often had ended with no appreciable change in the status quo. On the other hand -- even as criticism mounted -- direct action was opening public facilities and bringing other concessions in hundreds of cities.

The usual demonstrations were not merely an exercise of the right of peaceful petition or a dramatization of grievances. They obstructed traffic, caused business to suffer and invited clashes with unruly whites, taxing ~~which added to the service of~~ the police. They were frankly coercive. The granting of specified concessions was often the price of surcease from parades and picketing. Moreover, the decorum and restraint that marked the March on Washington were far from characteristic of many lesser demonstrations. In much-publicized instances Negroes lay on the pavement to block entry to segregated establishments or to impede construction work in which Negroes were denied employment. Militant Negro youths insulted some friendly leaders, both white and colored, whom they considered "too moderate;" they were most obstreperous sometimes where their grievance was minor or uncertain. Some Negroes marched merely to "get into the act." There was rivalry among Negro leaders and organizations and some angry friction. Was there ever a mass movement without undisciplined elements and a measure of human egotism and folly?

Among the nation's 170 million whites a mountain of prejudice still stood in the path of the Negro advance. A wave of sympathy for Negroes had been touched off by Bull Connor's fire hose and police dogs. It deepened with the Birmingham church-bombing horror. But the feeling subsided in many quarters when the realities of the Negro upsurge came nearer home. Many who deplored race discrimination from a distance, were aroused to fierce resentment when a Negro family moved into their neighborhood. The old image of the Negro and the subconscious antipathy were still present among a majority of white Americans. The influence of these whites was felt in Congress and the ignorant and unruly among them, as among the Negroes, were increasingly ready for interracial clashes. Negro leaders, while passionately urging nonviolence, could not say how long demonstrators could be restrained. "Nonviolence" was not in the vocabulary of white hoodlums.

Stewart Alsop and Oliver Quayle reported in the Saturday Evening Post of September 7, 1963, the results of an informal poll of white attitudes in the East, the Middle West and the West Coast. They showed a startling ambivalence. Many who condemned race discrimination in theory showed stubborn prejudice in their feeling about personal association with Negroes. Seventy-seven per cent of those interviewed thought a white man should have a legal right to refuse to sell a home to a Negro. "The danger," these writers said, "lies less in violent Negro action than in violent white reaction."

A formidable task confronted the clergy, the educator, the publicist and all who labored to hasten the "change in the hearts of men." Another task confronted the statesman. The decade had furnished abundant examples of the truth that law and compulsion also can change not only practice, but in turn, habits and attitudes. Under the discipline of the Armed Forces recruits of prejudiced background were adapting themselves to racial integration quickly and cheerfully. In civilian life many whites who had inveighed vehemently against the lowering of race barriers were accepting the change with complacency after the fact.

The unrest will end sometime because it is inevitable that in America justice and humanity in time will prevail. The revolt will tend to diminish as Negroes find racial exclusions ended in one community after another. Individual integration in government and industry will both accomplish a prime objective and deplete the ranks of the militant intelligentsia. The latter trend is already visible. The captain in the Negro's greatest legal battle -- Thurgood Marshall -- has moved to the detachment of a United States circuit judge. A former vice-chairman of the NAACP -- Robert Weaver -- is head of the National Housing Administration. Carl T. Rowan, as ambassador to Finland, has turned from literary assault upon racial injustice to national foreign policy. A hundred other Negroes hold important national, state and city offices with responsibilities to all the people. Similarly more and more talented Negroes will serve the public in managerial and executive positions in private life.

Shortcomings in training and experience will delay the full integration of the Negro in the national economy beyond the day when restrictions on account of race shall have been removed.

The time when a Negro will be able to choose his home in accordance with his wishes and his means is probably even farther off. It is early to attempt to visualize the consummation of a movement that has a long, hazardous way still to go. What convulsions, what solutions, what miracles lie ahead no one can say.

Is there instruction for us in the experience of other times and places? We will look in vain in modern history for a prototype of the American Negro Revolution. In some respects it is unique. It bears most resemblance, perhaps, to the long struggle of the Irish people for dignity and freedom. There we saw rivalry of factions and leaders, moderates and extremists in all degrees, zealots both nonviolent and very violent. Britain waited tragically too long to face the problem with tolerance and understanding. Years and generations, of "talk around the council table" brought no solution -- until depredations, bombings and assassinations were widespread. It is not an impulse of hysteria to find in the violence and terror in Ireland in the early 1920's a warning for the United States today. On the other hand, the aim of the Negro movement in America is in a sense the opposite of what the Irish were fighting for. The Irish wanted to get out, the Negro wants to get in. That is a thought full of counsel for the near term and of hope for the long future.

The Negro population has been in America as long as the white. Negroes joined the settlers at Jamestown before the Mayflower reached Plymouth Rock; Negro arrivals in the United States virtually ceased before the nineteenth century flood of European immigratinn began. To the Negro American this is his country; he knows no other. What he was striving for in the tenth year after the Brown decision was no more and no less than to become at last a part of the American people.
